We have already stated that the Cour du Quartier conducts the investigation prior to the committal of the accused, and decides on the form of the "acte d'accusation," on which the amount of punishment eventually depends. In proceedings "Au grand criminel" the whole of the evidence also is taken before it. It thus virtually becomes the prosecutor of the crime. The very act of directing the committal and framing the indictment implies that its members have formed a strong opinion on the guilt of the accused. Yet they form a part of the Cour en Corps by which he is eventually tried. When that Court consists of a quorum of seven, the members of the Cour du Quartier may constitute the majority; but in all cases their opinion necessarily influences the Court. In the event of an equality of opinions, the casting vote rests with the Bailiff who has presided in the Cour du Quartier, and who now presides in the Cour en Corps. But the evil does not rest here. Wherever the case is of a nature to excite great interest in the Island, many of the Jurats take part in the proceedings before the Cour du Quartier, and thus come to the trial with minds more or less affected by what they have heard before. The inconvenience of this is felt. The Bailiff and the most eminent Advocates in the Island have expressed an opinion that the members of the Cour du Quartier who have acted in sending the party to trial should be incapable of acting as members of the Court at the trial. In this we entirely concur.

The preliminary examinations "au secret," and the consequent interrogatoire of the accused, appear to us equally objectionable. But our opinion with regard to them is not that of the Bailiff and the majority of the lawyers of the Court. This part of the Criminal process differs so essentially from all that we have been accustomed to, as English lawyers, that we were anxious to have the subject discussed before us, in order to ascertain the opinions of the members of the Court, and the Advocates, on the subject. With one exception, that of Mr. Falla, a gentleman very extensively engaged in the defence of criminals, the members of the Court, including the Bailiff and the Bar, were, more or less strongly, in favour of continuing the practice. The value of the Bailiff's testimony in favour of the system is the greater from his having been an English lawyer, filling criminal and civil judicial functions in England, and from his avowing that his opinions had been changed by experience. We are bound also to add that it was an unanimous opinion that the practice of the Court had much improved under his presidency; so that his opinion in favour of retaining the ancient system could not possibly arise from prejudice or illiberal dread of change. We feel diffident in dissenting from such authority; but the reasons alleged in support of the present system have failed to convince us.

We have stated it as our opinion that the preliminary examinations were originally informations on which the Court directed the apprehension of the party. In this view their secrecy would be reasonable; and they would necessarily be conducted in the absence of the accused. But, when he is already in custody, it is agreeable to the first principles of justice that he should be confronted with his accusers. So far is this from being the case that, according to the present practice, the informations are not taken in writing. Thus the party charged has no means of comparing the evidence at the trial with that taken before the Cour du Quartier; and the best materials for instructing Counsel, as well for the prosecution as the defence, are withdrawn. This inconvenience was strongly felt by the Bailiff, who said: "I know of no improvement which would be so great here, as that of taking down in writing all the evidence upon which a man is committed, and letting the Counsel for the prisoner have copies of it a certain time before the trial. I believe that would secure two advantages: I think it would give the prisoner pretty nearly the same advantage as if he were present, while it would reserve to the Court all the power it derives from a secret examination." The only reason suggested for the present practice was that, it being a secret Court, what passed there ought not to be made known. This, however, assumes that the investigation ought to be secret. We believe that the chief advantage derived from the present practice is the opportunity it gives to the Court of testing the truth of the prisoner's answers on his interrogatoire. Its utility therefore depends upon the propriety of that proceeding. It is certainly not, at first sight, contrary to justice, that a party accused of crime, who has heard the evidence against him and has had an opportunity of questioning the witnesses, should be interrogated to elicit his explanation of the facts, before he is committed for trial. If means could be devised to ensure its never being abused, the interrogatoire, so conducted, would be perhaps a proper mode of arriving at truth. But it cannot be said to be necessary for that purpose. Its utility was maintained by the Court and members of the Bar chiefly on the ground that the truth told by a man in answer to questions by the Court, without his having heard the evidence which suggested them, gives great weight to that part of his statement which is otherwise incapable of proof. But this is precisely the objection to the interrogatoire as conducted by the Royal Court. An innocent person, who is perfectly intelligent and honest, has nothing to fear from any criminal prosecution fairly conducted. But most of the persons accused of crime are ill informed; and such persons are led into contradiction and falsehood by the desire to evade circumstances which they feel to make against them. The learned Advocate before referred to, Mr. Falla, put this very forcibly in his evidence. He was, indeed, dwelling principally on the case of a prosecution instituted against several parties at once; but mischiefs of a similar kind seem to be incidental to most cases. He said: "When four or five persons are called in private into Court, one after the other, and questions are put to them, the first impression on their mind is that the Crown Lawyers and the Court wish to make them declare different things; and an ignorant or a timid person, with that thought, is not capable, in my opinion, of giving a faithful statement; and, if he does not, it is sure to turn against him." We concur in this. Statements of otherwise unimportant facts, which, if truly made, are relied on as proof of the innocence of the prisoner, must, if betraying attempts at evasion, have the contrary effect, to his prejudice. Stress was also laid on the practice of informing the prisoner beforehand that what he says will be used against him at the trial, and that he is free to answer or not, as he chooses. When his statement, as in English proceedings, is spontaneous, the caution coupled with the information that he is not required to say anything has its proper place. But the proceedings by the interrogatoire are essentially compulsory. Formerly they were enforced by torture. The chapter of Terrien which authorizes its application is sanctioned by the Approbation des Loix; and, although the humanity of modern times has rendered the practice obsolete, no law has made the infliction now unlawful. It is part of the same "Ordonnances Royaux" which regulate the Criminal practice of Guernsey: the practical abolition is merely a humane usurpation. But it is obvious that the inference to be drawn from a refusal to answer must be that the party is incapable of explaining the facts which make against him. Again, he is not allowed the assistance of Counsel, who would probably advise him not to answer. Such a privilege would amount to the abolition of the interrogatoire. In truth, a voluntary interrogatoire is a contradiction; and the compulsion of the process, once physical but still moral, is not the least objectionable part of the system. The caution to abstain from answering, if the party thinks fit, is always given in words; but a prisoner, acting without counsel, will almost always, in practice, feel himself bound to answer. Then the questions put are those which arise from evidence which has been so arranged (and quite properly) as to give the fullest effect to the primâ facie case of accusation. The answers given to such questions are given at a great disadvantage; and, probably, this disadvantage is even exaggerated by the prisoner, who is pressed with the circumstances of suspicion marshalled in their most formidable order. Hence arises a temptation to evade and deceive, by which an ignorant person would be seduced, however innocent of the offence charged. Another very dangerous feature in this practice appears to be that its tendency is to engage the Court, which conducts the examination, in a contest with the prisoner. We were assured that this in fact did not occur: and we are quite ready to believe that the members of the Court have not consciously allowed themselves to be drawn into such a course. But the danger is that the objectionable feeling will arise where the Court is conscious of nothing but an exercise of ingenuity in the pursuit of truth: and that this danger is not imaginary must, we think, be obvious to any one who has read much of the interrogatories administered by the Courts in foreign Criminal Tribunals. We cannot see why all the advantages which this practice is alleged to possess may not be attained by merely reading over the adverse evidence to the accused, and then bidding him tell his own story, if he thinks fit. It is impossible to deny the efficacy of the present practice as an instrument for the occasional detection of crime; but it is equally clear that the practice is liable to mislead, even when administered with the purest intentions. We have no doubt that the members of the Royal Court were perfectly sincere in assuring us that it is often of the greatest use to a prisoner, and that they never knew an innocent man condemned in consequence of it. But it appears to us dangerous to make legal guilt depend upon anything short of proof from extrinsic evidence or the voluntary confession of the accused.

With respect to the mode of conducting the trial, no valid reason occurs to us why one course should be followed when the proceedings are "Au grand Criminel," and another when they are "A l'ordinaire." The practice of taking the evidence in the former case in the absence of the accused is open to many objections. These are not removed by giving him a copy of the depositions at the "Confrontation des témoins," and permitting his Counsel then to cross-examine the witnesses from the written documents. Every one, who is at all familiar with the proceedings of Courts of Justice, knows that the value of cross-examination depends on its growing out of the examination in chief, and that much of its effect is derived from the demeanour of the witness while subject to its test. According to the mode pursued in Guernsey, the Counsel for the defence is deprived of this advantage; and, what is of greater importance, the Court loses the opportunity of judging of the weight of a witness's testimony from watching the manner in which his evidence is given. The advantage which written depositions are supposed to afford of weighing the evidence more accurately does not, we think, make up for the want of this.

The proceedings "Au grand criminel" are, however, now of comparatively rare occurrence. There have been only twenty cases so tried during the ten years preceding this Inquiry; and there is evidently an inclination, on the part of the Court, to withdraw from that mode of trial all cases which do not require a very severe punishment. A strong feeling exists in favour of its abolition.

The proceedings on the trial "à l'ordinaire" are free from this last objection: but many defects are common to both modes of proceeding.

The whole law of evidence is in a most unsatisfactory state. This branch of law, in all systems, is to be sought rather in the practice of the Court than in positive enactments. In Guernsey, the written law of evidence is, for the most part, in direct restraint of the elucidation of truth; while the practice of the Court, from the nature of the tribunal and the absence of recorded decisions, is reducible to no rule. This becomes more mischievous from the same individuals having to decide on the admissibility of the evidence, and its effect when admitted.

The restraints imposed on testimony are unreasonable. In every trial the number of witnesses that can be examined, whether for the prosecution or the defence, is limited to twelve. No boy under the age of fourteen, nor girl under the age of twelve, and (in strict law, though, as it seems, the practice is less stringent,) no deaf or blind person, is admissible as a witness. The wife is not allowed to give evidence against her husband, even in the case of personal violence committed by him upon her.

The objection arising from relationship is carried to a great extent, and is found to be attended with great practical inconvenience in a small community where frequent intermarriages of necessity multiply the objection. By misapplying a passage from the Coustumier cited by Terrien, which, in the opinion of the ablest lawyers of the Island, relates only to Jurors and has no reference to witnesses in the modern acceptation of the word, a practice has grown up under which no relative, within the degree of first cousin once removed to a party charged with crime, is compellible to give evidence against such party, or is admissible as a witness in his favour. The Crown may call such a witness; but the rule is that he is not compellible to give evidence, when he could be rejected if tendered on the other side. The exception is that the evidence of relations is admissible in proof of an alibi. This also rests on a passage from Terrien (l. ix. c. 33. 5.) which, in the opinion of the very learned Advocate who was examined on the subject (in which we fully concur), has also been misunderstood. This exclusion of evidence in so many cases has in practice been found so inconvenient, that an attempt was lately made to pass an Ordonnance of the Court in Chefs Plaids, to render the evidence of relations, beyond the degree of brother and sister, admissible in all cases. An objection was, however, taken, that the alteration involved the repeal of the law contained in Terrien, which, according to the received opinion, the Court in Chefs Plaids has not the power to effect. The proposed Ordonnance was therefore rejected; although we have seen that the Court, in its judicial capacity, has not at all times considered itself so fettered. The consequence is, that the law remains hitherto unaltered. We thought it right to collect the opinions of the Members of the Court and the Advocates on this point, as the objection to the present practice appeared to us so obvious. We state, as an instance of the tenacity with which ancient usage is adhered to in Guernsey, that all the Jurats and the Advocates, with only two exceptions, were opposed to admitting the evidence of relations within the degree of first cousins.

The mode of conducting the trial at the hearing is equally objectionable. The want of some statement by the Counsel for the Crown of the facts to be proved against the prisoner is felt to be a great inconvenience. It is difficult to imagine how, in its absence, the attention of the Court can be drawn, in intricate cases, to the material points in the evidence during the progress of the trial, or how the defence can be properly conducted. Counsel complain, with great reason, of the embarrassment consequent in addressing the Court on the law and facts of the case at the same time, before the Counsel for the prosecution have been heard. The conclusions of the Procureur and Contrôle, in dealing with the facts, may, as regards the Court, in some measure supply the want of an opening speech. But the functions of these officers, partaking of the Advocate and Judge, are contradictory, and only reasonable on the supposition that the Court, without such aid, is incapable of arriving at a clear perception of the facts or applying the law to them. Where the Bailiff is a lawyer, whose duty and practice it is to present both to the Jurats, the weighing of the evidence and the consideration of the punishment would in our opinion be with more propriety intrusted to him, the Law Officers of the Crown being confined to the duties cast upon them as public prosecutors.

The discussion of the amount of punishment, before any decision is come to on the prisoner's guilt, is objectionable in another point of view; that it generally involves a consideration of his previous character and conduct. Prior convictions are stated against him, as part of the speech of the Procureur and Contrôle, for the purpose of justifying a conclusion for a heavier punishment. This, however unjust, is the necessary consequence of the mode in which the judgment of the Court is given, each individual Jurat expressing his opinion at once on the guilt of the prisoner and the punishment to be inflicted.

It appeared to us that many of these defects owed their origin to the Court having, in all cases, to decide both the law and the fact. We, therefore, in the course of the inquiry, suggested the propriety of separating the decision on the law and the awarding of punishment from the decision on the fact. The advantages of such an alteration were generally admitted: but it appeared, upon discussion, impracticable to separate the Bench into distinct bodies for this purpose. We were informed that the limited number of Jurats did not admit of a division, by which part might sit with the Bailiff to decide the law, and another portion perform the functions of a jury. It was also objected that those who had been so long in the habit of deciding the law for themselves would not be inclined to receive it from any one else. We felt the weight of these objections; and we proceeded to inquire as to the views entertained respecting the propriety of introducing trial by jury. The Jurats, as well as the Law Officers and Advocates of the Court, all concurred in opinion that it was incapable of being carried into effect in Guernsey: and the Bailiff, though less decidedly, appeared to take the same view. It was evident that the members of the Royal Court regarded the introduction of a jury as involving the destruction of their own functions as criminal judges. Every objection was therefore made to the suggestion.

The objections were derived from the size and population of the Island, which would, it was said, render it difficult to find a jury who should come into Court without some previous knowledge and impressions with regard to the case to be tried; from the strong local feeling existing in the country parishes, and the extraordinary intricacy of family connections and interest; lastly, from the existence of two different languages in the Island, the one familiar to the inhabitants of the country parishes, and the other to those of the town. It was also pressed upon us that the Jurats are constantly under the eye of the public, which renders them careful and guarded in the discharge of their duties; that their decisions are come to in public, each Jurat not only giving his vote but stating his opinion in open Court; that Jurors, on the contrary, would go back into the masses again at the conclusion of the trial, and be no more before the public. It was also insisted that the Jurats, from their habits of weighing evidence, acquired by constant practice both in civil and criminal cases, are more likely to decide questions of fact with a probability of arriving at the truth than jurymen who, in a place where crime is so rare as in Guernsey, would be but seldom called on to discharge these duties. These objections are undoubtedly entitled to consideration: and another, which was urged, is perhaps still stronger; namely, that in so small a community it would be almost certain that jurors, indiscriminately taken from rate-payers, would, before and after discharging their office, mix in society with parties feeling strongly on the event of the inquiry, and that the institution, if so introduced, might thus be the cause of aggravating those tendencies to ill will, between individuals and families, to which a limited population is peculiarly subject. To another objection, urged with much earnestness, we attach no weight. It was said that the change would be inconsistent with the privileges of the Island. If this expression means the privileges of any one class or body of men, we are persuaded that those who insist upon the claim would repudiate it if the supposed privileges were found to be inconsistent with the general good of the Island. If it means privileges common to all the inhabitants, then the question is merely, as before, whether the supposed privileges be beneficial or not. If not, that which is called a common privilege is simply a common grievance: if beneficial, the argument is superfluous. We point this out because, however obvious the answer is, the objection was sometimes suggested, and oftener, we believe, tacitly assumed, as an argument against other changes, where that which it was proposed to change would, in countries familiar with constitutional principles, have been attacked as an intolerable oppression.

When the evidence on this point was given before us, no one expressed an opinion in favour of introducing trial by jury, except the rector of two of the country parishes. He urged that the difficulty as to the languages had been much exaggerated and would continually decrease; that the evils of family connection already existed strongly on the Bench; that the number of persons fit for jurors was ample; that an unfair verdict of a jury might be subjected to review, as in England, which was impracticable on the present system of Guernsey.

Since our return to England, we have received from the Constables of St. Peter Port the copy of a letter addressed to Your Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department, on the subject of the introduction of trial by jury into Guernsey. It is signed by the two Constables of St. Peter Port; by one Constable of the parish of St. Sampson; one Douzenier of the Vale; one Douzenier of Câtel; one Constable and two Douzeniers of St. Saviour; two Douzeniers of St. Pierre du Bois; one Douzenier of Torteval; one Constable of the Forest; and one Douzenier of St. Martin. There are no signatures from the Douzaine of St. Andrew's parish, nor from the Cantonal Douzaines of St. Peter Port unless they are to be considered as represented by the two constables. It states that the inhabitants, whom the above parties represent, feeling deeply the importance of the question of introducing trial by jury in the Island, have met in their respective parishes, and have unanimously adopted resolutions against such a change in their constitution. They declare their entire concurrence with the sentiments expressed by the Bench and Bar; and they urge that they already possess a real jury in the Jurats selected by themselves, who have acquired legal experience; and they contend that the introduction of a trial by jury would impose a new duty without any public advantage.

We have had no means of ascertaining the circumstances under which the meetings referred to were held, nor by what number of the inhabitants they were attended. We can therefore form no opinion of the value of the document. It is certainly signed by a very small proportion of the Douzaines of the parishes to which it refers. If we could persuade ourselves that those who have refrained from signing it are either indifferent or favourable to the alteration, it would add little force to the objections urged by the Royal Court pending our inquiry. But no manifestation of an opposite feeling has been made: and we are decidedly of opinion that the wish of the majority of the inhabitants of Guernsey is at present adverse to the change. It is important to recollect that any system of law, which is to be worked by the instrumentality of the people, must fail, however good in other respects, where the people themselves look upon it with dislike.

The abolition of the old Norman mode of trial by the Enqueste du Pays, and the substitution of the French mode of conducting criminal trials, have withdrawn the people from the habit of taking part in the administration of justice, and, to a certain extent, unfitted them for the duties of jurymen. In Jersey, where the old Norman institutions have been retained and the constitution is more popular, no inconvenience is felt, in practice, from the interference of family connection or local feeling or popular prejudice with the working of trial by jury. The population of that Island is not double that of Guernsey; and criminal trials are far more frequent: yet no difficulty is experienced in selecting a jury of twenty four impartial men capable, from their education and their familiarity with both languages, of trying the cases which arise there. We were disappointed on being informed that such is not the case in Guernsey. And, however unwillingly, we feel ourselves compelled to adopt the opinion, almost unanimously expressed to us, of the unfitness of trusting the body of the inhabitants of Guernsey, in their present state of intelligence and social feeling, with so popular an institution. This is the effect of the evidence given to us by certainly not the worst instructed members of the population, and not only acquiesced in, but earnestly confirmed, by all those who have spoken on the subject, with one single exception. We, therefore, are unable to resist a conclusion which, if less strongly vouched for, we should, as strangers to the inhabitants, have considered prejudiced and harsh, and which nothing that came under our limited personal observation would have authorized us to adopt. Nor can we now believe that such an inferiority to the rest of the population of Your Majesty's European dominions can be permanent. In early times, while the justices in Eyre continued their circuits in Guernsey, trial by jury was frequent. Their records, in the reign of Edward the Third, shew that at that time crimes were tried in Guernsey by a jury of the parish in which the act was committed. We are disposed to think that the discussion of the question, during the progress of our inquiry, will not be without its use, and that, in progress of time, the objections which now are felt to the introduction of a jury in criminal trials will yield to a sense of the advantages of that mode of proceeding, and a capacity for taking part in it be created. We think, however, that at present there would be great difficulty in framing, on the principle of assessment to the local taxes, a jury pannel which would not include many who would be found incompetent to the adequate discharge of the duty, and exclude some who would be capable of it.

The advantage, however, of having the facts found by a tribunal distinct from that which applies the law and imposes the penalty is, in our opinion, so great, and the want of it necessarily accompanied by so many evils, that every effort should be made for its accomplishment. We think that the same body who now elect the Jurats might elect a body of jurors, who would be familiar with both languages, and from their station not more obnoxious than the present Jurats to the other objections which have been suggested. The number of cases which would have come under the operation of a jury, during the ten years preceding our inquiry, does not exceed two hundred and fifty. Allowing for some increase from a more definite classification of crime and increased vigilance on the part of the Police, the number would still be far from large. A pannel of six and thirty jurors would, probably, give ample scope for occasional absence and the right of challenge: but there could be no difficulty in finding a much larger number. This would retain the choice of the judges of fact in the hands of the present electors of Jurats, a circumstance to which much importance is attached, from the notion that a choice exercised through the medium of the Douzaine is in effect a popular choice. Whether a choice so exercised is in truth a popular choice we need not here enquire: the feeling is one which it is important to encourage, and the more so as it must be conducive towards training up the inhabitants to a fuller sense of their rights and duties. If such a mode of obtaining a body of jurors were adopted, it might be expedient to attach some distinction to the office, which should make it an object of ambition, or at least compensate for the responsibility of its duties. Service by the party elected also should be compulsory, at least for a limited period. We see no reason why a body so constituted should not possess the confidence of the inhabitants to the same degree as the Jurats. It might also satisfy some doubts (in which however, we do not participate) if the foreman of every jury were a Jurat.

GUERNSEY.

We have next to offer some observations on the constitution of the Royal Court.

We have already stated that the twelve Jurats are usually chosen from the most ancient and respectable families in the Island. We believe them to be loyal and devoted subjects of Your Majesty, active and zealous in the discharge of their duty, and possessing, to a very considerable extent, the confidence of their countrymen. But we are compelled to state our decided opinion that most of what is objectionable in the system of criminal law which has grown up in Guernsey, and in the mode in which criminal justice is practically administered there, may be traced to the constitution of the Royal Court and the authority it exercises in its double capacity as a judicial and legislative body.

We have described at length the legislative functions of the Court sitting in Chefs Plaids. Powers so extensive and undefined appear to us inconsistent with the legislative powers exercised over the Bailiwick by Your Majesty in Council, and irreconcileable with anything like popular principles.

According to the theory of the Guernsey constitution, the Jurats may on one day, sitting in a Court of Chefs Plaids, make an Ordonnance without the consent of Your Majesty, against the will of the functionary representing the Crown in the Island, and without consulting the body of the States, and, on the next, sitting as a Court of Justice, may proceed to put their own construction on it and to execute the law of their own making, without their decision, in any matter of criminal law, being capable of review by any superior authority. It would be consistent with the due exercise of the legislative power that the States should frame laws for the Island subject to Your Majesty's concurrence. But it is contrary to the ordinary exercise of Your Majesty's high prerogative that the legislative power, which in Guernsey resides in the Crown, should be delegated to one of the three Estates of the Island so as to render that body capable of enacting laws without Your Majesty's concurrence. This power of the Royal Court in Guernsey could have had no legal origin except from a grant by the Sovereign. It seems to us doubtful whether it must not, from its nature, be referred to usurpation. But, at any rate, we submit to Your Majesty that it would more properly be confided to the whole body of the States, and that it ought not to be permitted to rest in the Royal Court.

This union of the judicial and legislative functions in the same individuals has been attended by the worst consequences in Guernsey. The enactment of the Commentaries of Terrien as law, in opposition as it would seem to the wishes of the people, is to be traced to the legislation of the Royal Court. The discretionary power assumed by the Court in the administration of the law has its origin in the same cause. This is increased by the nature of the tribunal. Men without legal education will not readily adopt a strict system of law, the administration of which can be only acquired by study and practice. The only justice, which a body so constituted is capable of administering, consists in an endeavour to deal with each case as it arises according to their notions of what is right in the particular instance. The restraining power of the Law Officers and the Bailiff is too feeble to withstand the prejudices or the passions of the Jurats. The consequence is, that the fate of those who are submitted to their jurisdiction often depends, not on the sentence of the law, but on the caprice of the Court.

Another objection arises from the mode of their appointment. We were told that it is the great privilege of the people of Guernsey to elect their own Judges. We think such a privilege very objectionable. It appears to us, that all judicial appointments should proceed directly from Your Majesty. But it is a mistake to assert that the Jurats are elected by the people of Guernsey. We have already pointed out to Your Majesty how small a share the people have in the constitution of the States of Election. The Jurats themselves form a considerable portion of this body; and their influence with the Douzeniers is so great that it is not often that a candidate obnoxious to them can have much chance of success.

Another objection arises from the political duties of the Jurats as members of the States. Party politics, or, more properly, faction, does not exist in Guernsey to the same extent as in Jersey; but it is impossible that questions of local politics should not sometimes occur of deep interest to the inhabitants. On such occasions they have a right to expect the active interference of the Jurats and the public expression of their opinions, as the leading members of the States of Election and Deliberation, and as gentlemen of family and fortune. Their judicial duties act in restraint of this, and render it unbecoming for them to take any part in such proceedings. The community are thus deprived of the full benefit of their services in one character or the other. The advantage of their assistance as leaders and guides is lost, or the part that they take in such discussions renders them unfit for their office as Judges. This disadvantage is aggravated by the narrow local limits within which their authority is exercised, and the violence with which local topics are discussed in a small community.

During our inquiry, instances of this were brought before us. Differences had unfortunately arisen between the Lieutenant Governor and the Royal Court touching the privileges of the latter. The particular points in dispute had been submitted to Your Majesty in Council for adjudication. The inhabitants naturally took a great interest in the question, and expressed strongly their feeling in support of what they considered the rights of the Royal Court and the ancient constitution of the Island. Pending the consideration of the case before the Privy Council, information was received of a supposed conspiracy, in which officers of one of the regiments of Militia were said to be implicated, to offer violence to the person of the Lieutenant Governor at a review which was expected. This produced an inquiry by Your Majesty's Government in England, which resulted in a direction from the Secretary of State for the prosecution of certain officers of the West Regiment of the Guernsey Militia for seditious language. In the interval, between the preliminary examination and the trial, a public meeting was called of the native and resident inhabitants of the Island, for the avowed purpose of adopting an address to Your Majesty, expressive of their devoted and unaltered loyalty to Your Majesty's person and Government. We were told that this had no reference to the charges then pending against the Militia officers, but that it was called exclusively to repudiate an imputation of general disloyalty, which a member of the House of Commons, in allusion to this charge, was reported to have thrown upon the inhabitants. This imputation, no doubt, was the immediate cause of the meeting: but, from the history of the dispute, it was impossible that the meeting could be otherwise than intimately connected with the imputation of conspiracy cast on the Militia, which was deeply resented by a large portion of the inhabitants of the Island. The resolutions passed at the meeting appear to us to confirm this view. The members of the Royal Court, after consulting together, determined, very properly, not to go to the meeting in a body. This completely shews the character of the meeting. There could be no impropriety in the Jurats attending a meeting for the mere purpose of expressing their loyalty to Your Majesty, and, apart from their character as Judges, there might be great propriety in their expressing their disbelief of the charges against the Militia. But there would have been the greatest indecency in the Court taking part in a meeting at which a criminal charge then pending before them might be the subject of discussion. Several of the Jurats, however, in their individual capacity, were present, and amongst them the late Mr. Guille, the then Bailiff of the Island. At the termination of the proceedings three cheers were given for the Royal Court, which were answered by the Bailiff proposing three cheers for the loyal Militia. Mr. Guille, we have no doubt, honestly thought that the stigma cast on the Militia was undeserved; and, in any other position, the public expression of such an opinion might have been in the highest degree commendable. But we can understand the chief Magistrate of the Island so far forgetting what was due to his judicial character, only on the supposition that his political character rendered it necessary that he should take part in the proceedings. The meeting was on the 2d of July; the trial took place on the 13th, when the accused were acquitted by the unanimous opinion of the Court. On looking at the printed report of the trial, we find the evidence so conflicting that we think no jury would have acted safely in pronouncing a verdict of guilty: but we must add that enough appears to convince us that the charge could not have been abandoned before trial without a gross dereliction of duty.

An incident, which occurred during the progress of the proceedings, may be noticed here. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée was a principal witness against one of the parties accused. At the investigation before the Cour du Quartier, he had given evidence, which his character as a clergyman rendered it difficult to discredit, and which, uncontradicted, would amount to proof of the charge. This, though taken at the secret sitting of the Court, had unfortunately been divulged, by whose fault it did not appear; but it became the topic of public talk; and threats were held out that he would be indicted for perjury, if he should persist in the same evidence at the trial. His brother, Mr. Harry Dobrée, a Jurat of the Royal Court, thinking him mistaken, abstained from taking any part in the preliminary investigation; but, from a wish to save him from the threatened prosecution, after having, in vain, endeavoured to persuade him to quit the Island so as to avoid appearing as a witness at the trial, Mr. Harry Dobrée proposed that he should procure the signature of the Lieutenant Governor to a letter directing the Law Officers of the Crown to withdraw the prosecution, on the alleged ground that so many connections of the accused were among the witnesses for the Crown as to make it difficult to obtain a conviction. It is only by keeping in mind the peculiar nature of the tribunal that we can understand how a Judge could have permitted himself to make such a proposition to a witness, in a criminal trial of the greatest importance, then pending before the Court. We believe that Mr. Harry Dobrée was not aware that he was acting with impropriety, and that he was only desirous of rescuing his brother from what he believed to be impending disgrace. This, however, only proves how imperfectly the duties of a Judge may be understood by a Jurat of the Royal Court.

In another proceeding arising out of the same unfortunate transactions, we regret that we cannot altogether acquit the Court of partiality.

The Rev. Daniel Dobrée, whose name has been just mentioned, and who was Rector of the parishes of Torteval and the Forest, was charged with the infraction of an Ordonnance directing the mode in which notices of public meetings are to be published. The act charged against him was the taking from the frame, in which notices are directed to be deposited, a notice of a public parochial meeting to be held in his own parish church. We have read the Ordonnance with great attention, and cannot discover that it creates any such offence. The proposed meeting was for the purpose of forming a committee to unite with the other parishes of the Island in framing an address to Your Majesty, expressive of the loyalty of the inhabitants towards the person and government of Your Majesty, and at the same time to mark their disapprobation of the recent conduct of the Lieutenant Governor. Mr. Dobrée was a partizan of the Lieutenant Governor, and disapproved of the object of the meeting. Without his signature, as Rector, no meeting could be legally held for the purpose in the church. On his refusal to sign the notice, it was signed by the constables and placed in the frame on the Sunday immediately before divine service, the frame itself being placed inside the church, and not near the principal door on the outside, as the Ordonnance directs. But for the removal of this, as it appears to us, illegal notice from a place where it had been improperly placed, Mr. Dobrée was convicted and punished. It is impossible to avoid suspecting that his real offence in the eyes of the Jurats was the refusal of his sanction to the meeting. This was resented by the partizans of the Royal Court, whose members were thus unfortunately called upon to act as Judges in a matter too nearly affecting themselves to admit of their coming to an unprejudiced decision.

In submitting these remarks to Your Majesty, we are anxious, while we are endeavouring to bring to view the vices of the system, to avoid casting imputations upon individuals. When we consider the anomalous character of the Court, that its decisions in criminal matters are not capable of being questioned by Your Majesty in Council, and that, unlike the minor criminal tribunals in this country, it is not subjected to the control and supervision of Your Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench, we are surprised that powers so unlimited should be so little abused. We also believe that it would be difficult to select from the body of the inhabitants persons better qualified by station and character to discharge the duties intrusted to them, or more anxious to discharge them with propriety. The instances of irregularity adduced are intended to point out the evils which we believe to be incidental to the constitution of the Court, and the system of law it is called on to administer. It is natural that the Jurats should set a high value on privileges which they have so long enjoyed, and functions which have become hereditary in the families of many of them for many generations. Such feelings are entitled to every consideration and respect. But those gentlemen are too enlightened not to know that they hold these powers in trust for the benefit of the inhabitants: and we are convinced that no personal considerations on their part will interfere with their ready obedience to Your Majesty in the prosecution of such changes as Your Majesty shall be advised to effect.

We have next to suggest to Your Majesty such changes as appear to us best calculated to remedy the defects which we have pointed out in the constitution and practice of the Royal Court. The discharge of this part of our duty has been embarrassed by the difficulties incident to the attempt to frame a tribunal adapted to the circumstances of the Island, which shall not either be open to some of the objections which we have pointed out, or be altogether disproportionate to the amount of work which it will probably have to perform.

With regard to some of the alterations which we shall venture to suggest for the consideration of Your Majesty, we feel no doubt: others we recommend with great diffidence, being aware that they cannot fail to be distasteful to those who will be immediately affected by the change, and that they involve the abolition of what the inhabitants in general have been taught to regard (we think, erroneously) as their greatest privileges. The vices of the present system are, however, inherent in the institutions; and no mode suggests itself to us, by which the Tribunal of Bailiff and Jurats should be continued, which would not perpetuate the most objectionable of its characteristics. We are decidedly of opinion that the Judges ought to be lawyers, that they should receive their appointments direct from Your Majesty, and not from the election of the whole or any part of the community, above all that they should not be, as they now are, virtually self-elected. We think they should hold office quam diu se bene gesserint. We are also of opinion that Justice is better administered by a single Judge presiding at the trial of offenders, than by a Court composed of several Magistrates. The responsibility of the function in the former case is more deeply felt, and the uniformity of the proceedings more easily maintained. But we think it a great advantage, where circumstances admit of the formation of a Court of appeal from the decision of such Judge on any purely legal point. Such a Court necessitates the existence of at least three paid Judges, and presupposes business sufficient to find them employment. We have no doubt that judicial employment would be found for that number; but we think that the substitution of a Court so constituted would, for the present, meet with great opposition from the prejudices of the inhabitants, which would be increased if it should be necessary to provide for the expense of the Court by taxation.

One obvious defect in the existing Institutions, which, we fear, must continue to attach to whatever may be substituted for them, in the event of any change taking place, is the want of some superior Court capable, not only of reviewing their decisions, but also of controlling the administration of the local tribunal. The existence of such a power is a great check on the proceedings of the inferior Court, and tends to prevent that arbitrary action incidental to the exercise of authority which knows no control. In this point of view the periodical circuits of the Justices in Eyre were of the greatest utility; and we feel little doubt that the unpopularity, which is said to have attached to their proceedings, mainly arose from the controul that they exercised upon the irregularities of the Jurats.

In suggesting the changes which we think expedient, it is our desire not to interfere unnecessarily with existing institutions which long habit has rendered congenial to the inhabitants, and which their want of intercourse with other countries causes them to value, in our opinion, above their real worth. We are anxious not to offend even the prejudices of a people who are devotedly attached to Your Majesty's person and Government, who are for the most part satisfied with the existing state of things, and who do not feel the force of many of the objections which strike us as of the greatest moment. The Island does not as yet present the same party struggle which exists in Jersey. The population of Guernsey is much smaller, the influx of strangers less, the course of life more stagnant, the intelligence of the people less active, and their influence on the local government of the Island less direct. These causes present a reason for non-interference which does not exist in the former case, and induce us to suggest a remedy less complete than that which we have suggested in our First Report. We think, however, that certain alterations are imperatively required.

In the constitution of Guernsey, the political power resides almost exclusively in the same individuals who are intrusted with the administration of justice. The Bailiff and Jurats possess the legislative and, to a great extent, the executive power, as well as the judicial. So that it becomes impossible to propose any change in the constitution of the Royal Court, which shall not involve a considerable alteration of the political Institutions of the Island. We are thus compelled to propose changes which extend beyond a reform of the Criminal Law of Guernsey, and yet are necessarily suggested by the consideration of the constitution of the tribunals entrusted with its administration.

We recommend that legislation by the Court in Chefs Plaids should be entirely abolished. We suggest that the enactment of local laws, for the future, should be confided to the States of Deliberation with the assent of the Lieutenant Governor, as the representative of Your Majesty.

To render complete the separation of the legislative from the judicial functions, it will be necessary that the Jurats should no longer form a constituent part of the States of Deliberation. Such a change involves an alteration in the constitution of that body. We feel that we should exceed the limits of our commission by entering into a discussion of the mode in which this ought to be effected; but it is obvious that it would afford the opportunity of making the legislative assembly more immediately representative of the people than it has hitherto been. We recommend this change with greater confidence, because we find that our views with regard to the separation of the judicial from the legislative functions are shared by the more popular members of the States of Deliberation. We were led to suppose that the right of the Royal Court to make laws for the Island, in the Courts of Chefs Plaids, was a privilege highly valued by the inhabitants at large; and we expressed ourselves to this effect in our First Report. But a discussion of the question which has taken place since we left the Island shews us that we had greatly overrated the popular feeling in this respect. At the meeting of the States in January, 1847, a committee was named, to consist of a member chosen by each Douzaine of the Island, for the purpose of taking into consideration the reform of the civil laws, and to make their report to the States. We have been informed that, at a sitting of the Committee, at which ten members were present, the following resolution was carried by a majority of nine against one. "Le Comité est d'avis que les Etats doivent être reconnus comme le seul corps législatif et que la Cour Royale doit être limitée à l'administration de la loi."

We have already stated our opinion as to the change which should be introduced in the modes of bringing an offence under the cognizance of the Criminal Court.

We are of opinion that the Members of the Court who commit the prisoner for trial should in no case form part of the tribunal who try the fact of his guilt, or sit in judgment on his crime if he should be convicted.

We also think that the preliminary proceedings "au secret" and the interrogatoire of the accused should be abolished. Instead of the present proceedings, we suggest that in ordinary cases the witnesses against a party charged with crime should, before his committal, give their evidence on oath, in open Court, in his presence; and that written depositions should be taken of their evidence. That the accused, after hearing the evidence, should be at liberty, but should not be required, to make any statement, which should also be reduced to writing, and be evidence against him, if the Crown Officers should think it material at the trial. We suggest that periodical Sessions should be fixed at which the trials should take place; that copies of the depositions should be furnished to the Law Officers of the Crown to enable them to prepare the mise en accusation; and that, at a stated time before the Sessions at which he is to be tried, the prisoner should be furnished with copies of the mise en accusation and of the depositions taken before the committing Court. The Law Officers should have the power of quashing the proceedings at any step, subject to their being resumed by the direction of the Court, as hereafter specified.

We are of opinion that the Procès au Grand Criminel should be at once abolished. In its stead we suggest that the plea of the prisoner should be taken at the trial: that, in the event of his pleading Guilty, the Law Officers of the Crown should pray the judgment of the Court, and sentence should be passed by the presiding Judge. That, in the event of his pleading Not Guilty, the proceedings should commence by the Law Officers of the Crown stating to the Court the case they propose to prove against him. That the witnesses in support of the prosecution should then be called and examined vivâ voce in chief by the Law Officers of the Crown, and cross-examined by the Advocate for the prisoner. That the depositions taken before the committing Court should not, on the trial, be evidence of the facts deposed to, except in case of the death, before the trial, of a party whose depositions had been taken, but that either party should be at liberty to produce them as evidence of what the witness had said before the committing Court, if that should become material. That, after the witnesses for the prosecution have been all heard, the Advocate for the prisoner should be heard for the defence, and, if he should produce witnesses, then the Law Officers of the Crown should be heard in reply, and the Advocate for the prisoner again upon the whole case.

GUERNSEY.

We have found great difficulty, from the reasons before assigned, in proposing a Tribunal for the trial of crime in Guernsey. We think that a Court consisting of a single Judge, with a tribunal, between him and the party charged, to find the fact of guilt, possesses advantages which do not belong to any other mode of criminal trial hitherto devised; and we should regret exceedingly if the limited size of the Island, or the peculiar state of society in Guernsey, should render its inhabitants incapable of participating in so great a benefit. With this view, we suggest that all trials for crime and serious misdemeanours should take place before the Bailiff, or a Lieutenant Bailiff, as sole Judge, with a jury composed of one Jurat for foreman and a certain number of Jurors to be elected in the mode already suggested. The number of Jurors, with the Jurat, should be six, twelve, eighteen, or twenty four; and the concurrence of five sixths of the number should be necessary to a conviction. We recommend that the presiding Judge should decide all questions of law arising during the proceedings, whether as to the form or substance of the accusation, or on points of evidence, and that he should also sum up the facts to the Jury, directing them as to the law, so far as it may be affected by the view they take of the facts proved, and leaving to them the question of the guilt of the prisoner.

In order to carry out this change, it will be necessary to withdraw the Bailiff from the committing Court. With this view we propose that the Crown should appoint an Officer, to be called the Vice Bailiff, who should sit daily for the purpose of hearing Police charges, before whom all parties charged with crime should, in the first instance, be brought, and whose duty it should be, when the charge was of a character to be submitted to a Jury, to take the depositions of the witnesses and commit the accused for trial. We think that this Officer should also have the power of taking bail for the appearance of the accused in certain cases, and of committing him for further examination if circumstances required it, and also of dismissing the charge. We also think that the Police of the Island should be placed under his control, and that the Constables should report to him daily all offences, obey his warrants, and act under his directions.

We propose, also, that cases which fall within the summary jurisdiction of the Court should be tried by the Vice Bailiff and two Jurats, and that such Court should hold its sittings on the same days as those on which the Cour du Quartier now sits, and possess the same jurisdiction in criminal matters as that Court has in similar cases, provided only that the proceedings preliminary to the committal of any prisoner for trial should take place before the Vice Bailiff alone, in the manner before stated. We think that, in such cases, an appeal should lie from this Court to the Court of Three hereafter described, on the appellant entering into security for the costs.

We also think that the Bailiff, the Vice Bailiff, and all the Jurats, should be constituted Justices of the Peace, in order to give them jurisdiction under certain Acts of Parliament in force in Guernsey, requiring certain acts to be done before a Justice of the Peace, such officer being unknown in the Island. We suggest that the Vice Bailiff should also be capable of performing any of the functions of the Bailiff, whether of a Civil or Criminal nature, which are purely ministerial.

We recommend that the Bailiff should in future hold office quamdiu se benè gesserit, and not during pleasure. That he should be the Chief Criminal Judge of the Island, capable of presiding in either Court, and should take full notes as is done in England; provided always that, in the event of his acting on the committal of an offender, he should not be competent to sit as Judge at the trial. We also propose that he should retain the power he now possesses of appointing, from among the Jurats, a Lieutenant Bailiff, who should be capable of acting as Judge on the trial of offenders before the superior Court, or as President of the inferior Court, in the absence of the Bailiff or the Vice Bailiff, and, generally, of doing all acts connected with the administration of Criminal Justice, which belong to the office of Bailiff or Vice Bailiff. The Three should, we think, form a Supreme Court, sitting at fixed periods, before whom may be brought any questions of law, by way of appeal from the Court that tries either summarily or with a Jury, and which also should have power to order new trials where there has been a misdirection or failure of justice, and to award criminal process, where the Police Court has refused to do so, or where the Law Officers have quashed the proceedings. This Court should also have a general jurisdiction over the Criminal practice, analogous to that possessed by the Court of Queen's Bench.

We think that the Jurats should be Conservators of the Peace, and have the power of committing parties for breach of the peace, and of issuing warrants for the apprehension of parties charged with crime upon information being given before them on oath; and that Constables and Peace Officers should be bound to obey their lawful warrants.

We think that the Constables and other Peace Officers should have authority to apprehend, without warrant, persons committing a breach of the peace in their presence, and all persons upon a charge of crime upon a warrant made in any of the cases which will arise under the different modes of bringing forward a charge; and that they should be bound to bring such persons before the Police Court with the least possible delay, together with the witnesses in support of the charge.

We have now stated our views with regard to the changes which appear to us necessary in the administration of the Criminal Law in Guernsey. There are some minor points which are common to the laws of both Islands, which have been already noticed in our First Report, to which we beg leave to refer, and which it will be unnecessary now to recapitulate.

Some other suggestions, which have found no place in the preceding part of this Report, we will make here.

We submit that the penalty of confiscation ought no longer to be attached to conviction. It is very rarely indeed that the Crown would seriously lose by the change: but the more common effect is to make innocent parties suffer a loss, which presses heavily on poor persons, merely from the crime of a relation.

We think that some regulations should be framed for the admission of Advocates properly qualified; that the number should not be limited; and that the Court should have no discretion beyond that of judging of their qualifications.

We think that it would promote the advancement of justice if the Imperial Legislature were to frame a measure enabling the Courts of Guernsey to bring before them accused parties, and witnesses, from any part of Your Majesty's dominions.

If the accused be found guilty, he is amerced in costs: but, if he be acquitted, he receives none. This inequality ought, we think, to be put an end to.

The power of the Court as to offences committed at sea is undefined; and, as in the case of Jersey, it seems fit that the Imperial Legislature should settle the point.

The use of English is much less general in Guernsey than in Jersey. We were informed that the town population comprizes about two fifths of the whole inhabitants, and the country population the remainder. That in the town the use of English prevails as the language of business and ordinary intercourse, but that among the country population French is in general use, and English not understood, even by the members of the country Douzaines. On a late occasion, when one of the Deputies from the town Douzaine was proceeding to address the States in English, an objection was made by some of the Deputies from the country parishes, not only on the ground that French was the recognised language of the States, but also because they did not understand English. In Alderney and Sark, also, English is very little spoken. We may also add that the classification of offenders brought before the Royal Court in the ten years immediately preceding our inquiry shews that the number of the natives of the Channel Islands who have been subjected to the Criminal Law in Guernsey exceeds that of the English, Irish and Scotch. It is, however, probable that a few years will make a considerable difference with regard to the English language. We were informed that in the country parishes, among the rising generation, English is understood almost as well as French, and that instruction in it is common in the country parochial Schools. We think that it would be right to authorize the Court, at its discretion, and on the application of the counsel for the accused, to direct that the proceedings should be in English. This must, of course, precede the selection of the Jury.

The Court which tries should have the power to amend the Act of accusation in any matter not essential to the merits.

We recommend the total abolition of the Causes en Adjonction, on the grounds stated in our First Report. In this recommendation, we believe that we have the unanimous concurrence of the Bar. A civil and criminal proceeding should each be allowed separately, if a private or public wrong be committed.

A question was raised before us as to the right of the Governor to be present at the sittings of the Court au sécret. It arose out of certain proceedings of the Royal Court, of the 21st of November, 1845, on the present Lieutenant Governor claiming that right. The Court, after hearing the Law Officers of the Crown, came to the unanimous decision that "the Lieutenant Governor has no right to be present at the judicial secret sittings of the Court (aux séances judiciares dans le particulier de la Cour); such claim not being founded in right, and being contrary to the laws and customs established in the Island." We understood the claim to rest on the exercise of the right, as well as on a passage (p. 35.) in Warburton's "Treatise on the History, Laws and Customs of the Island of Guernsey," supported by an extract from a Commission of the 6th of Queen Elizabeth, which, in terms, orders "the presence of the Governor, at all Courts kept or holden within the Isle." We were informed that it was considered by the Court that the main body of the Commission was intended to be in force for three years only, and that the particular clause was intended to have a temporary effect. We had not sufficient materials before us to enable us to form a decided opinion on the subject: but it appears, from one of the petitions presented to the Commissioners in the reign of James the First, that, at that time, the Governor exercised the right of being present at the judicial sittings of the Court without dispute. The prayer of the petitioners is, that, "whensoever any cause shall be pleaded in Court, whereof under his Majesty's prerogative the Governor shall expect some profit, the said Governor and his Lieutenant be required to depart out of the Court, as long as their interest shall be pleaded, and until it be fully tried and judged, leaving the matter to the care and diligence of his Majesty's officers to be debated, and to the integrity of the justices to be decided." Assuming the right of the Governor to be present at the ordinary judicial sittings of the Court, we cannot understand on what principle he can be excluded from the preliminary investigation. Many circumstances might occur to render his presence desirable at the latter; while no reason presents itself for his presence when the functions of the Court are purely judicial. The point is not of great importance: but, as it has arisen, it is proper that it should be determined one way or the other.

We now proceed to describe the Criminal Tribunal of the Island of Alderney.

The Court in Alderney consists of a President, called the Judge, and six Jurats, two Crown Officers called, as in Guernsey, the Procureur and Contrôle, the Greffier and the Prévôt.

The Judge receives his appointment from Your Majesty. The six Jurats are elected for life by the rate-payers of the Island: if, from infirmity, they desire to resign, they apply to the States of Alderney, who transmit the application to the Royal Court of Guernsey, which decides upon it. The Procureur, Contrôle and Greffier also receive their appointments from the Crown. The Prevôt is an officer named by the States of the Island: he formerly held office for a year only; but, within the last four or five years, the Alderney Court of Chefs Plaids have passed an Ordonnance making the office perpetual. The Prévôté consists of twelve persons. These serve for twelve years, if they live so long: but, in case of death, the place is filled up. The twelve hold, in rotation, the office of Deputy Prévôt for one year.

There are also two Constables and two Deputy Constables, chosen by the Court. They are annual officers, the two who have been chosen as Deputy Constables for one year becoming Constables for the year following.

The Procureur has an annual salary of 40*l*. The Contrôle has no salary; and that office at present is not filled up, the Procureur being the only Advocate in the Island.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Alderney, in matters of a criminal nature, is confined to a preliminary investigation into the fact of crime. It may examine, and, if satisfied that the charge is without foundation, may dismiss the complaint; but it possesses no power of trial or punishment. When an offence is committed in Alderney, the party charged is apprehended by the Constable, and brought before the Judge and at least two Jurats. The witnesses are examined, and the interrogatoire of the prisoner taken by the Court. The examinations are then reduced to writing; and, if the Court is of opinion that there is sufficient evidence to put the prisoner on his trial, an Acte of Court is made referring the matter to the Royal Court in Guernsey. This mode of proceeding is provided by an Order in Council of the 21st of June, 1585, which directs that the Jurats of Alderney "shall refer Criminal Causes to the Royal Court as was always the custom." The prisoner is committed to the custody of the Prévôt of Alderney, whose duty it is to convey him to Guernsey. On the arrival of the Prévôt in Guernsey with his prisoner, he apprizes the Bailiff, and delivers to him or to one of the Law Officers of the Crown a copy of the Acte of the Alderney Court, together with copies of the examination of the witnesses and the interrogatoire of the accused. The Bailiff thereupon convenes a Cour Ordinaire, at which the interrogatoire and the depositions are examined: and, if the Court should think the offence of a nature to be tried, and the evidence, as taken by the Court in Alderney, sufficient, an order is made for the witnesses to be sent from Alderney on a particular day. On their arrival, they appear before the Cour du Quartier; and the proceedings are commenced from the beginning, exactly as if the offence had been committed in Guernsey.

As there is no prison in Alderney, the prisoner remains in the personal custody of the Prévôt until his committal for trial in Guernsey. This renders the office of Prévôt very onerous.

The Court of Alderney also has the power of making local Ordonnances, in the nature of police regulations, and for the repair and maintenance of the highways, obedience being enforced by a fine. The Ordonnances must be made either at a Court of Chefs Plaids or at a meeting of the States. These are constituted of the same members: but the States meet whenever there is occasion; the Chefs Plaids only twice in the year, on the first Monday after Michaelmas and the first Monday after the 15th of January. The body consists of the Judge, the six Jurats, the Crown Officers and the Douzaine, which last is a body of twelve elected by the rate-payers of the Island, for life, or until they obtain permission, for infirmity, to be discharged. The Governor also has the right of being present; and, when he cannot attend in person, he deputes some one who takes the oaths as Lieutenant Governor for the occasion.

The Constables in Alderney are mere Officers of Police, and have no place in the Court sitting in Chefs Plaids, nor in the States.

The Judge, and at least two Jurats and seven Douzeniers, with one of the Crown Officers, must be present to constitute the Court. The enacting power resides with the Jurats alone, the Bailiff, in case of an equality of numbers, giving a casting vote. The Crown Officers and the members of the Douzaine are, however, both consulted. The course is, upon a measure being proposed, for the Judge, first, to ask the opinions of the Crown Officers. After they have been heard, the opinion of the Douzaine is asked through the President, who is the senior member; after which the Jurats decide on the proposition, which thereupon becomes law, and is binding on the inhabitants of Alderney.

An appeal against its enactment lies to the Royal Court in Guernsey, which has power to annul an Ordonnance of the Court of Alderney. It is however contended, in Alderney, that the Guernsey Court has no power to make an Ordonnance binding on the inhabitants of Alderney, and that no one can be summoned before it for the breach of an Ordonnance made by the Court in Alderney, the jurisdiction of the Guernsey Court in such case being only appellate.

Besides the making of Ordonnances, the taxes for the relief of the poor are raised, and the value of the wheat rents for the year are fixed, at the Court of Chefs Plaids.

Great inconvenience is felt in Alderney from the want of power on the part of the Court to punish petty offences. At present this is met by giving the party accused the option of submitting to the Court instead of having his case remitted to Guernsey for the decision of the Royal Court there; in the event of his submission a small fine or short imprisonment is inflicted.

The population of Alderney at the last census, in 1841, amounted to 1030. We were informed that it has not been on the increase since then, and that the quiet and orderly habits of the natives give little cause for the exercise of summary jurisdiction by the Court. Since our return to England, however, a great augmentation of the population has taken place by the influx into the Island of workmen who are employed in the public works directed to be executed there. We have received a communication from Mr. Gaudion, the Judge of Alderney, pointing out the necessity of further powers being extended to the Court, in order to meet the altered state of the Island.

We think that this deserves attention. We suggest that a summary jurisdiction should be conferred on the Judge and two Jurats of Alderney, in cases of assault, breach of the peace, and disorderly conduct, with powers to punish by the infliction of a fine not exceeding twenty livres tournois, and imprisonment not exceeding twenty days. The Judge should have power to name a deputy; and the fine and imprisonment should, where it is thought fit, be both inflicted.

We further suggest that the Causes en Adjonction, which exist here, should be abolished.

And, further, that the authority of the Royal Court of Guernsey over the Island of Alderney should be defined by an Order of Council.

If our suggestion as to the legislation in Guernsey by the States of Deliberation be adopted, it seems fit that Alderney should be represented in that assembly. But the Alderney States should still, we think, retain the right of local taxation.

The Island of Sark was granted by letters patent, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, to Hilary De Carteret, Lord of St. Ouen's, in Jersey, to hold by the twentieth part of a knight's service. The inhabitants, soon after the grant, proceeded to elect from among themselves a Bailiff and twelve Jurats, in imitation of the Court in Jersey. This was regarded as an usurpation by Sir Thomas Leighton, the then Governor of Guernsey: and proceedings were taken in the Royal Court of Guernsey, in the year 1582, upon the information of the Procureur de la Reine, under which Edward de Carteret, the Bailiff elect of the Island, and two of the self-elected Jurats were imprisoned; and the Island was seized, in the name of the Queen, as forfeited by the usurpation. But afterwards an Order in Council was made, on the 24th of April, 1583, establishing five Jurats in Sark, to be chosen by the inhabitants, "the eldest of the said Jurats to give sentence as is used in Alderney," and "the Jurats to adopt pleas and use jurisdiction in Sark, in all cases, as is used in Alderney, and appeals likewise to be from Sark to Guernsey, as to the superior Justice, in all causes as is used in Alderney." The same Order appoints a Greffier, and also a Prévôt to plead the Queen's causes as Procureur, and to arrest as Prévôt, and to adjourn (that is, to summon) and distrain as Serjeant; and a Constable and Vingtenier to be chosen by the inhabitants of the Island, and there to execute their offices in like manner as the like officers in Alderney.

The jurisdiction of the Court, so constituted in obedience to the Order, in criminal matters, was thus defined by the Governor and members and officers of the Royal Court, Guernsey. "Jugeront les susdits Jurez," "de toutes matières et actions de Forfaite, Excez, et Injures, par emprisonnements, ou amendes n'excédant la somme de soixante sols et un denier Tournois, pourvu qu'il n'y ait matière de crimes, auxquels cas les dits Jurez seront tenus envoyer, par le Prévôt de la dite Isle, leurs corps avec la cause, à la Justice de Sa Majesté en la dite Isle de Guernesey, pour y procéder, comme sera expédient."

The Jurats were also authorized to assemble about the next Wednesday after the 29th of September, the next Wednesday after the 15th of January, and the next Wednesday after Easter day, in every year, to hold their Chefs Plaids The power of making Ordonnances is given them in the following terms. "Les dits Jurez et Officiers, par le consent du Seigneur de la dite Isle et de la généralité des habitants, feront telles Ordonnances qu'ils trouveront expédients et nécessaires de tems en tems pour le réglement de la Police de la dite Isle."

This jurisdiction continued in the Jurats of Sark till the year 1672, when the Jurats were displaced by an Order in Council, in consequence of their refusal to take the Oath of Supremacy. It was thereupon ordered that the Royal Court of Guernsey should name a Seneschal. But a subsequent Order in Council, of the 19th of May, 1675, directed that the Lord of Sark should name the Seneschal and the other officers of Justice there, who should take the oath before the Royal Court, at Guernsey. This course has since continued to be followed.

At present the Court at Sark consists of the Seneschal or his Deputy, who is the Judge of the Court; the Prévôt, who acts in the threefold character of Procureur, Serjeant and Prévôt; and the Greffier. These Officers are all appointed by the Lord, and sworn in before the Royal Court in Guernsey.

The Seneschal of Sark has complete jurisdiction in the case of petty offences, having the power of punishing by way of fine to the amount of three livres tournois, and by imprisonment to the extent of three times twenty four hours. In all cases which require a severer punishment, he is bound to send the case before the Royal Court in Guernsey.

The Island is divided into forty tenements held of the Lord, which, by letters patent of the 9th of James the First, were made incapable of partition. The holders of the forty tenements, with the Lord, the Seneschal, the Prévôt and the Greffier, now constitute the Court of Chefs Plaids in Sark. The Lord must be present in person, or by some one authorized to appear for him. The Seneschal or his Deputy presides. No one has a vote at the Chefs Plaids who is not a tenant.

Ordonnances are passed there for roads; and rates are imposed for the maintenance of the poor and other purposes of local taxation and police. After the project has been discussed and adopted by the votes of the majority of the tenants, the Seneschal requests the assent of the Lord to its enactment. If it is given, the Ordonnance is registered, and has immediately the force of law. If, on the contrary, the Lord withholds his consent, no registration takes place; but the majority of the tenants may appeal to the Royal Court of Guernsey, who claim the right of compelling the registration of the Ordonnance, and thus giving it the force of law. There seems reason for doubting whether this power resides in the Royal Court; as it is denied that the Royal Court sitting in Chefs Plaids can make an Ordonnance to bind the inhabitants of Sark. It is, however, not disputed that it possesses the power of reviewing Ordonnances made by the Court of Sark, and annulling those which are contrary to a known superior law.

The Chefs Plaids also appoint two police officers, namely a constable and a vingtenier. Each office is held for a year, the vingtenier of one year becoming the constable of the year following.

The population of the Island at the last census, 1841, was 790. It was represented to us as being less now, by about one hundred. In summer, there is a daily intercourse between Sark and Guernsey; and, in winter, at least once a week.

Crime, of any kind, is extremely rare in the Island. We were informed that there had not been a criminal case before the Court for the two years preceding our Inquiry.

The Causes en Adjonction exist here also; and here, as in the other Islands, we recommend their abolition.

We think that it would be expedient to settle, by an Order in Council, the exact limits of the authority of the Royal Court of Guernsey over the Island of Sark.

And, as in the case of Alderney, it appears fit to consider whether Sark ought not to be represented in the Guernsey States of Deliberation, should the proposed transfer of the power of legislation to that Assembly take effect. The right to impose local taxes should still, we think, remain with the Chefs Plaids in Sark.

At the conclusion of this Report, we must avow that we entertain little expectation that the suggestions, which we have felt ourselves bound to offer, will be received with anything like a general acquiescence by the inhabitants of Guernsey and its dependencies. We, therefore, venture to advise that the changes which we recommend be not carried into effect until our recommendations shall have become generally known, and until full time and opportunity shall have been offered for making such objections as the inhabitants may think proper to submit to your Majesty. We urge this, not merely in consideration of their strong and constant attachment to the Crown, but also because it is important to know how far the reasons which we have assigned for changes can be either wholly impugned or materially qualified, and because, even where this cannot be done, any dislike to a change, entertained by those who are to be affected by it, must, as a fact in itself, and without reference to its justice or injustice, be an important element in the determination of the course to be pursued. We are convinced that, in many instances, the repugnance to the adoption of our recommendations will be found to be much stronger than could be inferred from the evidence given before us. It is not likely to be lessened by the circumstance that the recommendations come from persons educated in a system so essentially differing from that on which they are required to pronounce an opinion.

If it should be thought right, in compliance with such a feeling of dislike, to preserve more of the ancient system than would be left by the alterations which we have proposed, it appears to us that this may be best done by allowing some Jurats to sit jointly, both with the Judge who tries the causes, and with the Court of Three. We, of course, think that such a modification would render the change less useful; but it may render it more acceptable.

GUERNSEY.

It very seldom happens that institutions can be so modelled as fully to carry sound general principles into effect, and at the same time to satisfy entirely those who are the subjects of the institutions. When the incompatibility becomes very great in the particular case, the governing power has before it a problem than which there are few more difficult or more important. All that can be done is to approximate to its solution, by determining how far one of these conflicting considerations is to controul the other. Our duty here is simply to offer such materials as our inquiries have enabled us, after long and anxious deliberation, to collect and arrange: and we now humbly leave them in your Majesty's hands.

Sir,

I am directed by the Commissioners for inquiring into the Criminal Laws of the Channel Islands, to send you a copy of their Commission, from which you will learn, generally, the objects of the Commission, and the proposed subjects of inquiry.

I am further directed to inform you that it is the intention of the Commissioners to visit the Channel Islands at a future stage of the inquiry. Before doing so, they wish to be put in possession of information as full and accurate as can be obtained by written communications. They propose, therefore, to forward to those most likely to be conversant with the Criminal Law of the Channel Islands a series of questions. The first set of the series accompanies this communication; and the remainder will be sent with as little delay as possible.

I have to request your earliest attention to the questions now sent, especially as the Commissioners hope that the information furnished to them in answer to each set of questions will materially assist them in framing those which are to follow. You will perceive, therefore, that the value of any assistance you may afford to the Commissioners will be much increased by their receiving it early.

I have to request that you will be so good as to send your answers to me to the above address.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient humble Servant,

Charles Clark,

Secretary to the Commission.

QUESTIONS PROPOSED BY THE COMMISSIONERS.

Series No 1.

Series No. 1

1. Will you state what opportunities you have had of becoming acquainted with the criminal law of ?

2. What tribunals exercise criminal jurisdiction in that island? How has their jurisdiction originated, and over what offences does it extend?

3. What are the authorities principally relied upon in the discussion of questions arising upon the criminal law?

4. When it is suspected that a party has committed an offence, what is the step first taken for the purpose of bringing him to justice?

5. Does the Court or officer before whom the accused is brought, in any, and, if so, in what cases, exercise a summary jurisdiction?

6. Where there is no exercise of summary jurisdiction, what preliminary proceedings take place before the accused party is put upon his trial? What steps are taken for securing his appearance before the Court which ultimately takes cognizance of the offence?

7. Where the jurisdiction is not of a summary kind, before what Court is he tried? How is the Court constituted? Are the functionaries who have sent the party to trial capable of acting as members of such Court?

8. By whom are the proceedings against the accused party instituted? What power has any functionary, at any and what stages, of causing the proceedings to be abandoned? What effect has such an abandonment upon future accusations?

9. At what stage, if any, is the charge against the party accused put into a definite form, written or otherwise? How far is it competent to the accuser to vary the form or substance of the charge? And, if at all, at what stage or stages may this be done? And, when this is done, what power has the party accused of remodelling or otherwise improving his defence?

10. What is the form of proceeding, if the party charged admits the facts alleged against him, but denies their relevancy to support the charge?

11. What is the form of proceeding, if the party charged simply denies the facts alleged against him?

12. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, is he thereby concluded as to the facts?

13. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the facts, is he thereby concluded as to their relevancy?

14. Is the party charged entitled to the assistance of counsel and other legal advisers? If so, of how many? By whom are the advisers selected? Where the party accused is unable to defray the expenses of legal assistance, has he any and what means of obtaining it?

15. What means has either the accusing or accused party of compelling the production of evidence, oral or documentary, at any and what stages of the proceedings?

16. At what stage in the above series of proceedings is evidence first received? And in what mode and in whose presence is it taken?

17. When is the party accused allowed to hear the evidence produced against him?

18. When is the party accused allowed to produce evidence to meet the evidence produced against him?

19. When, and to what extent, respectively, is the party accused allowed to question the witnesses produced against him?

20. Is there any and what stage, earlier than the actual judgment, after which fresh evidence may not be produced, either for or against the party accused?

21. How much of the evidence received at the respective stages of the proceeding is taken down in writing?

22. How is the evidence which is taken down in writing afterwards used? Is it allowable, either against or on behalf of the accused party, to give proof that the written evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to? If there are any distinctions in this respect between evidence taken at one stage of the proceedings and evidence taken at another, be pleased to point them out.

23. What are the privileges of the counsel of the party charged, as to being heard on questions of fact or law, and examining witnesses?

24. Has the party accusing or the party accused the privilege of being heard first?

25. What are the functionaries deciding the law, and what the functionaries deciding the fact?

26. By whom is judgment awarded?

27. Has the Court the power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings at any and what stages, and for what cause or causes?

28. Be pleased to detail, as circumstantially as possible, the incidents to accusation and trial, so far as they may not have been brought forward by the answers to the preceding questions.

29. What power of appeal has either the accusing or accused party in any and what forms of criminal proceeding? If any, be pleased to detail the incidents to bringing and deciding upon the appeal, following, as nearly as possible, the course indicated by the preceding questions.

30. If judgment be finally against the accused party, what are the steps taken to carry it into effect?

31. Be pleased, as far as it is in your power, to furnish the Commissioners with the forms used at the various steps of the proceedings which are the subject of the preceding questions: and state the oaths, if any, taken by the witnesses and the members of the Court respectively.

32. What are the modes of appointing the several functionaries mentioned in the answers to the above questions? For what length of time do they officiate? How, if at all, are they removable?

33. You are requested to give any information, not already disclosed by the answers to the preceding questions, respecting the criminal law of , which may appear to you important for the purposes of the commission.

34. You are requested to point out any defects which appear to you to exist in the present system, and to suggest such improvements as may occur to you.

Series No. 2.

1. Is there any and what age before which a person is not considered responsible to the criminal law? Is there any distinction in this respect between different offences?

2. What course is pursued if, at any stage of a criminal proceeding, it appears that the party charged was of unsound mind at the time of the offence? What is considered to be the test of such unsoundness of mind as to prevent a party from being responsible to the criminal law?

3. Are there any and what cases in which a married woman is considered not to be responsible to the criminal law?

4. Is there any case in which a party, otherwise responsible to the criminal law, is relieved from such responsibility by having acted under the control of another party?

5. When a party is charged with an offence, what is the result if it appear that he was

(1) Not the actual perpetrator, but present at the time of the offence, and assisting the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching, or otherwise?

(2) Not present, but that he instigated or assisted, by counsel or otherwise, the actual perpetrator, before the time of the perpetration?

(3) Not present, but that he, after the perpetration, assisted, by counsel or otherwise, the actual perpetrator

(firstly) in attaining the end aimed at (as, for instance, by disposing of property stolen) by the actual perpetrator?

6. In the several cases supposed in the last question, can the party so instigating or assisting, be charged with the principal offence? Is he in any, and what, cases chargeable with a specific crime as a participator in the perpetration of the principal offence?

7. In the several cases above suggested, can the party participating be charged alone, or must he be charged together with the actual perpetrator? If he can be charged alone, is it necessary that the actual perpetrator should have been convicted previously?

8. Is there any and what distinction, in this respect, as to different offences?

9. In the cases severally contemplated in the fourth and following questions, what is considered to be legally the limit of actual or constructive presence?

10. Can more than one person be charged in a single prosecution? If so, what takes place if that which is charged as a joint offence is proved to have been an offence in which one of the accused parties did not participate?

11. May different offences be charged in a single prosecution against the same party? If so, may an offence committed by the party alone be charged in the same prosecution with one committed by him jointly with another person?

Questions.

12. Is there any, and what, limitation as to the time, reckoned from the commission of an offence, within which a prosecution must be instituted? Is there any, and what, distinction in this respect, between different offences?

13. In what place or places must an offence have been committed in order to subject the offender to a prosecution by the criminal law of ?

14. Is there any, and what, distinction, with respect to apprehension, trial, or punishment, or any of the incidents thereto respectively, between offences committed in different places within the territory subject to the criminal law of ?

15. Does the law of recognise any classification of offences with respect either to the punishment to which they subject offenders, or the incidents of procedure and trial? If so, what is the technical nomenclature by which the different classes are respectively designated.

Series No. 3.

Series No. 3.

1. When a witness is produced against or for a party charged with an offence, must the evidence be given by the witness in the presence and hearing of the prosecutor and accused party, and of the tribunal which has to decide on the charge? Is there any and what difference made, in this respect, at different stages of the proceedings?

2. Is the evidence of such a witness given in writing, either by way of statement or in answer to written interrogatories, or orally, on questions put to him at the time on the part of the prosecution and of the party charged? Is there any, and what, difference made in this respect at different stages of the proceedings?

3. Is it required by the law of that all evidence relating to a criminal charge shall be given under sanction of the oath of the witness? Is there any, and what difference made in this respect at different stages of the proceedings?

4. Is there any, and if so what, age before which a person cannot give evidence?

5. Can a person be excluded from giving evidence, for or against a party charged with an offence, on the ground of want of religious belief?

6. Does conviction of any, and if so of what, crimes render a person incompetent as a witness for or against a party charged with an offence?

7. If so, can the competency of such person as a witness be in any, and if so in what, manner restored?

8. Is a party charged with an offence, capable of being a witness either for or against another party charged with the same offence?

9. If so, is it in the discretion of the Court, to direct whether a party so charged, should or should not be permitted to give evidence for or against another party charged with the same offence?

10. If such evidence is admitted, is it necessary that the testimony of such a witness should be confirmed by extrinsic evidence, and if so, to what extent?

11. What effect has marriage upon the admissibility of the husband or wife, as a witness where either of them is charged with an offence? Can the husband under any, and if so what, circumstances, be a witness for or against the wife, or the wife for or against the husband?

12. Does any incompetency arise from the affinity or consanguinity of the witness with the accuser or the party charged? If so, to what degrees of affinity or consanguinity does it extend?

13. Is it competent to the prosecutor or to the Court at any, and if so at what, stage of the proceedings to question the party charged, touching the offence with which he is charged, or in explanation of the evidence given by any of the witnesses produced in support of the charge or for the defence?

14. Are the statements of the party charged, or his conversations with third persons before or after he has been charged with the offence, admissible in evidence either for or against him?

15. If such statements have been made by the party charged, under the influence of a promise or threat, does this render them inadmissible in evidence?

16. Is the confession of a party charged with an offence conclusive evidence of his guilt? Or is he, notwithstanding such confession, permitted on his trial to adduce evidence in proof of his innocence?

17. Is the examination of a witness, whether against or in favour of the party accused, confined to those facts which the witness knows of his own knowledge? Or may he be examined as to what he has learned touching the matter in dispute from declarations, written or oral, of third parties? Is there any, and if so what, rule in this respect, peculiar to the case of a person, who, at the time of his making a declaration, believes himself to be dying?

18. Will a witness be permitted to state in evidence the contents of a written document without producing it, or showing to the satisfaction of the Court that it has been lost or destroyed, or otherwise accounting for its non-production?

19. If either the accuser or the accused seeks to give evidence of the contents of a written document which is in the hands of the opposite party, can the party in whose possession it is, be compelled to produce it? If so, by what means? If not, does his refusal to produce it authorize the introduction of other evidence of the contents? If so, what are the rules of practice by which the fact of refusal is established?

20. What proof is required of the execution of any written instrument? When there are attesting witnesses to the execution of the instrument, must all or any of them be produced? In case of the death of all or any of the attesting witnesses, is proof of their hand-writing required? Does the age of the instrument make any, and if so what, difference in the mode of proof? Is there any, and if so what, period after which execution of the instrument is presumed without proof?

21. Are there any, and if so what, rules peculiar to the proof of acts of Courts of Justice, or of other bodies or persons acting in the execution of any specific authority?

22. Can evidence of the character of the party accused be given for or against him? If so, at what stage of the proceedings? May such evidence be contradicted? Can evidence of particular acts of good or bad conduct be given in proof of character?

23. Can a witness refuse to answer a question put to him on the ground that the answer may subject him to criminal liability? Or that it may subject him to civil liability? Or that it may discredit him?

24. Can evidence be given of the bad or good character of a witness? If so, is such evidence confined to general reputation, or may it introduce particular facts? To what extent is such evidence, if given, allowed to be met by opposite evidence?

25. Can a witness be asked, with a view of impeaching his present evidence, what he has formerly said? If so, can evidence be given to contradict his answer?

26. Are there any general rules as to the number of witnesses necessary for the establishment of a particular fact?

27. Are witnesses paid for the expense to which the inquiry has put them? Or for their time? If so, from what fund?

ANSWERS TO THE FIRST SERIES OF QUESTIONS.

The Answers of Peter Stafford Carey, Esq., Bailiff of the Island of Guernsey, to the First Series of Questions.

I. Twelve months ago I left the English bar to take upon myself the office of Bailiff of this Island: to which I had been appointed by Her Majesty, and I have since been engaged in the discharge of my official duties.

II. All criminal jurisdiction in this Island is exercised, and, from the earliest ages of which we have any authentic account, has been exercised, by the Royal Court. Which, in ancient documents, is styled in Latin, Curia Regis; in French, "La Cour de nostre Seigneur le Roy."

The Royal Court consists of the Bailiff and twelve Jurats, and is supposed to have assumed its present form in the time of King John.

Its jurisdiction extends over offences of all kinds, except treason, coining and laying violent hands on the Bailiff or a Jurat in the execution of his duty.

In the excepted cases above enumerated, the Royal Court has cognizance of the offence, but has not the power of awarding the punishment. The evidence is taken, the Court decides whether the accused is Guilty or Not guilty: and, if Guilty, the case is remitted for judgment to the Sovereign in Council.

So far as regards criminal matters, the Royal Court may be considered as comprehending within itself two distinct tribunals, standing to one another in the same relation as the police court and the assize court in England.

In whatever capacity the Court sits, the Bailiff presides. It is however to be understood that he has the power of appointing a deputy—the Lieutenant Bailiff, who, in the absence of the Bailiff, occupies his place, and is invested with all his powers.

The Lieutenant Bailiff has always been selected from among the Jurats; and, in the presence of the Bailiff, his power as Lieutenant Bailiff is entirely suspended, and he acts merely as Jurat.

The business of the Bailiff is to conduct the proceedings, to lay the case before the Jurats, and to take their opinions. If the Jurats are equally divided, the Bailiff has a vote, but not otherwise.

The ordinary and less solemn business of the Royal Court is transacted before what is called "La Cour ordinaire."

This Court consists of the Bailiff and at least two Jurats.

In order to provide for due and regular attendance on this Court, the twelve Jurats make the following arrangements. The year being divided into three terms, they distribute themselves into three divisions, so that there are four Jurats especially belonging to each division of the year, or quarter, as it is somewhat inaccurately termed. And from this circumstance the Cour ordinaire is very frequently called "La Cour du Quartier."

Though two Jurats are sufficient to constitute the Cour ordinaire, it more frequently happens that three or four are present.

One of the functions of the Cour ordinaire is to act as a court of police; and for this especial purpose the Cour ordinaire sits every Thursday.

The more solemn judicial business of the Royal Court is reserved for the full Court, "La Cour en corps." It is not however necessary that all the twelve Jurats should be present. Seven form a quorum.

This is the Court by which all indictable offences are tried.

This Court sits on the Saturday during certain periods of the year. And, even during the time when the Courts are said to be shut, if there is a prisoner in gaol, it is usual for the Court, at his request, to assemble to try the case.

The two tribunals, therefore, which (as far as criminal jurisdiction is concerned) the Royal Court may be considered to comprehend within itself, are—

1. La Cour ordinaire, sitting as a Police Court.
2. La Cour en corps, sitting as a Court for the trial of indictable offences.

The first of these Courts, consisting of the Bailiff and at least two Jurats; the other, of the Bailiff, and from seven to twelve Jurats.

It is right to add, that the Royal Court is assisted by the Crown Officers, i. e. the Procureur and the Controller. The duty of the Crown officers is similar to that of the Avocats Généraux in France, before the Revolution. In the Cour en corps the crown officers are constituent members of the Court. The Court cannot be opened unless one of them at least is present. In criminal proceedings no act of Court can be passed in their absence, nor any judgment of the Court awarded until they have given the Court their advice—leurs conclusions. A sentence would be irregular if it did not appear that the Crown officers had been heard: hence the usual form, "Ouies les conclusions des officiers de la Reine."

In the Cour ordinaire sitting as a court of police, the Court cannot proceed to pronounce summarily without having heard the conclusions of the Crown officers. Where the accused party is to be committed for trial, the practice is for the Crown officers to be present; and, in point of fact, they take an active part in the proceedings, and offer their advice to the Court as in other cases. But it would appear that their so doing is not essential to the validity of the proceedings. And in the act of Court no mention is made of their conclusions having been heard.

III. The authorities principally relied upon, in the discussion of questions arising upon the Criminal Law, are—

1. "Terrien's Commentaries." This work is in itself nothing more than a treatise on the ancient customary law of Normandy; it is, however, to this Island something more than a text book, so much of it as is confirmed by the "Approbation" having the force of law.

2. "Les Remarques de M. Le Marchant sur l'Approbation des Loix;" which may be considered as a commentary on the text of Terrien, so far as it is applicable to this Island.

3. The ancient criminal procedure of Normandy, as we find it in Terrien, being very similar to the procedure used in France down to the time of the Revolution, on this subject, the old French authorities are referred to, particularly Pothier, "Traité de la Procédure Criminelle;" and, occasionally, Jousse, "Traité de la Justice Criminelle;" De la Combe, "Traité des Matières Criminelles," etc.

4. In questions relating to criminality and the nature of offences, the English text writers are chiefly relied on, particularly Russell and Archbold.

IV. When it is suspected that any one has committed an offence, the first step taken is for the constable either to take him into custody, or to warn, that is, to summon him to appear in Court.

If the constable takes him into custody, it is his duty to report it to the Bailiff and the Crown officers. The Bailiff, after consulting the Crown officers, if necessary, directs whether the accused shall be kept in custody till the next sitting of the Cour ordinaire or not.

If not, the accused is set at large and required to appear in Court.

There is, at this stage of the proceedings, no power to take bail. The accused cannot be let out on bail except by the authority of the Court.

V. The accused is brought before the Cour ordinaire.

This court exercises a summary jurisdiction over cases of assault, breach of the peace, disorderly conduct, disputes between masters and apprentices, and a variety of minor offences, including petty thefts.

The utmost punishment this Court can award is imprisonment for one month; the whole, or any portion of which, may be in solitary confinement, and on bread and water.

This Court has also jurisdiction, in case of the breach of any ordinance of the Royal Court, where the penalty imposed by the ordinance is a fine not exceeding thirty livres tournois.

VI. Where there is no exercise of summary jurisdiction, a preliminary investigation takes place before the Cour ordinaire. The investigation is in private. The witnesses, including those summoned on the part of the accused, are called in one by one, and examined separately on oath. The Crown officers are present during the examination, and, after having heard the witnesses, they prepare the draft of an indictment, or acte d'accusation, according to the facts deposed to. The accused is then called in; the indictment is read over to him; and, after being warned that he is not obliged to answer unless he chooses and that whatever he says will be produced on the trial, he is interrogated by the Court. The questions put to him and his answers thereto are severally taken down by the Greffier. The first question put to him is, whether he is "Guilty" or "Not guilty." After this he is interrogated upon the facts that have been spoken to by the witnesses.

He is also at liberty to make any further statement that he pleases. It may readily be supposed that, if he has in fact committed the offence, any statement he may make will be likely to criminate him. But, on the other hand, if he is innocent and has a true story to tell, his story, so told in answer to the inquiries of the Court, without his having heard the evidence against him, cannot fail to have great weight: this gives a great, and certainly not an undue, advantage to an innocent man, and is of particular importance to him, where the story he has to tell, as is not unfrequently the case, happens to be otherwise incapable of proof. Besides which, if it comes out from his statement that there are other persons who have any evidence to give, they are immediately sent for by the Court. I feel the more called upon to offer these observations, as the practice of interrogating the accused is one which, as an English lawyer, I was, on undertaking my present office, nowise prejudiced in favour of.

The interrogatory being concluded the public are admitted. The practice is for the Crown officers to offer their opinion to the Court with respect to the course to be pursued. The Court thereupon pronounces its decision, following in general, but not necessarily, the suggestions of the Crown officers. If there appears to be sufficient ground to put the accused on his trial, the sentence of the Court is, in effect, that the Crown officers do proceed against him, and that he be committed to prison. If the Court deems it to be a bailable case, the sentence of the Court fixes the amount of the bail. And, where the charge brought against the accused is not a serious one, the Court is content to take his "Caution Juratoire;" that is to say, he is not required to go to prison, provided he will undertake on oath to appear in Court to answer the accusation. The sentence of the Court is reduced into an Act and entered on Record.

If there is no sufficient evidence to warrant a trial, the accused is dismissed. In this case there is no Act of Court, no record made of the proceeding.

I may here add, in anticipation of the 27th question, that, until the interrogatory of the accused has been taken, the Court has the power, without any act of Court being entered of record, to adjourn the proceedings to a subsequent day, the accused being still retained, if necessary, in the custody of the constable.

The place in which the constables detain the persons who are in their custody is within the walls of the prison, but is nowise under the control of the gaoler.

After the interrogatory has been taken, the mode of adjournment is altogether different.

There must then be an Act of Court, whereby, unless admitted to bail, the accused is committed to prison in order that further information may be obtained.

VII. Where the jurisdiction is not of a summary kind, the trial takes place before the Cour en Corps, consisting of the Bailiff and from seven to twelve Jurats assisted by the Crown officers. The functionaries who sent the party to trial are capable of acting, and very generally do act, as members of that Court; and, in particular, it is the business of the Bailiff, after having presided at the committal, to preside also at the trial.

VIII. The charge having been brought before the Court by the constable, and the Court having ordered a prosecution, the proceedings are instituted and carried on by the Crown officers, and in their name.

The Crown officers have no power of causing the proceedings to be abandoned. They cannot take any step analogous to the entering of a "Nolle prosequi."

But I apprehend that the Court has the power, on the application of the Crown officers, to cause the proceedings to be abandoned. Where proceedings are ordered to be abandoned on grounds affecting the merits of the case, I apprehend that the Court would not authorize the institution of a second accusation for the same offence. Where the proceedings are allowed to be abandoned on the ground of their being irregular, the original charge may be prosecuted in an amended form.

IX. The charge against the party accused is put into a definite form, in writing, before his interrogatory is taken. After this it is not competent to the Crown officers to vary the charge either in form or substance. If any alteration is requisite, the course is for the Crown officers to apply to the Court, before the trial comes on, for leave to abandon the proceedings in order to commence afresh. The original indictment being thus set aside, an amended indictment may be framed: and upon this fresh indictment the interrogatory must be taken anew, the party charged being at liberty to model his defence as he thinks fit. On some occasions, however, the Court, on the application of the Crown lawyers and after calling on the prisoner to shew cause, has, in matters not material to the merits of the case, allowed amendments to be made in the charge.

X. XI. The same functionaries are the judges both of law and fact; and, whatever may be the nature of the defence set up by the party charged, the mode of proceeding is the same. The only difference will be in the line of argument adopted by his advocate.

XII. XIII. There is no reason why the party charged should confine himself to one line of defence to the exclusion of any other.

For instance, in a recent case where a public officer was accused of embezzlement, Péculat, his advocate argued—

1°. That by the law of the Island Péculat was not an indictable offence.

2°. That the indictment was bad, the technical term Péculat not being employed.

3°. That the facts alleged were not proved.

XIV. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of one advocate, selected by himself; and this, whether he is or is not able to defray the expense of legal assistance.

On the first Criminal Court day after he is committed for trial (unless some earlier day is fixed by the Court), the party charged is produced in Court; and there, the indictment being read over to him, he pleads "Guilty," or "Not Guilty," and makes choice of his advocate.

Occasionally the party charged has been allowed to obtain the assistance of a second advocate. But one only is allowed to address the Court.

XV. The witnesses required at the preliminary investigation before the Cour ordinaire, whether for the prosecution or for the defence, are summoned by the constable.

The witnesses required on the trial, whether for the prosecution or for the defence, are summoned by the Crown officers.

In either case a witness may be required to produce documentary evidence.

If a witness does not obey the summons, he is liable to fine or imprisonment, as for a contempt.

No payment is made to witnesses in respect of their attendance at the investigation before the Cour ordinaire.

The witnesses summoned on the trial, whether for the prosecution or for the defence, are paid by the Crown.

It is to be observed, however, that, if the party charged is convicted, he is sentenced to pay costs.

XVI. With respect to the stage in the above series of proceedings at which evidence is first received, it will be seen, from my answer to the 6th question, that, at the very commencement of the proceedings, when the charge made by the constable is gone into before the "Cour ordinaire," the witnesses are heard, on oath, vivâ voce, in presence of the Court, the Crown officers, and the Greffier.

It has of late years become the practice to allow some other officers of the Court to be present at the private investigation: but they have no functions to perform there; and I think it would be better if the practice were discontinued.

Before I proceed to answer the questions next in order, it may be well to observe that there are two kinds of trial.

The one is denominated by Terrien, "Le Procès Extraordinaire."

The other, "Le Procès Ordinaire."

At the present day, the former (Le Procès Extraordinaire) is more usually designated as a proceeding "Au grand Criminel."

The latter (Le procès ordinaire) is more usually designated as a proceeding "Au Criminel" simply, or sometimes, to make the contradistinction more marked, "Au petit Criminel."

I shall have occasion to point out hereafter the cases to which each of these kinds of trial

GUERNSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

P. S. Carey, Esq., Bailiff.

more particularly applies: at present it is enough to state that the proceeding Au grand Criminel is deemed the more solemn, and reserved for the more serious offences.

The party accused having pleaded to the indictment and chosen his counsel, a day is fixed for taking the evidence on the part of the prosecution.

The evidence is taken before the Cour ordinaire, sitting in private. The witnesses are introduced one by one, sworn and examined. Every question and answer is separately taken down by the Greffier. Twelve witnesses only are allowed.

The witnesses having been heard and their evidence taken down, they are on a subsequent day summoned again before the Cour ordinaire (sitting in private as before), for the "Récolement." Each of them severally has his evidence read over to him, and is asked whether he has anything to add or to alter.

His answer is taken down, and added to the evidence previously taken.

The next step is the "Confrontation." The witnesses and the accused are warned to attend. The summons given to the accused contains a list of the witnesses with whom he is to be confronted. Before the confrontation he is entitled to a copy of the evidence. At the confrontation, the accused being in Court together with his advocate, the witnesses are called in one by one. The evidence of each is, in his presence, read over to the accused. Thereupon the witness is cross-examined; and the cross-examination is taken down by the Greffier in the same manner as the examination in chief.

The confrontation being over, the accused party states whether he wishes to have any witnesses called for the defence. If he wishes to have witnesses called, he must state what facts they are to prove, and must give the names of the witnesses. If the facts offered to be proved are deemed irrelevant, the Court does not allow the examination of witnesses. If the facts are deemed relevant, the witnesses named by the accused, not exceeding twelve in number, are summoned by the Crown officers.

On the day for which they are summoned, their evidence is taken down in writing in the same manner as the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution.

They are examined by the counsel for the accused, and cross-examined by the Crown officers.

The evidence being now completely taken, and copies of it having been given both to the Crown officers and the counsel for the accused, the next step is to produce it before the Court on the trial. This takes place in open Court before the Cour en Corps. The interrogatory of the accused and the depositions of the witnesses are read over. The whole of the evidence being thus gone through, the counsel for the accused addresses the Court. And it is to be observed that he has to enter upon the defence without the case having been in any way opened by the Crown officers, so that he has not heard what are the points mainly relied on in support of the accusation.

After the defence, the Crown officers are heard. Their business is to state the result of the evidence, to advise the Court on matters of law, and to suggest the sentence which they deem to be suited to the case. The Bailiff then sums up the case, and collects the opinions of the Jurats: the opinion of the majority constitutes the sentence of the Court.

I now come to the other mode of proceeding, the "Procès Ordinaire" of Terrien, the proceeding "Au Criminel," as it is now usually termed.

It will be observed that, down to the time when the accused chooses his Counsel, in whichever way he is to be tried, the mode of proceeding is precisely the same.

If he is to be tried au criminel, in the ordinary way, the trial takes place in open Court, before the Cour en Corps, on the first Criminal Court day after the accused has chosen his counsel. The witnesses both for the prosecution and the defence are summoned by the Crown officers. Not more than twelve witnesses can be tendered on each side.

All the witnesses on each side being called, évoqués, appear together at the bar.

Any objection to the admissibility of witnesses is now to be taken. Among others, it is a sufficient objection that a witness comes forward without having been summoned.

The Court having disposed of the objections to admissibility, the oath is administered by the Bailiff to the whole array of witnesses admitted to give evidence, on either side.

The interrogatory of the accused is then read by the Procureur. After this the witnesses are heard; the witnesses for the prosecution first, and afterwards those for the defence, each witness being subject to cross-examination.

From this point, the proceedings are carried on as "au grand criminel." The counsel for the accused is heard first; and then the Crown officers give their conclusions; after which the Court proceeds to award judgment.

I now return to the questions, and proceed to answer them in numerical order.

1st. As they affect the proceeding "au grand criminel."

2nd. As they affect the ordinary proceeding "au criminel."

1. As to the proceeding au grand criminel:—

Applying the 16th question to the evidence taken subsequently to the committal. Evidence is first received after the prisoner has pleaded and chosen his counsel. It is taken down by the Greffier in the shape of question and answer before the Cour ordinaire sitting in private.

XVII. The party accused is allowed at the confrontation to hear the evidence which has been taken against him, having before the confrontation received a copy of it.

XVIII. The confrontation being completed, the accused names his witnesses, who are summoned for a subsequent day by the Crown officers.

XIX. At the confrontation, as the evidence of each witness respectively is read, the accused party is allowed to question that witness to any extent.

XX. Fresh evidence for the prosecution cannot be taken after the confrontation; consequently there can be no evidence in reply. After the party accused has given in his list of witnesses, he is precluded from calling for any further evidence.

XXI. The whole of the evidence is taken down in writing.

XXII. The whole of the evidence, so taken down in writing, is at the trial produced before the Cour en Corps. No further proof of any kind can be admitted. No question can be made before the Cour en Corps of the accuracy of the depositions. But, at the confrontation, when the evidence of each witness is read over in his presence, the advocate for the accused party has an opportunity of cross-examining the witness, to ascertain whether his evidence had been accurately taken.

XXIII. The counsel of the party charged has the privilege of being heard on all questions of fact or law, of cross-examining at the confrontation the witnesses for the prosecution, and afterwards of examining the witnesses for the defence.

I now proceed to answer the foregoing questions, as applied to the ordinary proceedings au criminel.

XVI. a. To apply the sixteenth question to evidence taken subsequent to commitment, —The whole of the evidence is received at the trial, where it is taken vivâ voce in open Court before the Cour en Corps.

XVII. a. The party accused is at the bar of the Court, and hears the evidence as it is given.

It is to be observed, however, that the party accused does not know what evidence the witnesses gave in the preliminary examination, or Enquête, as it is termed.

XVIII. a. The party accused is allowed to produce evidence at the trial, and his witnesses are heard immediately after the witnesses for the prosecution.

XIX. a. The party accused is allowed to question the witnesses produced against him respectively, when they have gone through their evidence in chief. This cross-examination is conducted for the prisoner by his counsel. And I am not aware of any reasonable extent to which it may not be carried.

XX. a. The rule is that, after the calling, "évocation," of the witnesses, no additional witness can be produced either for the prosecution or for the defence. Hence, on the part of the prosecution, no fresh witnesses can be called in reply. And it appears to be understood that the Court has no authority to receive the testimony of any person, who has not been summoned and evoked as a witness, on the part either of the prosecution or the defence.

XXI. a. No part of the evidence is taken down in writing.

Any notes, that may be taken by members of the Court, are merely for their own convenience, and have no official authority.

XXIII. a. The counsel of the party charged has the privilege, as au grand criminel, of being heard on all questions of fact or law, as well as that of examining and cross-examining the witnesses produced at the trial.

The answers to the remaining questions will apply equally to both kinds of trial.

XXIV. The Crown officers are heard last. I may observe, however, that it would be incorrect to consider the Crown officers merely as "the party accusing." They are indeed public functionaries entrusted with the conduct of the prosecution; but they are also the responsible advisers of the Court; and they have, not only to state their view of the facts, and to inform the Court of what the law is, but also to advise the Court as to the sentence to be given, and the amount of punishment to be awarded.

XXV. All questions both of law and fact are decided by the Court.

XXVI. Judgment is awarded by the Court. In case of conviction, sentence is pronounced by the Bailiff.

XXVII. I have already mentioned the powers of adjournment possessed by the Cour ordinaire, sitting as a Court of Police.

After the Cour en Corps is seised of the proceedings, I apprehend it has, of common right, a discretionary power to adjourn or suspend them. For instance, if a trial begins today, and it is too long to be gone through with at one sitting, it may be adjourned till tomorrow, and so on from day to day till it is brought to an end. And, in like manner, in case of the absence of a material witness, the proceedings may be suspended.

XXIX. There is no appeal.

XXX. If judgment is given against the accused party, it becomes the duty of the Sheriff (Prevost) to carry it into execution; the Act of Court is his authority, without any further warrant. There is this exception to the general rule, that, when a convict is to be transported, application is made to the Privy Council.

XXXI. I beg to refer to the forms furnished by the Procureur.

XXXII. I beg to postpone for the present my answer to the thirty second question.

XXXIV. With reference to the subjects more especially touched upon in the questions contained in SERIES No. 1, I beg to suggest the following improvements.

1. Except where the case requires to be remitted for judgment to the Sovereign in Council, let the proceeding "au grand criminel" be abolished.

2. Let it be declared to be the duty of the presiding Judge to take notes at the trial.

3. Let the functionaries, who have sent a party to trial, be declared incapable of acting at the trial, as members of the Court.

4. Let the evidence on which a party is sent to trial be taken down in writing; and, a certain time before the trial, let the prisoner's counsel be entitled to copies of the depositions, at the expense of the Crown.

5. Let the number of witnesses on each side be no longer limited to twelve.

6. Let the Court have the power of hearing witnesses, though not summoned or evoked, on the part either of the prosecution or the defence.

PETER STAFFORD CAREY, Bailiff of Guernsey.

GUERNSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

H. O. Carré, Esq., Lieut. Bailiff. 19 July, 1846.

No. 2.

The Answers of Hilary Olivier Carré, Esq., Lieutenant Bailiff of the Island of Guernsey.

1. Twenty two years' experience in the practice of the Royal Court of Guernsey. I practised as Advocate during five years, and have been seventeen years a Jurat of the Royal Court.

2. The Royal Court, consisting of the Bailiff and twelve Jurats, is the only tribunal that exercises criminal jurisdiction in the Island. It has existed in its present form, and has exercised that jurisdiction, from a time anterior to all known records relating to the Island: and its power has been repeatedly confirmed by Royal Charters. The jurisdiction of the Court extends over all offences, except treason, coining and assaulting the Bailiff or Jurats when in the exercise of their office. In these three cases the cognizance of the matter belongs to the Court; but the sentence is reserved to the Crown.

3. The chief authorities relied on are "Terrien's Commentaries on the law of Normandy," so far as sanctioned by the "Approbation des loix," and various commentators on the criminal law of France and England.

4. The constables are bound to inquire into the particulars of any criminal act or breach of the peace committed in their respective parishes. A constable may, of his own authority or in consequence of directions from the Bailiff or Crown officers, either take the suspected party into custody, or give him notice to appear before the Court sitting as a tribunal of correctional police. After having taken a person into custody, the constable is bound within twenty four hours to inform both the Bailiff and the Crown officers thereof, and to follow their directions, as to whether the party is to be kept in confinement or set at liberty, with or without notice to appear before the Court.

5. The Court of Correctional Police, composed of the Bailiff and two Jurats at the least, and assisted by the Crown officers, disposes summarily of cases of assault, breaches of the public peace, and other minor offences.

6. When the offence is not of a nature to be summarily disposed of, the Court proceeds to examine each witness upon oath separately and in private. After having heard the witnesses produced by the constables, the Court may remand the prisoner for the purpose of obtaining further evidence. When the evidence appears sufficient to put the accused party upon his trial, the draft of the indictment is drawn up by the Crown officers and approved by the Court. It is then read to the accused party, who is afterwards questioned by the Court, being first cautioned, that whatever answers he may think proper to give will be taken down in writing and used at his trial; this is called the "interrogatoire." It is proper to add, that the accused may, if he pleases, refuse to answer the questions put to him. The Court then decides whether he shall be committed for trial, remanded or discharged. If committed or remanded, he is either sent to prison in charge of the Sheriff, or held to bail. In some cases, the only security taken has been the promise upon oath of the accused party that he shall hold himself ready to appear before the Court when required: this is called a "caution juratoire."

7. The trial takes place before the Royal Court sitting as a Criminal Court; for which purpose the Bailiff and seven Jurats at the least must be present. The functionaries who have sent the party to trial are capable of acting as members of such Court.

8. The proceedings against the accused are instituted by the Crown officers, who are specially authorized to that effect by the act of Court by which the party is committed for trial. The Crown officers have no power, of themselves, to cause the proceedings to be abandoned: but this may be done, with the leave of the Court, at any time in cases "Au petit Criminel," before the cause is called on and the trial commenced; and, in cases "Au grand Criminel," at any time before the "Confrontation." The proceedings may then recommence with the framing of a new indictment followed by an "interrogatoire" as before.

9. The charge must be put in writing in a definite form before the "interrogatoire" is taken; and it cannot afterwards be varied, either in form or substance, without the consent of the accused party, in which case the "interrogatoire" must be taken afresh on the indictment as altered. But the whole of the proceedings may be abandoned and recommenced with any needful alterations in the indictment, in the manner stated in the answer to the last question. Of course there is nothing to prevent the accused from shaping his defence as he may think proper.

10. The accused party, on the day when he is first indicted at the suit of the Crown officers, is at liberty to plead at once, and to obtain a decision of the Court on any question of law arising out of the form of the indictment. But that proceeding is not usual, as, under the general issue of "Not guilty," the accused may afterwards argue all questions, both of law and of fact: this is a privilege allowed to defendants in criminal cases only.

11. He pleads "Not guilty:" and the Court thereupon makes a rule ordering the Crown officers to prove the indictment. The trial usually takes place on the next Court day. The Criminal Court sits every Saturday during term.

13. No.

14. When the accused party is first called to plead to the indictment, he has the right to make choice of one of the Advocates of the Court to act as his counsel. The Advocate chosen is bound to undertake the defence, whether the accused is able to pay or not. The latter is, however, at liberty to employ other counsel at his own expense, but only for the purpose of giving advice, or of assisting in the examination of witnesses; the Advocate chosen on the occasion above mentioned being alone permitted to address the Court on behalf of the accused.

15. The attendance of witnesses, required by the Crown officers or by the accused party, may be compelled by fine and imprisonment. An unlimited number of witnesses may be called by either party before the committal; only twelve are allowed on each side at the trial.

16. The stage at which evidence is first received is before the accused party is committed for trial; and that evidence, as before stated, is heard upon oath by the Court in presence of the Greffier and Crown officers only. No authentic notes are taken of the evidence then produced: and such notes, if taken, would not be made use of at the trial.

17. In cases "au petit criminel," which are those where the offence does not amount to felony, the party accused has no opportunity to hear the evidence produced against him until the day of trial, when the witnesses, both on the part of the Crown and of the prisoner, are heard vivâ voce before the Court. In cases "au grand criminel," which are where the offence is a felony and may be punished by death, or by transportation to a penal settlement, or banishment from the bailiwick for seven years or upwards, the whole of the evidence is taken down in writing after the prisoner has pleaded to the indictment. The forms of proceeding observed in such cases being fully explained in the answers given by Her Majesty's Procureur, it is not necessary for me to detail them. It will be sufficient to state, in answer to the present question, that there is a stage of the proceedings "au grand criminel" called the "confrontation," when the witnesses for the prosecution, after having been on a former day examined in private, and their deposition taken in writing, are brought face to face with the prisoner (assisted by his counsel) in the presence of the Court, and when he has an opportunity of questioning them to any extent. The prisoner must be furnished with a copy of the depositions against him on the morning of the "confrontation."

18. The party committed for trial is allowed to produce evidence on the day of his trial in cases "au petit criminel," and after the "confrontation" in cases "au grand criminel."

19. The accused may question to any extent the witnesses produced against him; in cases "au petit criminel," on the day of the trial, in cases "au grand criminel" at the time of the "confrontation."

20. In cases "au petit criminel," no fresh evidence can be brought, for or against the accused, after the witnesses have been sworn on the day of trial. "Au grand criminel," no fresh evidence can be brought against the accused after the "confrontation" has begun. After it is ended, he is allowed to name the witnesses he requires (not exceeding twelve in number) to prove the facts he desires to urge in his defence, and their evidence is afterwards taken in writing on a convenient day. No further evidence is afterwards allowed to be brought on his behalf, except witnesses as to character, which he is permitted to call on the day of the trial, and to examine vivâ voce before the Court.

21. The evidence, "au petit criminel," is not taken in writing, except in the case of a necessary witness, who might be about to leave the Island and could not be present to give his evidence on the day of trial; his deposition is then taken in writing according to the forms in use "au grand criminel," with this exception, that the "deposition," "récolement" and "confrontation" may, in pressing cases, take place on the same day.

22. The evidence, when in writing, is publicly read before the Court at the trial. No proof is allowed that it does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to; and such proof, owing to the method of taking the evidence, can never be required. The deposition of such witness is first taken by way of question and answer; the "récolement," which takes place some time after, gives him an opportunity to alter, add to or amend his first declaration; and the prisoner at the "confrontation" is allowed, with the assistance of his counsel, to question each witness to any extent; on this occasion, every question put by the prisoner, and the answer thereto, are read over to him the moment they are written, that he may be satisfied as to their being correctly taken down.

23. The counsel for the accused has in all cases the privilege of being heard at the trial on all questions, both of law and of fact, and of examining the witnesses for and against the prosecution at the proper stages of the proceedings, as above stated.

24. The counsel for the accused is heard after the evidence on both sides is closed; the Crown officers then comment on the evidence, after discussing the points of law, if any have been raised, and finally give their "conclusions;" that is, they declare their opinion impartially as to the innocence or guilt of the accused, and pray for the judgment of the Court accordingly; adding, when it is their opinion that he is guilty, what degree of punishment they consider proportioned to the offence.

25. The Bailiff and Jurats decide both.

26. The Bailiff sums up the case and takes the opinions of the Jurats individually and in open Court; the opinion of the majority is declared by the Bailiff to be the judgment of the Court. When the Jurats are equally divided in opinion, the Bailiff has the casting vote.

27. Before the trial the proceedings may be suspended a reasonable time, with the leave of the Court, on account of the sickness of the prisoner, or the absence of certain necessary witnesses for or against the prosecution. The trial, once commenced, must be continued from day to day till concluded.

28. For a full and circumstantial statement of the proceedings in criminal prosecutions, I beg to refer to the answers of Her Majesty's Procureur to this series of questions.

29. No appeal is allowed in criminal cases.

30. The Sheriff proceeds to the execution of the sentence in the presence of the Crown officers, for which the judgment of the Court is his sufficient warrant. There is an exception when the sentence is transportation to a penal settlement; in which case the act of court places the criminal at the disposal of the Crown, and the Bailiff reports the case to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department.

31. The forms in use are given in the answers of Her Majesty's Procureur and Deputy Greffier.

GUERNSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

H. O. Carré, Esq., Lieut. Bailiff. 19 July, 1846.

32. The Bailiff, Crown officers, and Greffier or Clerk of the Court are appointed by the Crown, and hold office during the pleasure of the Crown. The Jurats are chosen by the States of Election; a body consisting of the Bailiff and Jurats, the Rectors of parishes, the Procureur, the Constables, of which there are two in each parish, and the Douzaines or municipal councils of the ten parishes and four cantons or districts of the town parish; in all 222 persons. The Jurats are compelled to serve for life, and can only be removed for sufficient cause by order of Her Majesty in Council. They may, however, obtain their discharge, on account of ill health, age or infirmity, by application in the first place to the States of deliberation, and afterwards to Her Majesty in Council. The Constables and Douzainiers, whose offices are also compulsory, are elected by the rate payers of their respective parishes. The Constables are obliged to serve for one twelvemonth at the least, and are at liberty to retain their office for three years. The Douzainiers are elected for life, but may obtain their discharge after sixty years of age. They also vacate their offices, if they cease to reside in their respective parishes or cantons; and they may be removed for sufficient cause by a judgment of the Court. Her Majesty's Sheriff is elected, like the Jurats, for life by the States of Election. The Greffier and the Sheriff may appoint fit persons to act as their deputies, who are sworn into office by the Court on being presented by the Crown officers. The Crown officers themselves cannot exercise office by deputy.

33–34. I cannot say that I am prepared to point out the defects of the present system. But, should any part of it appear to Her Majesty's Commissioners either inconsistent with, or insufficient for the attainment of the ends of justice, I shall be ready and anxious to give any further information that may be required on the subject, and to assist, jointly with my colleagues, in suggesting such improvements as may be in accordance with the institutions of the Island.

No. 3.

John Le Marchant, Frederick Mansell, Thos. Wm Gosselin, Harry Dobrée, Jun., Edgar Mac Culloch, and William Peter Metevier, Esqrs., Jurats.

The Joint Answers of John Le Marchant, Frederic Mansell, Thomas William Gosselin, Harry Dobrée, Junior, Edgar MacCulloch, and William Peter Metivier, Esqrs., Jurats of the Royal Court of Guernsey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. By having been constable, and served under parochial offices, and more particularly by discharging the duties of Jurats of the Royal Court, since our respective elections.

2. The Royal Court is the only tribunal which exercises criminal jurisdiction in Guernsey. It takes cognizance of every offence committed, except three, viz., treason, false coining and laying violent hands on the Bailiff or on any of the Jurats, when exercising their magisterial functions, the punishment whereof is reserved for her Majesty, and has existed from time immemorial.

3. The 12th Book of Terrien, L'Approbation des Lois, with Le Marchant's Commentary thereon; also, French and English Commentators.

4. The constables endeavour to apprehend the party suspected, by order of the Bailiff or the Crown lawyers, and sometimes on their own responsibility.

5. The "Cour Ordinaire," consisting of the Bailiff, or his Lieutenant, and two (at least) or four Jurats, at which one or both the Crown lawyers must be present, exercises summary jurisdiction in cases of breaches of the peace, assaults and other minor offences, when the punishment does not exceed one month's imprisonment, sometimes with solitary confinement on bread and water for part or the whole of the time; and for breaches of ordinances, where the maximum of the fine does not exceed 30*l.* tournois=2*l.* 2*s.* 8½*d.* sterling.

6. Every accused party is brought by a constable before the Cour Ordinaire, composed as stated in the preceding answer, if the case is not susceptible of being dealt with summarily. Witnesses are heard in private. An act of accusation is drawn up by the Crown lawyers, which must be approved of by the Court. The accused is then called in, and the accusation read to him. The Court then proceeds to take his "Interrogatoire" (which is read at his trial, and whereof he obtain a copy some days before), but previously warns him that he is not obliged to answer the questions put to him; the questions and his answers are taken down in writing. The public are then admitted, when the accused is committed to take his trial, and placed in the custody of the sheriff, who takes him to prison, unless he gives bail (in cases susceptible of it) to appear before the Court which is to try him. After witnesses have been heard in private, further evidence may sometimes be required, in which case an accused may be remanded, either before or after his "Interrogatoire" has been taken, according to circumstances. Should he subsequently be discharged, an act to that effect is made in the latter but not in the former case. In doubtful cases, an accused has sometimes been made to give bail, or make oath, to appear, whenever summoned by the Court, to be indicted. When an accused is brought before the Court, if he has any witnesses, the constable warns them to appear, and the Court always hears them.

7. He is tried before the "Cour en Corps," consisting of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant, and seven Jurats at least: the Bailiff and Jurats who committed him are capable of acting as members of the Court.

8. The proceedings against an accused party are instituted by the Crown lawyers, and cannot be abandoned but with the sanction of the Court seized of the case. Indictments have been quashed, on the application of the Crown lawyers, to commence "de novo;" but we have no knowledge of any proceedings having been abandoned after an accused has been committed to take his trial.

John Le Marchant, Frederick Mansell, Thos. Wm. Gosselin, Harry Dobrée, Jun., Edgar MacCulloch, and William Peter Metivier, Esqrs., Jurats.

9. As stated in the sixth answer, the form or substance of an accusation cannot be altered, but may be quashed to recommence proceedings; "au Petit Criminel," where the witnesses are heard vivâ voce, at any time before the witnesses are sworn to give their evidence; and "au Grand Criminel," at any time before the "Confrontation:" and ample time is allowed to the accused to prepare for his defence.

10. The counsel of the accused ought, in strictness, to plead the question respecting the relevancy of the charge before the witnesses are heard: but he is permitted to do it, when he pleads to defend his client.

11. He pleads Not guilty.

12. No.

13. No.

14. Every individual brought to trial is allowed to chose one of the Advocates for his counsel, who pleads for and assists him, whether he has or has not the means of paying him, he may also avail himself of the advice of other counsel.

15. Every witness is bound to appear in Court when he has been summoned by the proper officer, under penalty of fine or imprisonment. In criminal cases, the Crown lawyers summon both their own witnesses, as well as those of the accused, and order the production of any documentary evidence which may be required.

16. Vide answer 6.

17. "Au Petit Criminel," at the trial; "au Grand Criminel," the depositions are shown to the counsel of the accused on the morning of the "Récolement."

18. "Au Petit Criminel," at the trial; "au Grand Criminel," after the "Confrontation."

19. Every latitude is allowed to the accused to question the witnesses at the trial, "au Petit Criminel;" and at the "Confrontation," "au Grand Criminel."

20. No fresh evidence can be produced against the accused after he has been summoned to appear at the "Confrontation," as the summons contains the names of the witnesses which have given their evidence. When the witnesses of the accused party have had their depositions taken down in writing, the whole of the evidence is closed.

21. The whole of the evidence is taken down in writing, "au Grand Criminel," being cases in which the accused may be condemned to seven years' banishment or more, or to death.

22. "Au Grand Criminel," the evidence is read at the trial, and cannot be impugned by either party, the witnesses against the accused having confirmed their respective depositions at the "Récolement," and he having had the means of cross-questioning them at the "Confrontation."

23. The counsel of the accused is allowed to argue any point of law or of fact, and to examine every witness who is brought to give evidence against his client.

24. The accusers are heard last.

25. The Bailiff and Jurats decide the questions of law and of fact.

26. By the majority of the Court, the Bailiff having the casting vote when the opinions of the Jurats are equally divided.

27. The Court may adjourn, but seldom does so, except when the proceedings cannot be terminated on the first day.

28. The following are the proceedings which take place "au Grand Criminel."

The accusation is made in the manner described in the sixth answer; the accused is then summoned to appear before the Court; the indictment is read to him, and he is asked if he is Guilty or Not guilty; his answer is recorded; he then chooses one of the Advocates for his counsel; witnesses for the prosecution are subsequently summoned to appear before the "Cour Ordinaire;" every witness, after having been sworn, is heard in private, and his evidence taken down in writing by the Greffier. When all the witnesses have been heard, they are again summoned, as before, for the "Récolement;" after having been sworn, the evidence which a witness has given is read to him; he is then asked, if he confirms it or if he has anything to alter or to add to it; when this has been done his evidence is complete. When all the witnesses have been "Récolés" they are again summoned for the "Confrontation" (unless it takes place immediately after the "Récolement"), when they are brought separately in presence of the accused accompanied by his counsel, who is asked if he has any objection against the witness: if he has, a minute is taken of his objection, and the question of its validity or invalidity argued at the trial before the evidence is read; the witness is then sworn; his evidence is read before the accused, who cross-questions him if he thinks proper; the questions and answers are taken down in writing by the Greffier. When all the witnesses have been examined by the accused, he is asked on what points he proposes to ground his defence: if he has any witnesses in support, he tenders a list of their names. They are subsequently summoned to appear before the "Cour Ordinaire," are examined separately by the accused and by the Court, if they have any questions to ask. Their evidence is taken down in writing by the Greffier, and, after they have been all heard, the whole evidence is closed. Authenticated copies of the evidence are delivered to the Crown lawyers and to the accused by the Greffier. At the trial the indictment, the interrogatoire and the evidence are read; the counsel of the accused is heard for the defence; then the Crown lawyers for the prosecution, who close their pleadings by giving their conclusions; after which the Bailiff sums up; and judgment in open Court is pronounced by the Jurats, who give their opinion according to seniority.

29. There is no appeal in criminal cases.

30. The sentence is carried into execution by the Sheriff. If the accused is condemned to transportation, he is confined in the prison until an order for his removal to England is received from the Secretary of State; if to death, he is usually executed on the Friday after his trial, which takes place on a Saturday, or on any other day which the Court may appoint: should the Jurats who have tried him recommend him to mercy, an application is immediately made to Her Majesty, and the execution of the sentence suspended until her pleasure has been made known. When an accused has been condemned to banishment, he is taken to prison until he is sent out of the Island, which usually takes place a few days after. In all other cases the sentence is carried into immediate execution.

31. As Her Majesty's Greffier will furnish the different forms which have been asked, we beg to refer to them.

32. The Bailiff is appointed by Her Majesty's Commission, and holds office during pleasure.

The Jurats are elected by the States, and are compelled to serve gratuitously for life. A Jurat cannot be removed, except to be appointed Bailiff, or in case "si est d'estre reprins et diffamé de son serment."

The Queen's Procureur, Contrôle, and Greffier are appointed by Her Majesty's Commission, and hold office during her pleasure.

The Sheriff is elected by the States for life.

The Serjeant is appointed by the Lieutenant Governor with the authority of the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

The Constables are elected by the ratepayers in their respective parishes and are obliged to serve one year; but they may remain three years in office.

33. There are Actions "en Adjonction," such as for libel, defamation, assaults, &c., which partake of the nature of criminal and civil actions, the object of which is to obtain damages for the injuries received and get the defendant fined. In all these cases, one of the Crown lawyers pleads for the prosecutor and the other for the defendant.

34. Although the system of criminal jurisprudence may appear very strange and extraordinary to those who are unacquainted with its operation, yet, as it has worked well for so many centuries past, is adapted to a small community, and wherewith the inhabitants are satisfied, we cannot but hesitate to suggest alterations which it might be supposed would improve the system, and yet might possibly turn out a failure in practice.

No. 4.

The Joint Answers of the undersigned Thomas Le Retilley, Thomas De Havilland, and Thomas Andros, Esqrs., Jurats of the Royal Court of Guernsey, to the first Series of Questions.

Thomas Le Retilley, Thomas De Havilland, and Thomas Andros, Esqrs., Jurats. 20th July, 1846.

1. Our practical acquaintance with the criminal law of Guernsey has been chiefly derived from the performance of our duties as Jurats since our election.

2. The Royal Court, the only tribunal which exercises criminal jurisdiction in the Island, consists of the Bailiff and twelve Jurats. The constitution of this Court, in its present form, is supposed to have originated in the reign of King John; and its authority has been repeatedly recognised and confirmed in the Royal Charters of the Island. The jurisdiction of the Bailiff and Jurats extends to all offences arising in the Island, excepting Treason, Coining and assaulting the Bailiff and Jurats when exercising their office: of these three cases the Court has also the cognizance; but the adjudging of the punishment thereof is reserved to the Sovereign in Council.

3. "Terrien," according to the "Approbation," is peculiarly the authority referred to in respect to the criminal law: but, in the discussion of questions arising upon that law, other French commentators are quoted, as well as commentators and recent writers on the criminal law of England.

4. When a party is suspected of having committed an offence, the first step taken for the purpose of bringing him to justice is to give notice to a constable, who, of his own authority or in consequence of directions from the Bailiff or Crown officers, is to take means for producing him before the Court. In the event of the party being put into custody, the constable is bound, within twenty four hours, to give information of the particulars of the case to the Bailiff and Crown officers, and to receive his instructions from them regarding the disposal of the party.

5. "La Cour Ordinaire," or, as it is also called, "La Cour du Quartier," (consisting of the Bailiff and four Jurats, two of them with the Bailiff forming a quorum) assisted by the Crown officers, before whom the accused is brought, does in some cases exercise a summary jurisdiction. By this Court, when sitting "en Police Correctionnelle," ordinary police and other such cases are disposed of summarily.

6. Where there is no exercise of summary jurisdiction, the proceedings, preliminary to the accused being put on his trial, are taken in private before "la Cour Ordinaire." The Court hears the statement of the informant, and puts such questions as may be necessary for the purpose of ascertaining that the facts to which the witnesses are to depose are relevant to the charge. An oath is then administered to the witnesses; and the Court proceeds to take their examinations. If sufficient ground appear, the charge against the accused is put into a definite written form. It is then, he having been called in, distinctly read to him; and he is informed that he is to be interrogated thereon, and that his answers will be used at his trial, supposing him to be committed. The "Interrogatoire," not on oath, is then taken in writing. At this stage the accused has the privilege of procuring, by means of the constable, the attendance of any witnesses he may indicate, to be heard on his behalf. When the Court is finally satisfied that the accused is to be put on his trial, it authorises the Crown officers "d'informer contre lui." The steps taken for securing the appearance of the accused to undergo his trial are by committing him to prison, or requiring bail, if the offence is bailable; the "caution juratoire' of the accused, that he will appear when required, being in some cases deemed sufficient.

7. When the jurisdiction is not of a summary kind, the accused is tried before "la Cour Criminelle," or, as it is also called, "La Cour en Corps," composed of the Bailiff and seven Jurats at the least. The functionaries, who have sent the party to trial, are capable of acting as members of such Court.

8. The proceedings against the accused party are instituted with leave of the Court by the Crown officers acting as public prosecutors. The Court may, at the instance of the Crown officers, allow such proceedings to be abandoned at any time before trial, "au petit criminel," and before "confrontation," "au grand criminel." The distinction between such cases is explained in No. 17. After abandonment of proceedings, the Crown officers are at liberty to apply again to the Court for leave "d'informer" de novo against the accused.

9. It will appear from No. 6 at what stage the charge against the party accused is put into a definite written form. After the "Interrogatoire" has been taken, it is not competent to vary the form or substance of the charge without the consent of the accused; but the proceedings may be abandoned, and others commenced, with consent of the Court.

10, 11, 12, 13. Under the plea of "Not guilty," the utmost latitude is allowed to the accused to dispute both the facts and their relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of one counsel (who in the Island fulfils the duties of Attorney as of Counsel), whether such party is or is not in a condition to remunerate such counsel. The party himself selects his adviser, who may be assisted by one or more counsel.

15. Both the accusing and the accused party have the means of compelling the production of evidence, oral and documentary, at any stage of the proceedings, through the Crown officers, who summon and procure the evidence of not only the witnesses on the part of the prosecution, but also on that of the defence: and such witnesses are also all equally paid for their attendance at the expense of the Crown. The number of witnesses, who may be called by either party in the investigation previously to committal, as mentioned in No. 6, is unlimited. Only twelve on either side are allowed at the trial.

16. As has already appeared, evidence is first received previously to putting the charge against the accused in a definite written form. It is taken in the mode and in the presence stated in No. 6.

17. If the accused be proceeded against "au grand criminel," which is the case when the offence is felony, which may be followed with the punishment of death or transportation to a penal settlement, or banishment from the bailiwick for seven years or upwards, the whole of the evidence produced against him, subsequently to his committal, is taken in writing by "la Cour ordinaire" in the absence of the accused. He is first allowed to hear that evidence, when an opportunity of "confrontation" with the witnesses and of examining them by his counsel is afforded him before the same Court. If the accused be proceeded against "au petit criminel," which is the case when the offence is not felony, and involves a lesser punishment than those before enumerated, he first hears the evidence when it is produced against him at the trial before "la Cour criminelle."

18. In proceedings "au grand criminel," the party accused is allowed to produce evidence before "la Cour ordinaire" to meet that produced against him, after the completion of the examination on the part of the accusing party: and such evidence on behalf of the accused forms part of the evidence used on the trial. "Au petit criminel" the accused produces his evidence, vivâ voce, at the trial and not before.

19. "Au grand criminel," at the time of "confrontation," of which notice is given to the accused by summons, which is required to contain the names of the witnesses to be confronted, and "au petit criminel," at the trial, he is allowed to question the witnesses produced against him to any extent.

20. "An grand criminel," after copies of the evidence, as well on the part of the accusing as of the accused party, have been given out by the clerk of the Court, called the Greffier, to the Crown officers and to the accused, no fresh evidence can be produced by either party. "Au petit criminel," the evidence is confined to the witnesses sworn at the commencement of the trial.

21. "Au grand criminel," the whole of the evidence, subsequent to the committal, is taken down in writing. Neither "au grand criminel" nor "au petit criminel" is the evidence prior to the committal necessarily taken down in writing.

22. "Au grand criminel," as has been already shewn, the evidence which is taken down in writing is afterwards used at the trial; and upon that evidence alone the case is decided. It is not allowable, either against or on behalf of the accused party, to give proof that the written evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to, the "Récolement et confrontation" having previously taken place. "Au petit criminel," the evidence is wholly vivâ voce.

23. The counsel for the party charged has unlimited privilege as to being heard on questions of fact or law, and examining witnesses.

24. The party accusing has the privilege of being heard last.

SERIES I.

Thomas Le Retilley, Thomas De Havilland, and Thomas Andros, Esqrs., Jurats. 20th July, 1846.

25. Both the law and the fact are decided by the Bailiff and Jurats after hearing the "conclusions" of the Crown officers. The Bailiff sums up the case, but does not vote; at least his vote does not count, unless the opinions of the Jurats are equally divided.

26. The judgment is awarded by the Bailiff and Jurats.

27. The Court has power to adjourn and suspend its proceedings for causes, such as absence of a witness duly summoned, provided it be previously to the commencement of the trial. The trial once commenced, if the case cannot be disposed of in one day, the Court may adjourn.

28. In answering this question, it may be well to give the following more connected detail of the incidents to accusation and trial.

"Au petit criminel," the accused, having been, by "la Cour ordinaire," ordered for trial, as stated in No. 6, is served with a summons, at the suit of the Crown officers, containing the accusation against him, which must be referred to and be strictly in accordance with the charge upon which the accused has given his "interrogatoire." Appearing before the Court, the accusation is read to him and he pleads Guilty or Not Guilty. The plea is recorded; and the Court rules that the Crown officers "prouveront les fins de leur action." The accused also chooses his counsel. Two days at least before the trial, the Crown officers cause the accused to be served with another summons similar to that preceding, with the addition of a statement of the accused having pleaded and chosen his counsel. As has been already said, the Crown officers also cause the witnesses, both in support of the accusation and of the defence, to be summoned, being furnished with lists for the purpose. On the day of trial, proceedings commence with reading the accusation. The witnesses on both sides are called and sworn; and, after the swearing, no other can be called. Witnesses may be challenged by either side. The accusation and the "interrogatoire" are then read and the witnesses examined. The counsel of the accused, thereupon, makes his speech in defence. The Crown officers then address the Court, ending with their "conclusions," as public prosecutors between the Crown and the accused, with regard to the verdict of Guilty or Not Guilty, and to the degree of punishment to be inflicted on him if Guilty. The Bailiff sums up and collects the opinions of the Jurats, as stated in No. 25.

"Au grand criminel," the accused, having been, by "La Cour ordinaire," ordered for trial, as stated in No. 6, is served with a summons, at the suit of the Crown officers, containing the accusation against him; and on the next Court day he is called upon to plead Guilty or Not Guilty, and to choose a counsel. Days are then appointed for the examination of witnesses in support of the prosecution. The examination takes place in private before "la Cour ordinaire." The witnesses, separately introduced, are sworn and examined by the Crown officers; and the questions and answers are taken down in writing by the Greffier. When all the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined, another day is appointed by the Court for the "Récolement," being the re-examination of the witnesses or the confirmation of their evidence. On this occasion the witnesses are called in singly; their depositions are read to them; and they are required to declare whether they confirm what they have deposed to, or whether they have any thing to add or to change. The Court may also further pursue the examination by proposing additional questions. The next proceeding is the "Confrontation," already alluded to, at which the accused is present, assisted by his counsel. The witnesses are called in singly; and the accused is asked whether he objects to the witnesses, a list of which has been previously furnished him. If objection be made, a note of it is taken; and it remains to be decided by "la Cour criminelle" at the trial. The depositions, which, till lately, were at the "Confrontation" first communicated to the accused, but which, by an Order in Council of the 19th June, 1844, are now to be delivered to him on the morning of the "Confrontation," are read by the Greffier, and the counsel of the accused puts such counter questions as he may think proper. The Court may also again interrogate the witnesses. The whole of the proceeding, as before, is taken down in writing. After the "Confrontation" is terminated, the Court inquires of the accused whether he is desirous of producing witnesses on his behalf; and, if so, he is to state by his counsel the purport of the evidence he proposes to give, in order that the Court may judge of its relevancy to the case. If leave of the Court be given, another day is then appointed for the examination of the witnesses of the accused. That examination takes place, as before detailed, and is put into writing. When all the examinations have taken place, an authenticated copy of the whole evidence is furnished by the Greffier to the Crown officers, and another to the counsel of the accused. On the day of trial, which is before "la Cour Criminelle," the accusation and the "Interrogatoire" are first read. If the counsel of the accused has challenged any of the Witnesses, he then justifies the challenge. The Court judges of its validity. The depositions of the witnesses on both sides are next read; and the counsel of the accused enters on his defence. The Crown officers follow and give their "Conclusions." The Bailiff sums up, and proceeds to take the individual opinions of the Jurats, as in cases "au petit criminel."

29. The accused party has no power of appeal in any form of criminal proceedings.

30. When Judgment is finally against the accused party, if he be condemned to death, the sentence is carried into effect in presence of the Crown officers by means of the Sheriff. Saturday is the usual day of trial: and the day appointed by the Court for execution is, at the earliest, on the following Friday, that time, however, being extended in case of application made on the part of the convict. When the sentence is transportation to a penal settlement, the Bailiff reports the case to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, through whose intervention the convict is transported to such settlement as

Her Majesty is pleased to direct. When the sentence involves the forfeiture of property real and personal to Her Majesty, as death or transportation to a penal settlement or banishment from the Bailiwick for seven years or upwards, the Crown officers take means to possess themselves of it.

31. The Crown officers and the Greffier, with their answers, will furnish the forms used at the various steps of the proceedings which are the subject of the preceding questions, and will also give the oaths taken by the witnesses and by the members of the Court on their entering into office. The Court is not sworn in each cause.

Thomas Le Retilley, Thomas De Havilland, and Thomas Andros, Esqrs., Jurats. 20th July, 1846.

32. The Bailiff and the Crown officers (the "Procureur" and the "Comptrolle") are appointed by the Crown during pleasure. The Jurats are elected for life by the Elective States of the Island, composed of the Bailiff, the Jurats, the Rectors of Parishes appointed to their livings by the Crown, the Queen's "Procureur," and the members of the Douzaines or Municipal Councils, including the constables of the Town and nine Country Parishes, who manage the parochial affairs, and of the four Cantonal Douzaines of the Town, making in all 222. The members of the Douzaines, parochial and cantonal, are themselves elected by the ratepayers of their respective parishes, and hold their offices for life. The constables, of whom there are two in each parish, are also elected by the ratepayers; they preside over the Douzaines or Municipal Councils of their parishes, and are treasurers of the public money, as well as at the head of the Police in their respective parishes. The election of Constable holds for three years; but they are entitled to be relieved from service at the end of one year. The Constables after service are eligible as Douzainiers, such service being indispensable as a qualification to the Douzaine. Both Constables and Douzainiers are removable by judgment of the Court if sufficient cause be shown. The Sheriff, like the Jurats, is chosen for life by the Elective States. With regard to the Jurats, they can only be removed by order of the Sovereign in Council.

33, 34. We have not at this moment any suggestions to make regarding any defects in the present system of the criminal law of the Island: but, as Members of the Court, we shall be anxious, in unison with its other Members, to give our best consideration to any part of that system in which it may appear to Her Majesty's Commissioners that improvements may be made, and to the means which at any time may be suggested for carrying such improvements into effect.

No. 6.

Charles De Jersey, Esqrs., Procureur de la Reine. 18 July, 1846.

1. I was called to the Bar in 1806, was appointed Comptroller or Solicitor General in 1822, and Procureur or Attorney General in 1830.

2. The Royal Court alone exercises criminal jurisdiction in this Island. Its jurisdiction is very ancient: it is supposed to have originated in the Constitutions of King John, and extends over all offences, save treason, false coining and laying violent hands on the Bailiff or Jurats while in the execution of the duties of their office: in these the Royal Court has the examination into the offence itself; but the punishment of the offenders is reserved to the Crown.

3. "Terrien;" our book of Laws, the "Approbation des Loix,;" Orders in Council; Mr. Le Marchant's Commentaries; Common Law, and English and French Criminal Law Authorities.

4. Information is given to one of the constables or of the assistant constables of the parish, who, according to the gravity of the charge, either takes the accused into custody, or orders him to appear before the Court on the following Thursday: and, in either case, the constable is bound to report the matter, without loss of time, to the Chief Magistrate and to the Crown lawyers.

5. All petty offences are disposed of summarily by the Ordinary Court, composed of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and of two Jurats at the least, who sit every Thursday and oftener, if required, as a Court of Correctional Police.

6. Witnesses are examined on oath in private by the Ordinary Court in the presence of the Queen's Law officers, after which, if there be sufficient evidence, the charge or accusation is put into writing and read to the accused, and his interrogatory is taken thereupon and put into writing. His appearance before the Court is then secured either by committing him to prison for trial, by admitting him to bail, or, in trivial cases, by taking his "caution juratoire," that he will answer to the accusation which shall be entered against him.

7. He is tried before the Criminal Court, constituted of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and seven Jurats at the least. The functionaries who have sent the party to prison are capable of acting as members of that Court.

8. The constable produces the party and the witnesses before the Court in the first instance: the act of commitment for trial directs the Crown lawyers to prosecute; who then, as public prosecutors, indict the prisoner and cannot "per se" cause the proceedings to be abandoned: but, should errors be discovered which might prove fatal to the prosecution, they may, with the sanction of the Court, abandon the proceedings and commence a prosecution "de novo" in an amended form.

9. The charge is put into a definite form in writing as soon as witnesses have been examined verbally in private by the Court, and before the prisoner is interrogated thereupon. After commitment, it is not competent in the Queen's Law officers, who are public prosecutors, to vary the form or substance of the charge: but, as already observed, should any error be discovered which might be fatal to the prosecution, the Queen's Law officers, with the sanction of the Court, may abandon the proceedings and recommence the prosecution in an amended form, in which case the prisoner must be interrogated "de novo," and is free to make what answers and defence he may think proper.

10 and 11. If the party charged admits the facts, but denies their relevancy to support the charge, or if he simply denies the facts, the form of proceeding is the same. On being called upon to plead Guilty or Not guilty, he denies in general terms having committed the crime in the words following, "a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime et a fait choix de l'avocat" (the name) "pour son conseil." If the prisoner has admitted a part and denied a part of the charge in his interrogatory, or has otherwise qualified his answers, it is usual, after the words "commis le dit crime," to add, "au reste se référe à son interrogatoire."

12. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the relevancy of the charges, he is not thereby concluded as to the facts.

13. If the party charged confines himself to a denial of the facts, he is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy.

14. The party charged is entitled of right to the assistance of one counsel, whom he selects from among the Advocates: and of late years, in some instances, the Court has, at the prayer of the accused, allowed a second advocate to assist in the defence. Whether the party charged be able or not to defray the expense he is equally entitled and of right to legal assistance.

15. The constable, on producing a prisoner before the Court, warns all the witnesses to attend, both those against and those for the prisoner, who are punishable by fine or imprisonment for non-attendance: and, after commitment, the Queen's Law officers, as public prosecutors, compel the production of evidence oral or documentary, as well for the prosecution as for the defence, and, in both cases, at the expense of the Crown.

16. Evidence is first received before the prisoner is committed. It is taken in private and verbally by the Ordinary Court, composed of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and of two Jurats at the least.

17. The party, if accused au Grand criminel, (felony), is allowed to hear the evidence at the "Confrontation," a copy whereof has been delivered to him by the Queen's Greffier on the morning of that day. In cases of misdemeanour, he hears it at the trial.

18. If accused of a misdemeanor, the accused is allowed at the trial to produce evidence to meet the evidence produced against him; if au "grand criminel," he must, immediately after the "Confrontation," state the facts on which he wishes to have evidence and name his witnesses. If the Court considers the facts pertinent, leave is granted and the witnesses are examined "a futuro," and their depositions are added to the proceedings.

19. In cases of misdemeanor, the party accused is allowed to question the witnesses produced against him on the day of trial immediately after they have been examined by the Queen's Officers. In cases au "Grand Criminel," he examines them at the Confrontation, after their depositions and the "récolement" have been read to them in his presence, and in both instances on every part of the accusation.

20. In cases of misdemeanor there is no stage earlier than the "évocation des témoins" on the day of trial, after which fresh evidence may not be produced either for or against the party accused. In cases "au Grand criminel," the Queen's Law officers cannot produce fresh evidence "à charge" after the "confrontation;" but the prisoner may, as already observed in answer to question 18th, produce evidence (gallicé "témoins justificatifs") after the "Confrontation."

21. In cases of misdemeanor no evidence is taken down in writing: but in cases "au Grand criminel" all the evidence after the commitment ought to be taken down in writing; but of late years, in the lighter cases, the Court has allowed the witnesses to be heard on the day of trial "vivâ voce," as in cases of misdemeanor.

22. In cases of misdemeanor evidence is never taken in writing; in cases au "Grand Criminel," where all the evidence subsequently to the commitment is taken in writing, the witness at the "Récolement" is asked whether he has anything to add to or to diminish from his former deposition; and he is at full liberty either to add or to diminish; and his answer is recorded. He is then confronted with the prisoner in presence of the Queen's Law officers: his evidence is read in the presence of the prisoner, and is open to cross-examination.

23. The counsel for the party charged has the privilege of being heard on all questions of law and of fact, and may examine witnesses on every point connected with the accusation.

24. After all the witnesses for the prosecution and defence have been examined "vivâ voce," if the case be a misdemeanor, or after all the depositions for the prosecution and defence have been read, if the case be "au Grand Criminel," the prisoner is heard in his defence: after which, the Queen's Law officers, who may be considered as assessors to the Court, are bound to give their conclusions, without favour or partiality, for or against the prisoner, and to ask for the judgment which they conscientiously believe upon the examination of the whole matter the Court ought to give.

25. The functionaries deciding the law and the functionaries deciding the fact are the same, the Criminal Court, which in all matters of indictment is composed of the Bailiff or the Lieutenant Bailiff and seven Jurats at the least, except the prisoner consent to have his case decided by the Bailiff or Lieutenant Bailiff and six Jurats, which, in cases of small importance, has sometimes been done.

26. Judgment is awarded by the Criminal Court.

27. After the trial has commenced, the Court may adjourn the proceedings "de die in diem:" before the trial, the Court may suspend proceedings for a reasonable cause.

28. In all cases of crime, as already observed, the person charged and the witnesses are in the first instance produced before the Court by a constable or by an assistant constable: and if, on the examination of the witnesses, which takes place "vivâ voce" in private before the Court and in the presence of the Queen's law officers, there appears sufficient cause to put the prisoner on his trial, the accusation is put into writing and an Act of Court is passed committing him to prison for trial, in which case the commitment is as follows. "La Cour, après avoir pris par écrit l'interrogatoire du dit" (prisoner's name) "et entendu des témoins dignes de foi, a ordonné qu'il sera constitué prisonnier dans la prison publique pour que les Officiers de la Reine informent contre lui." Or admitting him to bail, in which case the following words are added to the commitment. "Sauf à lui de donner caution de £——" (the amount) "qu'il se présentera toutes fois et quantes qu'il en sera requis par les Officiers de la Reine." Or, in slight cases, admitting him to promise on oath to answer, in which case the Act of Commitment after the words "prison publique" is as follows. "Sauf à lui de donner sa caution juratoire qu'il se présentera toutes fois et quantes qu'il en sera requis par les Officiers de la Reine."

App. No. 1, A. and B.
App. No. 2, A. and B.
App. No. 2, I.

The Queen's law officers, being duly authorised to do so by the Act of Commitment, indict the prisoner by serving him with an "ajour," or summons for the next Court day, which "ajour" contains the accusation on which the interrogatory has been taken: and, if the charge be "au Grand Criminel," that is, for a crime "de quoy l'homme doit et peut perdre vie ou membre," they indict him "à se voir ajuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix pour avoir félonieusement, &c., &c." If the charge be for a misdemeanor, which makes the perpetrator liable to corporal punishment, they indict him "à se voir ajuger à telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel que la Cour trouvera condigne." And, if for a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, they indict him "à se voir ajuger à telle peine, punition ou amende." On the Court day for which the prisoner is summoned, the accusation against him is read, and he is asked, whether he is Guilty or Not Guilty. If he pleads Guilty, he is told to choose an Advocate for his counsel: and the Act of Court is as follows. "Remise à Samedi pour entendre les témoins et les conclusions des officiers de la Reine après que le dit" (prisoner's name) "a confessé avoir commis le dit crime et a fait choix de l'avocat" (the name) "pour son conseil." But, if he pleads Not guilty, the act of the Court is as follows. "Acteurs prouveront après que le dit" (prisoner's name) "a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime, et a fait choix de l'avocat" (the name) "pour son conseil." Should the prisoner in his interrogatory have denied part and admitted part, or should he have qualified his admission or denial of the charge, it is usual, though not absolutely necessary, after the words "le dit crime," to add "et au reste se référe à son interrogatoire, et a fait choix de l'avocat" (name) "pour son conseil."

App. No. 2, G. and H.

After the prisoner has chosen his counsel, the proceedings "au Grand Criminel" differ from those in cases of misdemeanor. In cases of misdemeanor, a second "ajour" or summons for the next Criminal Court day is served on the prisoner at the instance of Her Majesty's law officers, who subpœna all witnesses both for the prosecution and the defence at the expense of the Crown: and on the day appointed they are examined vivâ voce, and the trial takes place. But in cases "au Grand Criminel," after the Queen's officers are directed to prove and the prisoner has chosen his counsel, both which are done by one and the same Act of Court, the Queen's law officers subpœna the witnesses for the prosecution for any day the Court may appoint; they are examined before the ordinary Court, composed of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and of two Jurats at the least, in the presence of Her Majesty's law officers; and their evidence is taken down in writing by the Queen's Greffier.

App. No. 2, E.
App. No. 1, D.
App. No. 1, E.
App. No. 1, F.

The witnesses are again subpœnaed for a subsequent day pour être "récolés;" which is done as follows. Each witness is called separately before the Court in private, in the presence of Her Majesty's law officers, and is duly sworn to declare the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, in the matter then before the Court; after which his deposition previously taken is read to him, and he is asked if he have anything to add to or to diminish from his deposition; and his answer is put into writing.

App. No. 1, G.
App. No. 1, H.

After the "récolement," the witness, who has been previously subpœnaed for that purpose, is confronted with the prisoner. This is done as follows. He is called into Court in the presence of Her Majesty's law officers and of the prisoner and his counsel: the prisoner is then asked if he objects to the witness: if he does, he states for what reason; and a note in writing is taken of the objection, which is afterwards decided upon by the "Cour en Corps," composed of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and seven Jurats at the least. If he does not object to the witness this is also noted. The witness is then sworn; and his deposition and "récolement" are read: he is then asked if he knows the prisoner at the bar, or if he has referred to him; he is asked, whether the prisoner at the bar is the person he has referred to in his deposition under the name or designation of (as the case may be); and his answer is put into writing; the witness is then open to cross-examination by the prisoner and his counsel.

App. No. 1, I.
App. No. 1, K.

When the "confrontations" are finished, if the prisoner has advanced any fact tending to prove his innocence, the Court is bound to mention it to him, and also to ask him if there are any facts he wishes to prove and any witnesses he wishes to have examined. If he answer in the affirmative, he is told to mention the facts and to name the witnesses. If the facts are considered pertinent by the Court, leave is given to have the witnesses named examined, who are thereupon subpœnaed by the Queen's officers at the expense of the Crown for a future day, when they are examined and their deposition put into writing by the Greffier before the Ordinary Court, and in the presence of the prisoner and his counsel, and of the Queen's law officers.

When all the examinations are completed, the Queen's law officers again summon the prisoner for his trial. When all the evidence, as well for the prosecution as for the prisoner, has been read, the Counsel of the prisoner is heard in his defence; after which the Queen's law officers, whose duties are very different from those of a counsel for the prosecution in England, give their conclusions, in which they are bound to state the matter fairly and impartially, and to ask for such a judgment as they conscientiously believe the Court ought to give.

Should the Court consider the prisoner a fit object for Royal clemency, the fact is recorded in the judgment, which is pronounced by the Bailiff or his Lieutenant; and the interrogatory and evidence are transmitted to the Secretary of State with the Court's recommendation for mercy: this is, probably, the chief reason why, in cases "au Grand Criminel" which are in the jurisdiction of the Court, the evidence is put into writing.

App. No. 1, N.

In the three cases of "treason," "false coining," and "laying violent hands on the Bailiff and Jurats while in the execution of the duties of their office," the punishment of which is reserved to the Crown, all the proceedings in Guernsey are of necessity in writing.

Besides proceedings by indictment, it may be necessary to mention,—

App. No. 3.

1. That, as already observed, in answer to question 5, all petty offences are disposed of summarily by the Ordinary Court, sitting as a Court of Correctional Police. In these cases the constable informs the accused of the nature of the charge and requests him to give him the names of the witnesses he may require to have called for his defence; the constable then orders the accused and warns the witnesses, both for the prosecution and the defence, to be at Court on the following Thursday, when the matter is examined into and disposed of. The punishment awarded by the Ordinary Court, sitting as a Court of "Police Correctionnelle," never exceeds a moderate fine, or a month's imprisonment. In cases in "Police Correctionnelle" no costs are awarded; neither do the witnesses receive anything for their attendance.

App. No. 4, A. B. and C.

2. That criminal actions for penalties for the infringement of Acts of Parliament or of Ordinances are entered by both or by one of the Queen's Law officers, either "ex officio" or as adjoined to the informer, if there be one: and that, by an Order in Council of the 19th June 1844, fines, not exceeding Thirty Livres tournois, (2*l.* 2*s.* 1½*d.* stg.), may be sued for before the Ordinary Court at any time. Before the emanation of that Order such actions could only be brought before the "Cour en corps," sitting as a Criminal Court and during term.

App. No. 5, A.

3. That an action for libel or slander is entered by the person aggrieved, to whom one of the Crown Lawyers is adjoined by act of Court, the other being adjoined to the defendant, whence these causes are called "causes en adjonction." These actions are decided by the "Cour en corps," sitting as a Criminal Court and during term, and the punishment is an "amende honorable," or a fine, or both, to the party aggrieved, and a small fine to the Crown. Actions for assault and battery may be entered by the party aggrieved, which are proceeded with in a precisely similar manner as those for libel or slander. Actions en "Clameur de Haro" or en "Nouvelle Dessaisine," i. e. disturbance of real property, are brought before the Criminal Court. In these, one of the Crown Lawyers is adjoined to the Plaintiff, and the other to the Defendant "ab initio."

App. No. 5, B. and C.

29. By the Law of this Island there is no power of appeal in criminal proceedings.

30. If judgment be finally against the accused party, the Sheriff or the Deputy Sheriff carries it into effect. If the punishment be death, flogging, or the pillory, the Queen's Law officers and the Queen's Greffier must be present. If the prisoner be condemned to death or to banishment from the Island for seven years or upwards, his property real and personal is forfeited to the Crown or to the Lord of the Manor and taken possession of accordingly: and, if condemned to be transported to a penal settlement, due notice thereof is given to the Secretary of State; and the prisoner is detained in prison until the Sovereign's pleasure be known.

31. Forms of proceedings are sent herewith in an Appendix. No. 1. In cases "au Grand Criminal." No. 2. In cases for Misdemeanors. No. 3. In cases in Correctional Police. No. 4. In cases for Fines for infringement of Acts of Parliament or of Ordinances of the Court. And 5thly. In cases of Libel, Slander, "Clameur de Haro," and "Nouvelle Dessaisine."

As authentic copies of the oath taken by witnesses, and of the oaths of office of the Bailiff, Jurats, Crown Lawyers, Constables and Assistant Constables have been extracted from the Books by Her Majesty's Greffier to be forwarded to the Commissioners, I beg leave to refer them to those copies: but, should they require another copy from me, I shall be happy to send it.

32. The Bailiff, the Crown Lawyers, and the Greffier are appointed by the Crown during pleasure: the Jurats and the Sheriff are elected for life by the Elective States of this Island, composed of the Bailiff, Jurats, Clergy, Queen's Procureur, Constables and Douzeniers, in all 222 votes.

The Constables, two in each Parish, are elected by the rate payers and sworn into office by the Royal Court. They serve gratuitously, are the heads of the Police, preside the municipal body, here called the Douzaine, and are the Parish Treasurers; they may continue in office three years, but after serving one year may insist on a new election.

The Assistant Constables, of which there are some in the town only, are chosen by the Constables and Douzeniers, are usually master tradesmen; and their term of service is the same as that of the Constables.

All the beforementioned functionaries are removable for misconduct.

33. The Royal Court has criminal jurisdiction over all the Bailiwick, which comprises the Islands of Guernsey, Alderney, Serk, Herm, Jethou and Lihou; the Alderney Court is composed of a Judge and six Jurats; at Serk the Court is composed of a Senechal only, who has power to imprison for 24 hours, or to inflict a fine of Three Livres Tournois (4*s.* 3½*d.*).

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.
18 July, 1846.

All felonies and misdemeanors committed in those Islands are tried in Guernsey. Herm, Jethou and Lihou are very small islets never named in Acts of Parliament.

34. There are three defects in our proceedings, which, it appears to me, might easily be rectified.

1. The prisoner, in ordinary cases, does not know the names of the witnesses who are to be called against him, until the trial.

2. In cases au "Grand Criminal" a copy of the evidence is only given to the prisoner on the morning of the Confrontation.

3. A bare majority of one vote is sufficient to condemn a prisoner to death or to banishment for seven years or upwards, by which all his property real and personal is forfeited to the Crown, or to the Lord of the Manor.

4. It might, if practicable, be advisable that the functionaries who commit the prisoner should not, as at present, afterwards judge him.

Should our mode of proceeding be changed in this respect, notes of the depositions in all indictable cases ought, I think, to be taken by the Committing Court, and an authentic copy, at the expense of the Crown, be given to the Crown lawyers as public prosecutors, and another in a certain stage of the proceedings to the counsel for the prisoner. The present mode of taking evidence in writing au "Grand Criminal" might then, and probably with advantage, be abolished.

5. The number of witnesses, of which twelve only can now be called for the prosecution and twelve for the defence, might also be increased.

Interrogé.—Do you know the note of hand now exhibited to you?

A répondu.—Yes; it is of my handwriting.

Interrogé.—In whose handwriting is the endorsement, or the words "Frederick Mansell Jun." at the back of the said note of hand?

A répondu.—I believe in Mr. Mansell's.

Interrogé.—What makes you believe that the said endorsement is in the handwriting of the said Mr. Frederick Mansell, Jun.

A répondu.—Because I sent it to him in an enclosure, and it was returned to me endorsed.

Interrogé.—Did Mr. Mansell, previously to the 19th August, 1842, ever endorse notes of hand for you?

A répondu.—Yes.

Interrogé.—When, and how many times?

A répondu.—Mr. Mansell, with whom I had dealings to the amount of 400*l.* to 500*l.*, on two or three occasions lent me his signature to obtain money at the Bank.

Interrogé.—Did you, on the 19th August, 1842 or thereabouts, offer and negociate the note of hand marked "A" and bearing the endorsement "Frederick Mansell Jun." to and with Mr. Utermarck, one of the Directors of the "Guernsey Banking Company," or to and with Mr. Vaucour, a clerk of the said Company?

A répondu.—Yes; I did.

Interrogé.—What value did you receive from the said Banking Company for the said note of hand?

A répondu.—I owed 60*l.* and interest to the said Bank, and I gave them the said note of hand on account, and paid them the remainder.

Interrogé.—You have stated you sent the note of hand marked "A" to Mr. Frederick Mansell Jun. and that it was returned endorsed, state by whom you sent him the said note?

A répondu.—I decline answering the question until my trial, when I shall produce the party by whom I sent the note.

Interrogé.—On or about the 3rd November, 1842, did you promise the Court of Alderney on oath that you would come to this Island and give the Bank of Messrs. Priaulx, Le Marchant, Rougier and Co. all the necessary information concerning the endorsement in question?

A répondu.—Yes.

Interrogé.—Did you shortly after the 3rd of November return to this Island?

A répondu.—I did.

Interrogé.—Did you call at the said Bank, or give them the promised information?

A répondu.—No, I did not; the ship in which I came from Alderney having arrived at eleven o'clock at night, when I was informed the Police was looking out for me; but the next morning I sent my agent, Mr. Boyd, to the Bank to say I was arrived, and, receiving no answer and finding Mr. Mansell was absent from the Island, I kept myself secreted a few days, and then returned to Alderney, where I had left my family, and where I was taken up on the 23rd November last, and subsequently sent here in the custody of the Sheriff.

Interrogé.—In what boat did you go to Alderney the last time?

A répondu.—In a boat from St. Sampson or the Vale; but I do not know the name of the boat or of the owner.

Interrogé.—What did you pay for your passage?

A répondu.—Two Pounds.

Interrogé.—At the time you left this Island for Alderney did you know there was a "décret de prise de corps" against you, and that the Police was looking for you?

A répondu.—I knew the Police was looking for me.

Interrogé.—Was the boat in which you went to Alderney called the Neptune?

A répondu.—I am not certain; it was an open boat, cutter rigged, and had Number 1. marked on the mainsail.

Le 14e Décembre, 1842, devant Jean Guille, Ecuyer, Juge Délégué, présens Jean Hubert et Hilary Ollivier Carré, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Frederic Mansell, Junieur, Ecuyer, âgé de 34 ans ou environ, témoin des Officiers de la Reine en la cause qu'ils ont contre George Faulkner, fils de George, prisonnier dans la prison publique, aux fins d'acte du 10e Décembre, 1842, a déclaré par serment comme suit, savoir,

Un billet à ordre étiqueté "A." et dont suit copie,

£50. St. Martin's, August 19th, 1842.

Six months after date I promise to pay Mr. F. Mansell, Junr., or order the sum of Fifty Pounds, for value received.

ayant été exhibé au dit témoin.

Etant interrogé.—Do you know the promissory note now exhibited to you, and, if so, declare all you know about it?

A répondu.—I never saw this bill before it was shown to me by Mr. Utermarck at the Bank, I believe, in October last, when I immediately told him that the signature "Fredk. Mansell, Junr.," at the back of the said bill was a forgery.

Etant interrogé.—Are the words or endorsement "Fredk. Mansell, Junr.," at the back of the said bill in your hand writing?

A répondu.—I declare most solemnly that they are not, that they are forged.

Etant interrogé.—Do you know in whose hand writing is the signature "George Faulkner" at the foot of the promissory note marked "A" now exhibited to you?

A répondu.—I think it is in the hand writing of George Faulkner the prisoner.

Etant interrogé.—Have you ever lent your signature to the prisoner for the purpose of obtaining money at the Bank?

A répondu.—Never. He has given me bills on the Bank which have been paid, but this was a long time ago.

Monsieur James Frecker, agé de 50 ans, ou environ, témoin comme dessus en la dite cause, a declaré par serment comme suit, savoir:—

Un billet à ordre étiqueté "A" par la Cour, ayant été exhibé au témoin.

Etant interrogé.—Connoissez-vous le billet à ordre à vous présentement exhibé?

A répondu.—Non.

Etant interrogé.—Connoissez-vous l'écriture de Monsieur Frederic Mansel, Junieur?

A répondu.—Oui, je l'ai connue depuis son enfance, y ayant présentement trente ans que je suis dans son comptoir.

Etant interrogé.—La signature ou les mots ou endossement à l'endos du dit billet "Fredk. Mansell Junr." sont ils de l'écriture du dit Monsieur Mansell, Junieur?

A répondu.—Non, le k., à la fin du prénom Fredk., est différent de l'écriture de Monsieur Mansell, et la signature en entier n'est pas si ferme ni aisée, Anglicé "so bold," que la véritable signature de Monsieur Mansell.

Monsieur Henri Boyd agé de 23 ans ou environ, témoin comme dessus en la dite cause, a declaré par serment comme suit, savoir:—

Un billet à ordre étiqueté par la Cour "A" ayant été exhibé au témoin.

Etant interrogé.—Do you know the promissory note now exhibited to you?

A répondu.—I think the prisoner shewed it to me the day he took it to the Bank, when I lent him ten pounds, being the difference between this bill and another of sixty pounds which I knew he owed the Bank, as, in the month of August, 1841, he called at my office and told me the Bank claimed payment of a sum he owed them, and asked me, if I thought they would take a bill with Mr. Mansell Junr.'s endorsement for sixty pounds, Mr. Mansell being willing to oblige him with the loan of his name for that amount, as he Faulkner had spent money with Mr. Mansell for beer to the amount of four or five hundred pounds. I said I thought they would, and accompanied him to the Bank, where, to the best of my recollection, Mr. Utermarck drew out a bill for sixty pounds, which Faulkner signed and took away to obtain Mr. Frederick Mansell's Junr.'s endorsement. On leaving Faulkner, he gave me the bill, requesting me, if I saw Mr. Mansell Junr., to get it endorsed, I did not see Mr. Mansell Junr. that day. On the following morning a boy called on me with a note from Faulkner requesting to know whether I had had the bill endorsed, and if not, desiring me to enclose it in an envelope addressed to Mr. Mansell Junr., and give it to the boy, as Mr. Mansell Junr. was going to Richmond or Lihou, and he wished Mr. Mansell to endorse the bill that day. Shortly after, Faulkner requested me to draw up a billet by which himself and wife acknowledged they owed sixty pounds to Mr. Mansell Junr., in order that it might be registered on their estate as a security for the bill given or to be given to the Bank. The billet I drew up did not bear interest, as Faulkner was to pay the interest of the advance to the Bank, the billet has never been passed, and I believe I have still got it in my possession. I wish to add, that from the moment I gave the bill drawn up by Mr. Utermarck to the boy, as already declared, I entirely lost sight of it and know nothing more about it. About six weeks or two months ago, Mr. Frecker, Mr. Mansell Junr.'s clerk, called on me, as Mr. Faulkner's attorney, and asked payment of an account of about thirty pounds; on my saying I had no funds in hand, he observed he must have a registry on Faulkner's property for that sum, on which I observed that, when he wrote to Faulkner on the subject, he had better request him to consent to a registry for fifty pounds amount due to the Old Bank by Faulkner, and for which Mr. Frederick Mansell Junr. had remained security, on this, Mr. Frecker denied the existence of any such bill at the Bank; I however insisted that such was the case, but added that, as Mr. Mansell had probably done it to oblige Faulkner, it was likely he had not mentioned it, and requested Mr. Frecker to say nothing about it to Mr. Mansell, which he promised. This took place on a Friday, the next morning, however, Mr. Mansell called me out of court and told me the bill was a forgery, as he had never endorsed any bill for Faulkner. Mr. Mansell expressed himself in strong terms on the Bank having taken paper with his signature without his going there, and added that, if they did not prosecute Faulkner, he would. The morning after Faulkner's arrival in this Island in November last, at about eight o'clock, I received a letter from him, requesting me to call at the Old Bank for the purpose of arranging and paying the promissory note now in question, as he was on oath in Alderney to present himself at the Bank for that purpose. Having other occupations, I only saw Mr. Collings at about half past eleven o'clock, who was then accompanied by one of the Constables. I asked Mr. Collings if the matter could be arranged by paying the money or giving security, he said no, the matter being in the hands of the Police.

Etant interrogé.—Are you well acquainted with the prisoner George Faulkner's hand writing?

A répondu.—I have repeatedly seen it.

Etant interrogé.—Is the promissory note marked "A" by the Court now exhibited to you in George Faulkner's handwriting?

A répondu.—Yes decidedly.

Etant interrogé.—Did or do you know the boy to whom the bill was given by you as mentioned in your deposition?

A répondu.—No.

T. S. C. D. Uttermark, Ecuyer, âgé de 56 ans ou environ, témoin comme dessus en la dite cause, a déclaré par serment comme suit, savoir:—

Un billet à ordre étiqueté "A." par la Cour, et dont suit copie,

£50. St. Martin's, August 19th, 1842.

Six months after date I promise to pay Mr. F. Mansell, Jun., the sum of Fifty Pounds, for value received.

ayant été exhibé au témoin.

Etant interrogé.—Do you know the promissory note now exhibited to you, and if so, declare all you know about it.

A répondu.—I am one of the managers of the Guernsey Banking Company, and the note now exhibited to me was brought to the bank on the 19th August last by the prisoner, and given in part payment of another note of sixty pounds due that day by him to the Guernsey Banking Company, the balance, interest and commission, were paid in cash.

Etant interrogé.—Did the said bill marked "A.", at the time it was given to the Guernsey Banking Company in payment, bear the endorsement "Frederick Mansell Jun." now at the back of the said bill?

A répondu.—It did.

Etant interrogé.—Did you apprise Mr. Frederick Mansell Jun. of the circumstance?

A répondu.—We did not, it is not customary for us so to do.

Etant interrogé.—Was the promissory note of sixty pounds, for which you state the note marked "A." was given in part payment, endorsed?

A répondu.—It was in the same manner as the one now shown me.

Mr. Charles Waterman Vaucour, âgé de 23 ans ou environ, témoin comme dessus en la dite cause, a déclaré par serment comme suit, savoir:—

Etant interrogé.—What is your name and profession, and where do you usually reside?

A déclaré.—I am a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Priaulx, Le Marchant, Rougier and Co., forming the company called the Guernsey Banking Company, and reside in the town of this Island.

Un billet à ordre étiqueté par la Cour "A." et dont suit copie,

Sieur Servington Wyatt, âgé de 35 ans, ou environ témoin comme dessus en la dite cause, a déclaré par serment comme suit, savoir.

Etant interrogé.—What is your trade or profession, and where do you usually reside?

A répondu.—I am a farmer and live at St. Martin's.

Etant interrogé.—Declare all you know concerning the accusation of forgery against the prisoner now before the Court?

A répondu.—On the night of the prisoner's arrival from Alderney, he requested me to send a letter to Mr. Boyd, the law agent, which I did by a little boy named William Brice who lives with me. I told the boy to wait for an answer, and, on the boy's return, he told me the answer from Mr. Boyd was, that the person who wished to see him must be there at nine o'clock in the evening; the prisoner told me he wished to see Mr. Boyd, as Mr. Mansell was away from the Island, and if he showed himself before Mr. Mansell's return, he might be detained, and that he wanted Mr. Boyd to go to the bank; the constables came to me to look for the prisoner in the course of the day. Faulkner, who had been away all day, came in the evening, when I told him the constables were after him, on which he went away, and I have not seen him since.

Etant interrogé.—What is the age of the boy William Brice?

A répondu.—About thirteen.

Le 19e Décembre, 1842, devant Jean Guillle, Ecuyer, Juge Délégué, présens Jean Hubert et H. O. Carré, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Frederic Mansell Jun., Esq., témoin des Officiers de la Reine en la cause qu'ils ont contre George Faulkner, fils de George, prisonnier dans la prison publique aux fins d'acte du 10e Décembre, 1842, ayant été fait convenir devant la Cour pour être récolé sur sa déposition prise devant la Cour le 14e Decembre, 1842, a déclaré par serment qu'il confirme et corrobore sa dite déposition, et qu'il n'a rien à y ajouter ou à y diminuer.

Mr. James Frecker, témoin des dits Officiers de la Reine en la dite cause contre le dit George Faulkner, ayant été fait convenir comme dessus, a déclaré par serment comme dessus, et ajoute.—"I am Mr. Frederic Mansell Junior's clerk: one morning I observed to him it was necessary to ascertain respecting the affairs of Faulkner, as he owed an accompt of about 30*l.* to Mr. Mansell. I then went to Mr. Henry Boyd (Mr. Faulkner's law agent) and applied to him to know how Faulkner's affairs stood, observing to him the necessity of registering Mr. Mansell's claim on Faulkner's property. Mr. Boyd replied I ought to include the bill at the Bank. I exclaimed what bill? He said Mr. Mansell's bill. I said what, of Faulkner's? Mr. Boyd said yes. I said that is impossible. Mr. Boyd said he had seen the bill, that it had been renewed, that the old bill was of 60*l.*, and that he had paid the 10*l.* difference between the two bills out of his own pocket. He (Boyd) further wished me to keep the matter secret, but I considered it my duty to communicate it to Mr. F. Mansell Jun., which I did, when he expressed great surprise and denied positively knowing anything of the bill. Mr. Mansell and myself left the office, and Mr. Mansell went to the Bank, and on his return told me that he had seen the bill, but the endorsement was not his signature. I wish to add, that three or four years ago the prisoner gave us several bills which Mr. Mansell paid to the Commercial Bank, having endorsed them as a matter of course; these bills must have been taken up by the prisoner when due, who by those means must have obtained Mr. Mansell's signature."

Monsieur Henri Boyd, témoin des dits Officiers de la Reine en la dite cause contre le dit Faulkner, ayant été fait convenir comme dessus, a déclaré par serment comme dessus, excepté "that I am a law agent, and that it was in that capacity I acted for the prisoner, and knew nothing of him until I acted for him professionally."

T. S. C. D. Utermarck, Ecuyer, témoin des dits Officiers de la Reine en la dite cause contre le dit George Faulkner, ayant été fait convenir comme dessus, a déclaré par serment comme dessus.

Le 19e Décembre, 1842, devant Jean Guille, Ecuyer, Juge Délégué, présens Jean Hubert et Hilary Ollivier Carré, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Frederic Mansell Junieur, Ecuyer, témoin des Officiers de la Reine, ayant été fait convenir devant la Cour et été confronté avec George Faulkner, prisonnier dans la prison publique, en la cause que les dits Officiers de la Reine ont contre le dit Faulkner, aux fins d'Acte du 10e Décembre, 1842, le dit Faulkner ayant été interrogé s'il a aucun reproche contre le dit témoin, a le prisonnier déclaré s'opposer à la déclaration du dit Monsieur Mansell, soutenant qu'il n'est témoin idoine, ayant intérêt dans la question, et le prisonnier ayant toute raison de croire que la signature "Frederic Mansell Jun." à l'endos du dit billet est la véritable signature du dit Monsieur Mansell, ensuite de quoi la Cour a procédé à la dite confrontation, sans préjudice au dit saön que le dit prisonnier pourra faire valoir en temps et lieu; après quoi, le dit témoin ayant été sermenté de nouveau et après qu'on lui a lû sa déposition et récolement en présence du dit Faulkner, et de son conseil l'Avocat Falla,

Etant interrogé.—(Par la Cour.) Is the prisoner at the bar the person you allude to in your deposition under the name of George Faulkner?

A répondu.—Yes.

Etant interrogé.—What is your profession, and where do you reside?

A répondu.—I am a brewer, and reside in the parish of Saint Peter Port.

Etant interrogé.—(Par le Prisonnier.) How long have you known the prisoner?

A répondu.—Four or five years.

Etant interrogé.—Were you at any time pretty free and intimate with him.

A répondu.—Never.

Etant interrogé.—While you have known him has he been in the habit of coming to your Brewery pretty often?

A répondu.—Occasionally.

Etant interrogé.—Was he ever in the counting-house of the Brewery alone with you?

A répondu.—He may have been, but, generally speaking, Mr. Frecker was present.

Etant interrogé.—In September last did the prisoner go to Alderney to establish a brewery?

A répondu.—I heard so, but don't know it of myself.

Etant interrogé.—Have you been in the habit of sending beer to Alderney from your Brewery for a number of years?

A répondu.—Yes.

Etant interrogé.—Has the prisoner ever asked you to remain security or endorse bills for him?

A répondu.—No; but he asked me to lend him some money.

Etant interrogé.—Did you know Thomas Torode when living as a servant with the prisoner, and are you aware that he has left the island?

A répondu.—I don't know such a man.

Et a le prisonnier déclaré n'avoir d'autre interrogats à lui faire.

Etant interrogé.—(Par le Prisonnier.) To whom does the Brewery at Country Mansell belong?

A répondu.—The building belongs to Mr. Frederick Mansell Sen.

Etant interrogé.—Who keeps the cash received at the Brewery?

A répondu.—I do.

Etant interrogé.—Do you give an account of the cash received at the Brewery to Mr. Frederick Mansell Sen.?

A répondu.—No.

Etant interrogé.—How often does Mr. Frederic Mansell Sen. go the Brewery to examine the books?

A répondu.—When he is in the Island, almost every day.

Etant interrogé.—Do you mean to say that Mr. Frederic Mansell Jun. does not receive a fixed salary from his father?

A répondu.—No, he does not.

Etant interrogé.—How do you know it.

A répondu.—By our books, and, if he did, I should have to pay it myself, being the cashier.

Etant interrogé.—Do you pay all accounts due by the Brewery?

A répondu.—Yes, when ordered to do so by Mr. Mansell Jun.

Etant interrogé.—To whom do you pay any balance of cash you may have in hand?

A répondu.—To Mr. Mansell Jun.

Etant interrogé.—How long have you known the prisoner?

A répondu.—I can't say positively, perhaps about ten years.

Etant interrogé.—During the time you have known the prisoner, has he dealt at the Brewery

A répondu.—Yes.

Etant interrogé.—In the month of September last did the prisoner go to Alderney to establish a brewery?

A répondu.—I don't know in what month, but previous to his going he told me he was going to Alderney, but did not say it was to establish a brewery.

Etant interrogé.—Did you try to dissuade him from going to Alderney?

A répondu.—Yes.

Etant interrogé.—Did you tell him it would be better for him to remain in Guernsey to take again the Canteen at the Fort?

A répondu.—Yes, I think I did.

Etant interrogé.—Did you tell him that you had no doubt Mr. Mansell would remain security for him?

A répondu.—I don't recollect, but I don't apprehend Mr. Mansell would have objected giving that security.

Etant interrogé.—After you had tried to dissuade the prisoner from going to Alderney, did you call on him a second time to dissuade him from going?

A répondu.—Not to my recollection.

Etant interrogé.—Did you tell him, if he remained in Guernsey he might have a chance of having your place at the Brewery?

A répondu.—No, I do not recollect it.

Etant interrogé.—Did you tell the prisoner that Mr. Frederic Mansell had discharged your two sons?

A répondu.—I can't say.

Etant interrogé.—Did you tell the prisoner, that Mr. Mansell had given you a month's warning after thirty two years' service and without any blame on your part?

A répondu.—On the contrary, it was I that gave Mr. Mansell warning; but if I mentioned it to the prisoner or not I can't say.

Etant interrogé.—To whom did you give that warning, to Mr. Mansell Sen. or to Mr. Mansell Jun?

A répondu.—To Mr. Mansell Jun.

Etant interrogé.—Previously to giving warning to Mr. Mansell Jun. had you spoken about it to Mr. Mansell Sen.?

A répondu.—No, but I did afterwards.

Etant interrogé.—On the oath you have taken, when you gave that warning, had you the intention of leaving?

A répondu.—Yes, I had.

Etant interrogé.—Have you always found the prisoner honest and straightforward in his dealings?

A répondu.—Very much so indeed.

Etant interrogé.—(Par la Cour.) Who carried on the business at the Brewery in August last, and who carries it on now?

A répondu.—Mr. Mansell Jun.

Etant interrogé.—How long has he carried it on

A répondu.—About seven years.

Etant interrogé.—(Par le Prisonnier.) Were you in the habit of sending beer to Alderney?

A répondu.—Yes, to Mr. Scott and one or two persons to whom we still send some.

Et a le prisonnier déclaré n'avoir d'autre interrogats à lui faire.

Mons. Henri Boyd, témoin comme dessus, confronté avec le dit Faulkner en la dite cause contre le dit Faulkner aux fins d'acte du 10e Décembre, 1842, le dit Faulkner n'ayant de reproche contre le dit témoin comme dessus.

Etant interrogé.—(Par la Cour,) Is the prisoner at the bar the person you allude to in your deposition under the name of Faulkner?

A répondu.—Yes.

Etant interrogé.—(Par le Prisonnier.) When the prisoner requested you to take a registry on behalf of Mr. Mansell on his property for the amount of the bill of 60*l.* endorsed by Mr. F. Mansell Jun., do you consider that the registry would be perfectly safe?

A répondu.—Yes, the price asked for the property was 400*l.* and seventeen quarters, and there was at that time registries but to the amount of 100*l.* or thereabouts, an offer of 350*l.* was made for it and refused by Mr. Faulkner, this would have left a bonus of upwards of 200*l.* to Faulkner, part of which I should have applied to the payment of his other debts and given him the balance.

Et a le prisonnier déclaré n'avoir d'autre interrogats à lui faire.

A répondu.—Yes.

Etant interrogé.—(Par le Prisonnier.) Have you discounted bills at the Bank with the endorsement of other parties but Mr. Mansell, more particularly with Mr. Preed?

A répondu.—Yes.

Etant interrogé.—How many bills have been placed at the Bank by the prisoner with Mr. Mansell's endorsement?

A répondu.—Three; the first was given on the 14th August, 1841, for 60*l.*, the second on the 16th or 17th February, 1842, also for 60*l.*, and the third, which is the bill in question, on the 19th August last.

Etant interrogé.—Was the first bill handed over by you to Mr. Joseph Collings Jun., and did he say it was all right?

A répondu.—I believe so.

Etant interrogé.—Has the amount of the bill now in question marked "A" been offered to the Bank?

A répondu.—Not to my knowledge.

Etant interrogé.—Is the signature at the back of the bill marked "A" similar, as far as you know, to the other endorsement on the two former bills?

Etant interrogé.—S'il est coupable de la dite accusation.

A répondu.—I am not guilty.

Etant interrogé.—Have you had a quantity of lead in your possession?

A répondu.—Yes; it was given me to sell by a person whose name I do not wish to tell. I would rather be punished myself than say who it was.

Etant interrogé.—On what day?

A répondu.—Last Tuesday morning.

Etant interrogé.—Have you offered it for sale?

A répondu.—Yes, to a Frenchman who keeps a shop opposite the King's Weights, who told me he had orders from Mr. Renouff to stop it, as he had some stolen from his premises.

Une quantité de plomb ayant été exhibé au prisonnier.

Etant interrogé.—Is the lead now exhibited to you the same that was given to you and that you offered for sale to the Frenchman?

A répondu.—Yes.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

The Answers of John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Her Majesty's Contrôle at Guernsey to the first Series of Questions.

I think my answers will be better understood by my giving previously a short summary of our criminal proceedings.

Persons charged with having committed indictable offences are taken up by the constables or police, of which there are two in each parish throughout the Island, and brought before the Court at a private sitting. The constable also warns whatever witnesses he considers necessary to support the charge. The Court is composed of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant, two or more Jurats, the law officers of the Crown (Procureur and Comptroller) and the Greffier. The witnesses are sworn in presence of the prisoner, who then retires in the custody of the constable, and the witnesses are heard on oath separately, without their deposition being committed to writing. Should the evidence not be sufficient for a committal, the Court either discharge the prisoner, in which case no part of the proceedings is recorded, or remand him "pour plus ample information." Should the evidence warrant a committal for trial, an "acte d'accusation" is drawn up against the prisoner, who is then introduced, and is questioned by the Court in an "interrogatoire," being first cautioned that what he says will be taken down in writing and produced on his trial. The prisoner then withdraws, and the "acte d'accusation" remains in the following form:—

A. B. (prisoner) ayant été ce jour produit devant la Cour par C. D. (Constable) étant accusé d'avoir (here the charge is stated at full length in the technical language of an indictment). La Cour, après avoir entendu des témoins dignes de foi et pris par écrit l'interrogatoire du dit A. B., a ordonné qu'il sera constitué prisonnier dans la prison publique, (sauf à lui de donner caution de £ stg., if the offence be bailable) pour que les officiers de la Reine informent contre lui.

Subsequently, the law officers send a summons to the prisoner, in which the charge is set forth as in the "acte d'accusation," and, on the following Saturday (in term), he is brought to the bar of the Court by the Sheriff to plead Guilty or Not guilty to the indictment preferred against him at the suit of the law officers, and exactly conformable to his summons, and choose his counsel. A record of the "acte" runs as follows, after detailing the indictment, "Les Officiers de la Reine prouveront, après que le dit A. B. a fait niance d'avoir (or "a confessé avoir") commis le dit crime et a fait choix de l'Avocat —— pour son conseil."

Should the prisoner admit part of the charge, the words "au reste se référe à son interrogatoire" are added after "a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime."

The advocate chosen is bound to defend the prisoner, and does so without fee, if the prisoner cannot afford payment; the prisoner also receives (gratis if he cannot pay) a copy of his "interrogatoire" as soon after his committal as he pleases.

Three days at least before the day of trial, the prisoner receives another summons from the law officers containing an exact recital of the "acte" passed when he chose counsel.

The law officers send summonses to their witnesses, who cannot exceed twelve in number, and the prisoner may send summonses to a similar number, all which summonses are carried gratis by the Queen's serjeant, the attendance of all the witnesses being paid by the Crown.

The proceedings of trial for all offences not described in the indictment as felonious (which I shall distinguish as "au Criminal ordinaire") are as follows. The Court, which must be "en corps," that is composed of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and at least seven Jurats, all or any of whom may have been present at the former proceedings, sits in public. The indictment is read by the Greffier. The Crown witnesses are brought to the bar, and next the prisoner's witnesses, and any objection to their competency is taken and decided upon before they are sworn. They are then sworn in a body, and made to retire in the custody of the serjeant, if required; after which, one of the law officers reads the interrogatoire, and the Crown witnesses are severally called and examined by the law officers of the Crown and cross-examined by the prisoner's counsel: the prisoner's witnesses are then examined by the prisoner's counsel and cross-examined by the law officers: each member of the Court being also at liberty to put questions to the witnesses. The prisoner's counsel then addresses the Court upon any technical objection he may have to the proceedings or indictment, and also upon the whole case. The Law Officers of the Crown then each address the Court, and are bound to lay the law of the case and every fact bearing upon it fairly before the Court; they give their "conclusions" as to what punishment they pray the Court to inflict, and, should they deem the case not proved or doubtful, they so state it. The Bailiff then sums up and generally proposes the sentence he thinks adequate to the case. Lastly, each Jurat severally pronounces his opinion, as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner and the appropriate punishment: and the majority of the votes of the Jurats (or the Bailiff's casting vote, if the Court be equally divided) determines the guilt and the punishment. The Bailiff then communicates the sentence of the Court to the prisoner: and his innocence, or the amount of punishment awarded, is recorded at the end of the indictment.

The proceedings for offences described in the indictment as felonious (which I shall distinguish as "au Grand Criminel") are similar, as far as the pleading to the indictment and choice of Counsel. On a day subsequent to this proceeding, the Court, composed as it is for the committal of prisoners, i. e., of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant, two or more Jurats, the Law Officers and Greffier, swear and examine the witnesses of the Crown separately in a private sitting, each question and answer being taken in writing accurately by the Greffier. When the whole Crown evidence is completed, and on a subsequent day, the Crown witnesses are again brought separately in private before the Court (constituted as before) to be "récolés;" they are again sworn; and, the whole of the deposition of each witness having be enread over to him, he confirms or amends it as occasion may be. On the same or a subsequent day, the Crown witnesses are a third time brought separately in private before the Court (constituted as before) to be "confrontés." On the morning of that day, the prisoner receives a copy of their first deposition and "récolement." At the sitting of the Court, each witness is sworn in presence of the prisoner and his Counsel; and, the whole of his first deposition and récolement having been read, the witness is asked whether the prisoner is the person he alludes to in his deposition under the name given. The witness is then cross-examined by the prisoner's counsel, each question and answer being taken in writing accurately by the Greffier: the Court have a right, during this proceeding, of putting any new question to the witness, which is also taken in writing with the answer, by the Greffier. The prisoner's counsel at the close of this proceeding is bound to state whether he requires any witnesses and to prove what facts generally; of this a record is taken; and on a subsequent day the prisoner's witnesses are each separately and privately examined by the prisoner's counsel and cross-examined by the Court (constituted as before); and this is also committed accurately to writing by the Greffier.

An authentic copy of the whole of these proceedings is furnished to the Law Officers and to the prisoner some days before the day of trial. The trial takes place before the Court "en corps:" and the mode of proceeding is as follows. The Interrogatoire and the whole written evidence (i. e. the deposition of each Crown witness in chief, his récolement, confrontation, and the deposition of the prisoner's witnesses) is read by the Law Officers of the Crown, no vivâ voce evidence being heard. After this, the prisoner's counsel addresses the Court upon the whole case. The trial proceeds as in cases au "Criminel Ordinaire."

In all cases of trials upon indictment, the verdict of Guilty of any part entails a condemnation to costs. These, in cases au Criminel ordinaire, may run from 4*l.* to 5*l.*; in cases au Grand Criminel, average 10*l.* to 12*l.*

I do not introduce, in the preceding summary or in my answers to the Commissioners questions, any part of or remarks upon the proceedings "au petit Criminel," as I do not think them relevant to the matters now under enquiry.

Answers.

1. I was admitted Advocate of the Royal Court in April, 1839, and continued to practise until I received the appointment of Contrôle de la Reine or Solicitor General in September, 1845; which I now hold.

2. The Royal Court, composed of the Bailiff and twelve Jurats. Their jurisdiction can be traced to the time of King John and existed previously; it extends to all offences committed in the Bailiwick, with the three exceptions detailed in the following extract from the Precepte d'Assize compiled by Commissioners sent to the Island by Edward III. in 1331.

"Excepté toutefois, que, selon l'ancienne accoutumance de la dite Ile, la punition de trois certains cas, s'ils échéent illecques, est réservée par excellence à la couronne tout seulement: c'est à savoir, le premier est de cas de Trahison, le second est de Faux Monnoieur, et le tiers est de Mettre et Apposer les mains injurieusement en la personne du dit Bailiff ou d'aucun des dits Jurés en faisant et exerçant leurs offices, desquels cas la cognoissance doit être cognue illecques, et la punition à la dite couronne."

There seems to be some doubt whether, in these particular cases, the Court ought to decide upon the guilt of the offenders; they however do so in practice; the punishment is awarded by Her Majesty.

3. Le Grand Coustumier de Normandie, as commented upon by Terrien and approved by an Order in Council of 1583, forms the basis of the Criminal Law of Guernsey. The following French authors are those principally made use of in amplification of the principles contained in Terrien:—

Jousse, Traité de la Justice Criminelle en France, 1771.

De la Combe, Traité des Matières Criminelles, first published in 1741.

Serpillon, Code Criminel, ou Comentaire sur l'Ordonnance de 1670, published in 1762.

The Common Law of England and the precedents of the Royal Court are also frequently referred to.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

4. One of the Constables of the parish in which the offence has been committed inquires into its details, and, according to its nature, either apprehends the offender and puts him in prison, or warns him to appear before the Court on the following Thursday. The Constable is bound to report the different circumstances of the case to the Bailiff and Law officers without delay, and receives their instructions, as to the custody of the person charged until he can be produced, and the ordering of witnesses to appear in support of the charge.

5. A section of the Royal Court, called la Cour Ordinaire, and composed of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and two or more Jurats (seldom or ever exceeding four), sits publicly every Thursday in the year, and oftener if required, and disposes summarily of all cases in which the offence charged is considered, if proved, to be adequately punished by an imprisonment not exceeding one month, the whole or any part of which may be solitary and on bread and water, by a moderate fine, or, when the offender has no settlement in the Island, by his being condemned to find bail for his future good conduct or to leave the Island.

6. For the first part of this question I beg leave to refer to the preceding summary. The Constable who examines into the charge has a discretionary power to apprehend the prisoner and put him immediately into prison; as soon as an "Acte" of the Court has been passed against a prisoner, he is under the custody of the Sheriff, who is bound to be present at all sittings of the Court, and who conducts him to prison or takes bail for his appearance according to the tenor of the "Acte." The Court has also the power of accepting the "caution Juratoire" of the prisoner that he will present himself before them when called upon.

7. This question is fully answered in the preceding summary.

8. The original proceeding states the name of the Constable who produces the prisoner; the subsequent proceedings are in the name of the Law officers. The Court may, at any stage of the proceedings, direct that they be abandoned: in practice they do so in two cases: when the prisoner is admitted as evidence for the Crown, or when some error in the proceedings is discovered at any time before the commencement of the trial: in which latter case, the Law officers pray the Court to allow them to abandon the accusation in its erroneous form and to commence entirely "de novo;" if the Court approve of this, the prisoner can take no advantage of it, and no part of the previous proceedings can be made use of.

9. The first part of this question is answered in the preceding summary; the charge can be varied or altered at any time before the commencement of the trial, but, as the whole proceedings must then strictly be commenced de novo, the accused has the same time for remodelling and improving his defence as he had to prepare his original case.

10 and 11. These questions are answered in the summary.

12. He is not.

13. He is not.

14. The principal part of this is answered in the summary. One advocate only can be heard for the prisoner; but he may have the advice of a second.

15. The Constable who produces the prisoner warns the witnesses he thinks proper, and those which the prisoner may ask to be heard, to attend; and they are severally liable to punishment at the discretion of the Court if they disobey his orders. After his commital for trial, the witnesses on both sides are summoned by the Queen's Serjeant and are liable to fine for non-attendance. The Law officers are bound to use every effort for the production of the best evidence that can be procured: and any expense, required for the production of evidence for the defence, is defrayed by the Crown.

16. This question is answered in the summary.

17. In cases described in the summary as au Criminel Ordinaire, on the day of trial; in those au Grand Criminel, on the day of the confrontation.

18 and 19. These are also answered in the summary.

20. No evidence can be produced, against or in favour of the party accused, au Criminel Ordinaire, when the examination of the witnesses has commenced; au Grand Criminel, none can be produced against him when the confrontation has begun, nor in his favour after the evidence has once been closed.

21. This is also answered in the summary.

22. The former part of this question is answered in the summary. As all the written evidence is taken in presence of the Court and in fact by the members of the Court, I do not conceive that the prisoner can ever be allowed to prove that the evidence given against him is not correctly detailed. It is his Counsel's duty to see the cross-examination of the Crown witnesses and the examination of his own witnesses correctly stated.

23. The rules observed in England for examination and cross-examination of witnesses by the respective Counsel are adhered to as nearly as possible. Every possible latitude is allowed to the prisoner's Counsel in his address to the Court.

24, 25, and 26. These are answered in the summary.

27. The Court has the power of delaying the day of trial on the application of the Law Officers or the prisoner's Counsel, and for any reasonable cause. The trial once commenced is never adjourned, except, on account of the lateness of the hour, de die in diem.

28. This is answered in the summary.

29. By an Order in Council of 9th October, 1580, it is provided "that it shall not be lawful to appeal in any cases Criminal or of Correction, &c." This is confirmed in a subsequent Order of 22nd February, 1638.

30. The moment judgment is recorded, the Sheriff becomes responsible for the custody of the prisoner and for the carrying into effect the punishment. The sentence, in cases au Criminel Ordinaire, is almost universally carried into effect immediately; in cases of condemnation to death, flogging or pillory, a certain time generally elapses, and the Queen's Law Officers, Greffier and Sheriff are present when the sentence is executed. Should the prisoner be condemned to transportation, as this is a punishment the Court has no power to inflict, the sentence runs "est le dit A. B. (prisoner) condamné à être banni pour le terme de ans à tel établissement pénal et en tel lieu, dans les Colonies Anglaises, qu'il plaira à Sa Majesté indiquer;" and, the proceedings being sent through the Secretary of State for the Home Department, the prisoner is kept in prison until Her Majesty's pleasure be known.

31 and 32. I understand from the Queen's Procureur and Greffier that they have answered these questions at full length. I therefore consider it needless to do so, unless required.

33. The most important information for the purposes of the Commission, not already disclosed in the preceding summary, will in my opinion be derived from the examination of the Criminal Statistics now in course of preparation. As I feel satisfied that the Commissioners will give every part of the subject their best attention, it is perhaps needless to say more on this head. But the number and nature of the offences committed in the Bailiwick, the manner in which the present system works, the amount of crime as compared with the amount and description of the population, are points to which I would respectfully draw the careful attention of the Commissioners.

Another feature of some importance in our Criminal Procedure is that, when a crime has been committed, the authors of which are unknown, the Constable of the parish, on receiving directions to that effect from the Bailiff and Law Officers, summons all persons indiscriminately who may have knowledge of any circumstances connected with the crime before the Court; and they are heard in a private sitting, taking an oath that they will answer all questions except those which might criminate themselves. This proceeding is called an "enquête," and has led to the detection of many criminals, who are subsequently brought before the Court in the regular course, fresh evidence being heard previous to their committal.

34. Before entering upon the defects of our system, I would respectfully beg leave to say a few words upon its advantages and practical benefits. I think amongst its peculiar advantages may be reckoned:—

1°. The prosecution of all offences being conducted by public prosecutors paid by the Crown and bound to take notice of all infractions of the public peace.

2°. The little expense to which a prisoner is put in all cases, his being defended without any expense whatever when he is poor. By far the greater number of persons prosecuted come under the latter description.

3°. The little time lost, in cases au Criminel Ordinaire, between the committal and trial, a prisoner being seldom more than a fortnight or three weeks in prison before his trial during term, and applications for trial out of term being readily granted.

4°. The method of taking the prisoner's interrogatoire, properly conducted, is, I think, no prejudice to an innocent person, and a powerful means of discovering the guilty and ensuring their conviction. I would particularly remark, that I think every proper precaution against the abuse of this power is secured by the declaration made to the prisoner that he is not bound to answer the questions proposed and that his answers will be produced on his trial; by the charge being put into a definitive form, which cannot be altered, before the interrogatoire is commenced; by each question as well as each answer being taken in writing, thus rendering the Court responsible for every question, and enabling the defence to know on what suggestion each answer has been given, and to discuss the propriety of each question.

5°. The comparative freedom from technicalities in the indictment and forms of proceeding.

Its practical benefits will be shown from the following facts, which I think susceptible of proof.

1°. The amount of crime, taken in relation to the amount of population and the mixed character of that population, is small.

2°. The offences committed are seldom of a very serious nature.

3°. The punishments inflicted are, in the great majority of cases, very lenient as compared with those of other countries, and yet are sufficient to prevent the increase of crime.

4°. Crimes committed in the Bailiwick are inquired into without loss of time; and the offenders in the great majority of cases are detected and punished.

5°. The great majority of prisoners tried are found Guilty.

6°. As far as can be collected from evidence, I do not think a single person entirely innocent of the offence charged has been condemned within the last twenty years.

The three last points I particularly insist upon, and attribute in a great measure to the interrogatoire.

Such being my opinion respecting the practical effects of the present system, and viewing, as I do, the benefits above detailed as those of the highest importance to any Criminal Procedure, I cannot recommend any fundamental alterations in the system, though I admit that system to contain defects which I shall now detail.

1°. The ignorance in which the prisoner is kept as to the names of the witnesses to be heard against him, which appears to me an undue and unnecessary concealment. I cannot say I am quite so clear with regard to the depositions of those heard before the Committing Court, which, according to the present system, are not committed to writing. But, as the Law officers of the Crown, from their presence at the Committing Court, are in possession of all the facts stated by the witnesses, it may be suggested that the prisoner and his counsel should be present during these preliminary proceedings; I should much prefer that a copy of the deposition of each witness heard by the Committing Court should be furnished to the prisoner with his interrogatoire.

2°. The amalgamation of what appear to me ought to be distinct duties in the same persons, by the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and Jurats who have sat in the Committing Court sitting also upon the trial of the same prisoner.

GUERNSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq, Contrôle de la Reine.

3°. The confusion and prejudice to the defence, which appears to me to arise from the prisoner's counsel being allowed to address the Court only once, and therefore being obliged to plead any error in the indictment or technical objection, and, without these being disposed of, having to address the Court upon the general facts involving the guilt or innocence of the prisoner.

4°. The manner in which the votes of the Jurats are taken, which obliges them individually to decide at the same time upon any technical objection raised by the prisoner's counsel, upon the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, upon the adequate punishment. I think this must obviously operate very prejudiciously to the course of justice.

5°. The limitation of the number of witnesses to twelve on each side.

6°. The disqualifications of witnesses from age, relationship, interest, &c. At present, no boy under fourteen, or girl under twelve, can be heard; no relation within the 2nd degree; no blind or deaf person, nor those who have any particular interest in the case.

7°. I think the whole of the proceedings peculiar to trials au Grand Criminel open to serious objections and such as will be obvious to the Commissioners. I do not know of any positive good resulting from them. It is considered by some as an advantage that the Jurats should have the means of carefully examining the evidence in important cases before the day of trial. I think this a serious prejudice to the defence. It is also said that the system is convenient when the proceedings are transmitted to Her Majesty; my opinion decidedly is that these peculiar proceedings should be done away with, and that the President's notes of the trial should be sent to Her Majesty, when required.

8°. The separate trial of prisoners when two or more are charged in a similar indictment for a joint and similar offence. This must impede the due course of justice; as evidence of the greatest importance, or a technical point involving the legality of the indictment &c., may be withheld up to the last; the prisoners tried last also may labour under the prejudice of the conviction of the first, and of the interrogatoire of each of those previously tried; and the proceedings are unnecessarily open to much confusion.

9°. The condemnation of every prisoner found guilty upon indictment to costs, which is seldom taken into consideration by the Court, and is, I think, repugnant to the dignity of the Crown, and an undue severity to the prisoner. I am aware that difference of opinion exists on this head. Should it be deemed advisable to retain the present rule, I think every person acquitted entitled to at least some part of the costs of his defence, which he now never can receive.

10°. The manner in which the sentence is recorded, which, though the prisoner may be found guilty of only one out of several counts of an indictment, states generally that he is condemned to the punishment awarded; thus leaving him under the stigma of the whole accusation, or possibly inducing the Court to acquit him altogether though guilty of part. This defect has been partially modified of late years.

11° The confiscation to the Crown or Lord of the Manor of all the property real and personal belonging to the prisoner, in all cases where he is condemned to seven years banishment from the Bailiwick, or any severer sentence entailing "La mort civile." This being a defect not peculiar to the law of Guernsey, and already much discussed in England, (See 7 Report Criminal Law Commissioner, p. 96.) I merely notice it.

The improvements to be adopted must of course much depend upon the correctness of what precedes, particularly concerning the advantages and benefits of the present system: and it is on the assumption that these advantages and benefits exist, that I would recommend the practice being improved without any fundamental alteration being introduced.

I think the members of the Committing Court should all be declared de facto incompetent to sit on the trial of a prisoner. This will entail some further change in the present system, and introduces, in my opinion, the most difficult question for consideration in the whole of our Criminal Procedure.

The most simple plan I can suggest is to declare this incompetency, limit the Committing Court to two Jurats, and leave the trial to the judgment of the remaining members of the Court under the Presidency of the Bailiff, when his Lieutenant has sat on the Committal, and vice versâ.

This would reduce the number of Jurats in all Criminal trials to nine, leaving only a margin of two for the quorum of seven.

To render this plan more practically convenient, I should see no objection in reducing the quorum of Jurats from seven to five, in all cases au Criminel Ordinaire, i. e., not described in the indictment as felonious.

To obviate the principal difficulty in the last plan, which deprives a prisoner of so many of what may be called "ses juges naturels," the second plan I would propose for the consideration of the Commissioners is to increase the number of Jurats from twelve to fourteen. Two of whom should be selected by the Court every six months (or take it in rotation) to compose a Police or Committing Court under the Presidency of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant. The number of Jurats for every trial would then be eleven, or nearly as at present.

I am strongly opposed to the introduction of any new functionaries with new powers. I think this unnecessary for the present state and population of the Island, and am more particularly anxious that the unity (if I may so express myself) of the Bailiff's attributes and powers should strictly be preserved; and that all matters connected with the administration of justice should be under his individual and constant surveillance.

The "interrogatoire" appearing to me an important and excellent ingredient in our proceeding, and one which can only be preserved by the Committing Court sitting in private and the indictment being previously framed (which last point necessitates the presence of the Law Officers), I do not see how a new tribunal could be introduced and this proceeding preserved in its present form.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

A prisoner should certainly receive some days before his trial a list of the Crown witnesses.

The 3rd and 4th defects mentioned are obviated by allowing the prisoner's counsel to plead any error or technical objection, &c. before the evidence is heard, and disposing of such incident at once. For this purpose, as well as the examination of witnesses, I think the prisoner might, on payment of their fees, be allowed two counsel, both of whom might address the Court and examine witnesses, limiting the defence as now to one speech upon the evidence. I think that, after the pleadings have closed, the opinion of the Jurats should be taken seriatim, first, as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner. Supposing him to be found guilty, that the Law Officers should then give their "conclusions" as to the punishment, and the opinion of each Jurat be again taken seriatim on that point.

The admitting of an unlimited number of witnesses for the Crown I do not consider open to difficulty. The only objection to a similar latitude on the part of the defence is that, as all the witnesses are paid by the Crown, a prisoner might put needless expense in the prosecution. I think this might be remedied by the prisoner being limited to twelve as at present, any additional number being allowed on motion by the counsel that he considers such additional number as essential to the defence.

I think the rules adopted in England (including those introduced by 6 and 7 Vict. 85.) for the age and qualifications of witnesses might safely be introduced in Guernsey.

All prisoners charged on an exactly similar indictment might be tried together, all the counsel addressing the Court one after the other and the Law Officers speaking once.

I think the record of the judgment should state exactly upon what counts the prisoner is found guilty.

I think the Court should have power to amend unconditionally, at any period during the trial before the prisoner's counsel addresses the Court upon the general issue, all errors in the indictment not material to the merits of the case, and such that by their mistatement the prisoner cannot have been prejudiced in his substantial defence.

They should also have the power to amend, upon such terms of postponement as may be deemed reasonable, all those matters in the proceedings which, though not material to the real merits, are such that by their mistatement the prisoner may have been prejudiced in his substantial defence.

I beg humbly to add that I am not for any change in the present system in connection with questions 24 and 25. I allude to this, because I am aware that our system will appear deficient upon both these heads and opposed to the English Law. I do not think any evil results either to the interests of society or to the defence of a prisoner from our mode of proceeding. The Law Officers, although heard last, are bound to lay before the Court the law and facts of each case as they may be favourable or unfavourable to the prisoner, and do in practice follow this course to the best of their ability. They ever consider themselves bound to supply any argument or circumstance, omitted by the prisoner's counsel, which may strike them as important to the defence. They in fact, although undertaking the prosecution, are also advisers of the Court.

The Court composed as at present, making due allowance for occasional errors from which no Court and no system is exempt, does, I believe, administer justice in deciding both law and fact; and I should much fear that any changes in this part of our system would not lead to any practical advantages and might introduce evils which do not now exist.

The Answers of Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court at Guernsey, to the first Series of Questions.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

1. I have practised as an Advocate in Guernsey since the year 1824.

2. The only tribunal, which exercises criminal jurisdiction in Guernsey, is the Royal Court, which is composed of the Bailiff and twelve Jurats. Some doubt exists with respect to the origin of its jurisdiction: but it appears probable that it was constituted nearly in its present form by King John. Its jurisdiction extends to all offences committed within the Bailiwick, except High Treason, counterfeiting the coin of the realm, and assaults committed on the Bailiff and Jurats when in the execution of their office. In these three latter species of offence the Royal Court proceed as far as the conviction of the offender, but cannot pass sentence upon him, the punishment being left to be awarded by the Crown.

3. Such portions of the ancient custom of Normandy and of the Commentaries of Terrien thereon as have been approved by an Order in Council, dated the 27th October, 1583. In cases not provided for by the above authorities the criminal law of England, and occasionally the ancient law of France, are quoted. Former judgments of the Royal Court are also considered as authority.

4. When it is suspected that a party has committed an offence, he is taken into custody by a Constable or Assistant Constable and brought before the Royal Court, sitting as a Police Court; or, if the charge is not of a serious nature, he is merely warned by the Constable to attend at Court on a given day.

5. The Royal Court exercises summary jurisdiction in cases of minor offences, such as disorderly conduct, breaches of the peace, petty thefts and the like, in which the offence charged is considered, if proved, to be sufficiently punished by an imprisonment of nor more than one month. In such cases the Bailiff, or Lieutenant Bailiff, and two Jurats are sufficient to form a quorum; and there are seldom more than four Jurats present. No sentence can be awarded by the Royal Court until it has heard the "conclusions" of the Crown lawyers, who are public prosecutors, and whose functions partake of a magisterial character. The utmost punishment, which the Royal Court considers itself authorised to award when sitting as a Police Court, is an imprisonment of one month, which may be in solitary confinement and on bread and water; it also occasionally imposes moderate fines, generally varying between four shillings and one pound sterling: it may also oblige an offender, not being a native, who has no settlement in the Island, to give bail for his future good conduct, and, in default of his doing so, to leave the Island.

6. Where there is no exercise of summary jurisdiction, the witnesses are first examined separately before the Royal Court sitting as a Police Court, the Bailiff with two Jurats forming a quorum, and the Crown lawyers being present. The examination is private, and the prisoner is not allowed to be present. If the evidence is deemed sufficient to make out a primâ facie case against the prisoner, an indictment is framed by the Crown lawyers and revised by the Court. The prisoner is then brought in, the indictment is read over to him, and he undergoes an examination, called the "Interrogatoire," each question and answer of which is taken down in writing by the "Greffier" or Clerk. The doors are afterwards opened; and, after the Crown lawyers have given their "conclusions," the prisoner is committed for trial. His appearance at the trial is secured by committal to prison, or by bail when the offence with which he is charged is not of a serious nature.

7. Where the jurisdiction is not of a summary nature, the prisoner is tried before the Royal Court, composed of the Bailiff or Lieutenant Bailiff and at least seven Jurats. The members of the Court who have sent the party to trial are capable of acting as members of such Court.

8. The proceedings against the accused party are invariably instituted by the Crown lawyers with the sanction of the Police Court. The Crown lawyers, as before observed, are public prosecutors. They cannot abandon the proceedings of their own authority, but may do so at any stage after having obtained the permission of the Court. In practice there are only two cases in which proceedings are abandoned after a committal has taken place. 1st. In order to enable one of several prisoners charged with the same offence to become evidence for the Crown. 2d. When an error in the proceedings or flaw in the indictment is discovered before the commencement of the trial. In this latter case the Crown lawyers, with the sanction of the Court, abandon the incorrect indictment and commence the proceedings de novo, the former proceedings being entirely cancelled and not susceptible of being referred to either for the prosecution or for the defence. Should a prosecution against one of several prisoners charged with the same offence be abandoned for the purpose of enabling such prisoner to become evidence for the Crown, and should he afterwards refuse to give evidence, I conceive that proceedings might be recommenced against him.

9. The charge against the party accused is put into a definite form in writing before his "interrogatoire" is taken. The Crown lawyers cannot subsequently vary the form or substance of the charge, but may, as before stated, abandon the proceedings and recommence them. When summary jurisdiction is exercised by the Police Court, the charge is not reduced into writing, but is merely stated verbally before the examination of the witnesses takes place.

10 and 11. The form of proceeding is the same, whether the party admits the facts alleged against him but denies their relevancy to support the charge, or whether he simply denies the facts. The trial commences by an examination of the witnesses on both sides; and the prisoner's counsel and the Crown lawyers are afterwards heard both on the law and the facts of the case.

12 and 13. A party accused, who denies the relevancy of the charges, is not thereby concluded as to the facts; and a party who denies the facts is not thereby concluded as to their relevancy.

14. When summary jurisdiction is exercised by the Police Court, the party charged may employ an advocate: but it is considered that such advocate has no right to be heard except on points of law, although in practice he is allowed to speak on the facts of the case. After a prisoner has been committed for trial, he is allowed to make choice of an advocate to conduct his defence when first called upon to plead to the indictment; and the advocate chosen by him is bound to undertake the defence, whether the accused have the means of paying him or not.

15. Witnesses are bound to attend, at any stage of the proceedings, when required, under pain of fine and imprisonment, and to produce such documentary evidence as they may have in their possession.

16. Evidence is first received at the examination which takes place before the Police Court, as stated in the answer to the 6th question.

17. In order to the clear understanding of my answers to this and several of the following questions, it is necessary for me to give here a short statement of the mode of proceeding in different cases. When the proceeding is a summary one, the party accused hears the evidence produced against him as it is given. There are two modes of proceeding when a prisoner has been committed for trial. If the offence with which he is charged is not described in the indictment as a felony, he does not hear the evidence produced against him until the trial takes place, when the witnesses are examined vivâ voce and cross-examined by his counsel. If he is charged with a felony, days are appointed, soon after his committal, for the examination of the Crown witnesses. They are examined separately and in private before the Royal Court, the Bailiff, and two Jurats forming a quorum, and the Crown lawyers being present; and their evidence is taken down in writing by the Greffier. Neither the prisoner nor his counsel is present. After the Crown witnesses have all been thus examined, another day is appointed for what is termed the "récolement," which also takes place in private, and in the absence of the prisoner and his counsel. The witnesses are again brought in separately and sworn, their depositions are read over to them and they are asked whether they confirm what they have declared, and whether they have any amendment to make to their testimony. They may also be further questioned by the Crown lawyers and the Court. Their answers are taken down in writing as before. This is followed by the "confrontation," which also takes place in private, the prisoner and his counsel being however present. Each witness is called in and sworn separately, and his original deposition together with his "récolement" is read over by the Greffier. Formerly, this was the first moment at which the party accused was allowed to hear the evidence produced against him; but now, by virtue of the provision of an Order in Council, dated 19 June, 1844, he is entitled to a copy of the depositions of the witnesses on the morning of the day on which the "confrontation" takes place. At this stage of the proceedings his counsel is allowed to cross-examine the witnesses, the questions with their answers being taken down in writing by the Greffier. Further questions may also be put by the Crown lawyers and the Court.

18. When the proceeding is a summary one, the party accused may produce evidence on the spot to meet the evidence produced against him: and, in order to secure the attendance of his witnesses, the constable or assistant constable by whom he is taken into custody is bound to ask him to give him the names of his witnesses, and to warn them to attend. When a prisoner has been committed for trial and the offence with which he is charged is not described as a felony, he cannot bring forward his witnesses to meet the evidence produced against him until the trial takes place. When a prisoner is charged with a felony, he is called upon, as soon as the "confrontation" has taken place, to name his witnesses and to state the facts which he is desirous of proving. Another day is then appointed by the Court for the examination of his witnesses, which also takes place in private, in his presence and in that of his counsel, the Crown lawyers being allowed to cross-examine them, and the whole of the questions and answers being reduced to writing by the Greffier.

19. The period at which the party accused is allowed to question the witnesses produced against him is defined by my answer to the previous question. The extent to which he is allowed to cross-examine them is discretionary with the Court; but very great latitude is given him.

20. When a party is charged with a felony, the Crown lawyers cannot produce any fresh evidence after the "confrontation" has been completed, and the party accused cannot produce any fresh evidence after the examination of the witnesses named by him on the completion of the "confrontation" has taken place. In all other cases, no fresh witnesses can be produced on either side after the witnesses present in Court have been sworn. The witnesses on both sides are all sworn together, before any one of them is examined.

21. No evidence is taken down in writing except in indictments for felony as previously explained.

22. The evidence taken down in writing in cases of felony is read at the trial, no "vivâ voce" evidence being then received. I do not conceive that it would be allowable, either against or on behalf of the accused party, to offer proof that the written evidence did not correctly represent the whole of what had been deposed to; for this would amount to a charge of improper conduct against the Court before whom that evidence was taken and reduced to writing.

23. The counsel of the party charged is entitled to be heard both on questions of fact and law, to examine his client's witnesses, and to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution. In cases, however, in which summary jurisdiction is exercised by the Police Court, it is considered that in strictness he has no right to address the Court on questions of fact, although in practice he is permitted to do so.

24. The Crown lawyers, as public prosecutors, have the privilege of being heard last. It must here be observed that, as their functions partake of a magisterial character, they are bound to move the Court to acquit the prisoner, if they do not consider the evidence against him conclusive.

25. The Bailiff and Jurats decide both the law and the fact. All questions are decided by the votes of the majority of the Jurats present, the Bailiff or Lieutenant Bailiff merely summing up the case, and having no vote except when the votes of the Jurats are equally divided, on which occasion he gives a casting vote.

26. By the majority of the Jurats present, the Bailiff having a casting vote when they are equally divided.

27. The Court has the power of adjourning or suspending its proceedings at any stage and for any cause: but this is never done after the commencement of a trial, except it is found impossible to finish it on the day on which it is commenced. And in such cases it is customary to complete the examination of the witnesses before an adjournment takes place.

28. The incidents to accusation and trial appear to me to be sufficiently brought forward by my preceding answers.

29. No appeal is allowed on either side in any criminal proceeding.

30. The Sheriff is bound to see the judgments of the Court carried into effect. The Crown lawyers and Greffier must be present at all inflictions of capital or corporal punishments. When a person is sentenced to an imprisonment, he is lodged in the common gaol of the Island in the custody of the gaoler, who is subordinate to the Sheriff. When the punishment is a fine, the offender's person or effects may be taken in execution or his real estate proceeded against. When the sentence is banishment, the offender is lodged in gaol until he can be sent out of the island. When transportation is inflicted, the convict remains in gaol until the pleasure of the Sovereign in Council has been made known with respect to the place to which he is to be taken.

31. As I understand that the Crown lawyers have furnished the Commissioners with the forms in question, I do not think it necessary to multiply copies of them.

32. The Bailiff is appointed by the Crown by Letters Patent, and holds office during the Royal pleasure. The Lieutenant Bailiff is appointed by the Bailiff from among the Jurats. The Jurats are elected by the States of the Island, composed of the Bailiff and Jurats, the Rectors of Parishes, the Queen's Procureur or Attorney General, and the Constables and Douzeniers of the different Parishes, in all 222 members. The Jurats are elected for life, and can only be discharged by the Sovereign in Council. The Crown lawyers and Greffier, or Registrar, are appointed by the Crown by Royal Commission, and hold office during the Royal pleasure. The Sheriff is elected for life by the States, in the same manner as the Jurats. The Constables are elected by and from among the rate payers of their respective parishes, and serve for one year. The Advocates are called to the bar by the Royal Court, and are limited to six, exclusively of the Crown lawyers, who also practise as advocates in civil cases.

33. There are certain actions which, although brought with reference to civil rights, are treated as partaking of the nature of criminal proceedings, and are termed mixed actions; such are actions for the recovery of damages in cases of battery, assault, libel and slander, termed "causes en adjonction." And also cases of Clamour of Haro and Novel Disseizin. In all these cases one of the Crown Lawyers must be adjoined to the plaintiff and the other to the defendants and they act as the advocates of the parties and are paid by them.

34. (1.) The chief defect which exists in our present system is the multiplicity of functions performed by the Royal Court in criminal cases. The remedy which I would suggest is the formation of an inferior Criminal Court, distinct from the Royal Court, to act as a Court of correctional police and of criminal instruction. In the constitution of this tribunal, I should like to see the fundamental principles upon which our institutions are based fully recognised and preserved: and I would therefore object to the duties in question being performed by any single salaried officer. My plan would be to let six magistrates (who might be called Justices of the Peace) be elected by the States, in the same manner as the Jurats of the Royal Court, which six magistrates should constitute the tribunal in question under the presidency of a salaried officer. These magistrates might sit in rotation two or three at a time, changing their turn of duty every month or every three months as might be found most convenient. I am inclined to think that they ought to have a property qualification, at least equal to that which is at present required for Douzeniers; and, in order to give them some influence in the Island, I am of opinion that they ought to be ex officio members of the States and of the Court of Chief Pleas. I think that the best president would be a Lieutenant Bailiff. He ought to have such a salary as would secure the services of a properly qualified person; for the duties which he would have to perform require a considerable degree of judgment and of legal knowledge. The principal difficulty which presents itself to my mind is the mode of providing for the performance of the duties of the "Ministère public." I am most decidedly of opinion that the constant presence in court of a public prosecutor is indispensable. This system is so thoroughly established here and works so well, that it ought on no account to be departed from. The first idea that naturally arises is, that the Procureur and the Comptroller, or either of them, might attend, as they do at present: but I much doubt whether this would be practicable; for I am quite certain that this tribunal would be required to sit oftener than one day in the week; and, should it ever happen to sit on the same day as the Royal Court, the Crown lawyer attending it would be prevented from attending to his private business in the superior Court; and, even if it did not sit on the same day as the Royal Court, the time of the Crown lawyers would be so fully taken up in the performance of their public duties as to leave them no time for private practice. Their salaries might, it is true, be raised so as to enable them to give up their private business: but I do not think it at all desirable that such a system should be established. It would in process of time have the effect of making the Procureur and Comptroller mere criminal lawyers, and thus disqualify them for the due performance of their important duties in the Court of Chief Pleas and as the advisers of the Court. I am therefore inclined to think that the duties of the "Ministère public" would be best performed by a distinct officer with a competent salary, to be called the "Substitut du Procureur de la Reine." This officer should have no public duties to perform in the superior Court, with the exception of being permitted to examine the witnesses on the trial of a prisoner; for I think that the person, who has examined the witnesses at the time of the committal, is more competent than any one else to conduct the examination on the trial. Besides the President and the Crown lawyer, it would be necessary to provide a Deputy Greffier, Deputy Sheriff and Deputy Sergeant. These might be named by the Greffier, Sheriff, and Sergeant respectively, subject to the approval of some superior authority, and they ought likewise to have salaries. The Deputy Greffier should be fully competent to take down depositions in the same manner as the magistrates' clerks do in England. This tribunal might be entrusted with the same powers as are now exercised by the Royal Court when sitting as a Police Court or Court of Criminal Instruction, with power, however, to reserve points of law for the decision of the superior Court. It should also have cognizance of prosecutions for fines under local ordinances, subject however to an appeal on points of law to the Royal Court, when the fine sued for exceeded a certain amount.

(2.) The present system of taking down the evidence of the witnesses in writing in indictments for felony is most objectionable, and ought to be abolished. The witnesses ought to be examined vivâ voce on the trial in every case, and the President's notes should be declared to be a sufficient record of the evidence, in cases where it would have to be laid before Her Majesty in Council.

(3.) Several of the objections to the admissibility of witnesses by reason of relationship, interest, hatred, want of age &c. are highly prejudicial to the due administration of justice and ought to be done away with.

(4). At present only twelve witnesses can be produced on each side. This number is generally sufficient, when a party is charged with only one offence; but, when the indictment charges a party with several offences, it is manifestly insufficient.

(5.) The party charged with an offence is not allowed to hear the evidence produced against him until the "confrontation" takes place, when the indictment is for felony, and until the trial, when the offence with which he is charged does not amount to a felony. I think that the depositions of the witnesses examined at the time of the committal should be reduced to writing and a copy furnished to the prisoner, some time before the trial, together with a list of any fresh witnesses intended to be called by the Crown lawyers on the trial.

(6.) The present system of obliging the prisoner's counsel to argue technical objections, pleas in bar, questions of law, questions of fact, and pleas in mitigation of punishment at the same period of the trial is most objectionable. He ought to be permitted to argue any preliminary objection before the examination of the witnesses; and such objection should be immediately disposed of.

(7.) The mode now adopted of taking the opinion of the Jurats, at the same time, both upon the guilt or innocence of the prisoner and also upon the punishment to be awarded, is open to serious objections. I think that the President should put to them the question whether the prisoner is Guilty or Not guilty by itself, and afterwards, if he is found Guilty, call upon them to award the punishment. Were this alteration effected, some new regulations would have to be made as to the manner in which the Crown lawyers are to give their "conclusions." I would suggest that, after a prisoner has been found guilty, they should be called upon to state the punishment they consider commensurate to the offence, which they should be bound to do as briefly as possible, abstaining from all comment on the circumstances of the case.

(8.) At present, when an indictment charges a person with several offences and he is found Guilty of only a part of them, it is not customary to state in the judgment upon which of them he has been convicted. The Court should be bound in such case to state distinctly in their act that the prisoner has been found Guilty of such and such offences and acquitted on the other charges.

(9.) When two or more prisoners are indicted at the same time for the same offence, much inconvenience and confusion arise from trying them separately, as is done at present. I think that they ought all to be tried together, the counsel of the several prisoners being heard after the whole of the witnesses in all the cases had been examined.

(10.) The system of adjoining one of the Crown lawyers to the plaintiff and the other to the defendant in causes "en adjonction," Clamour of Haro and Novel Disseizin is very objectionable. I see no reason why these actions should not be brought in the first instance in a purely civil form, reserving, however, to the Crown lawyers the right of becoming parties ex officio, in the event of their deeming it necessary to do so in order to protect the interests of the Crown or of the public. In no case, however, ought they to be allowed to receive fees from the parties, much less compel the parties to employ them as their counsel, as they do at present.

(11.) In all cases in which a prisoner is sentenced to death, or to banishment or transportation for a period of not less than seven years, the whole of his property real and personal is confiscated to the Crown, or to the Lord of the Manor. I would venture to suggest the propriety of abolishing confiscation altogether.

I cannot bring this document to a close without observing that, notwithstanding the defects which exist in the criminal law of Guernsey, the system as a whole works well. The best proof of this is the fact that the criminal is seldom, if ever, an object of public sympathy. Allowing for occasional errors of judgment on the part of the Court, an evil which will ever exist even in the most perfectly constituted tribunal, justice is fairly administered. I do not believe that, since I have been in practice, a single instance has occurred in which a person totally unconnected with the perpetration of the offence with which he was charged has been found Guilty. A strong safeguard against the commission of any act of gross injustice on the part of the Court arises from the circumstance that the Jurats hold office for life, and that their acts are continually scrutinized by the public, by whose representatives they are elected. The amount of crime in Guernsey is small in proportion to the amount of its population and to the mixed character of that population; and serious offences are of rare occurrence. Crime rarely remains long undetected. The punishments inflicted, though lenient, are found sufficient for the repression of crime. The absence of a penal code, though it may appear at first sight a serious defect, is in practice an advantage, as it enables the Court to proportion the punishment to the offence better than if they were tried by inflexible rules: and the peculiar position of the Court, joined with the circumstance that they cannot award any punishment until they have heard the "conclusions" of the Crown lawyers, who are bound to point out such circumstances as may appear favourable to the party accused as well as those which tell against him, afford an efficient check against the exercise of undue severity. The "interrogatoire" of the accused party, taken as it is after the indictment has been framed and conducted with fairness, as I believe it in general to be, I consider highly useful for eliciting the truth, and by no means disadvantageous to an innocent man. On the whole I should view with much regret any attempt to overturn the fundamental principles of the system of criminal jurisprudence existing in this island, and to which system the inhabitants are generally attached; believing, as I do, that a few improvements, of the nature of those which I have suggested, will render it in every way suited to the circumstances of the Island, and secure in every respect the due administration of criminal justice.

No. 9.

Henry Tupper, Esq., Advocate.

The Answers of Henry Tupper, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Guernsey to the first Series of Questions.

1. Practice as an advocate of the Royal Court during sixteen years.

2. The Royal Court of Guernsey. Their jurisdiction appears to have originated shortly after the alienation of Normandy in 1204, when Constitutions were made, the original of which is not extant; these Constitutions have, however, been frequently acknowledged, even before the Sovereign in Council, and the fifth article runs thus:—

Ipsi duodecim in quâlibet Insulâ in absentiâ justiciariorum, et unâ cum justiciariis, cum ad partes illas venerint, debent judicare de omnibus casibus in dictâ insulâ qualitercumque emergentibus, exceptis casibus nimis arduis, et si quis legitimé convictus fuerit a fidelitate Domini Regis tanquam proditor recessisse, vel manus injecisse violentas in Ministros Domini Regis, modo debito officium exercendo.

The Precepte d'Assize of Edward the 3rd (1331) in reference to the Jurats of the Royal Court, moreover states that, "ont iceulx la connaissance, jurisdiction, précognition et jugemens en la compagnie du Baillif de toutes matières de causes civiles et criminelles eschéantes en la dite Isle toutes fois et quantes." These powers have been confirmed by various charters and orders in Council, of which one so lately as the nineteenth of June, 1844, in relation to the Police Court.

3. The twelfth Book of Terrien's commentaries on the Norman law approved and confirmed with modifications as the law of Guernsey by an order in Council of Queen Elizabeth, of the 27th October, 1583. The several English and French authors on criminal jurisprudence are also frequently cited, not as law, but as authorities to guide the Court.

4. A Constable (of whom there are two in each parish, with four assistants and several special constables in the Town Parish), on hearing of an offence, secures the person of the offender, and, if he judge necessary, lodges him in jail, when he is considered bound within twenty four hours to report the case to the Bailiff, the president of the Court, and to the Crown Lawyers, the public prosecutors of the Island, who usually direct the party to be brought before the Police Court, which sits on Thursdays, or if needful more often.

5. The Police Court is composed of at least the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and two Jurats, who, on the requisition of the Crown Lawyers, proceed at once to hear the case if a misdemeanor not requiring a more solemn trial, and award punishment of a fine, or imprisonment to the extent of one month and no more.

6. The witnesses named by the Constables and those, if any, named by the accused are heard in private. The indictment is made out. The interrogatory of the prisoner is also taken, and the committal is ordered. If the prisoner be charged with a lighter offence than felony, he is tried Au Criminel, and the evidence of the witnesses is taken vivâ voce; if he be charged with a felony and tried Au Grand Criminel, the evidence is taken down in writing. If the accused be committed, his future appearance is secured either by bail or imprisonment.

7. The trial is heard before the full body of the Royal Court, composed of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and at least seven out of the twelve jurats who constitute the Royal Court. The two or more Jurats, who sat in the Police Court and sent the accused to trial, are capable of acting and some usually sit as members of the full Court.

8. The proceedings are instituted by the Queen's Procureur and Comptroller, as public prosecutors; and, when once the committal has been ordered by act of Court, the Crown Lawyers may move the Court on the trial to acquit the prisoner; but of themselves these functionaries have no power of causing the proceedings to be abandoned.

9. At the committal, the act of indictment is drawn up; the public prosecutor may subsequently take steps to correct errors of form or substance. This must be done previous to hearing the evidence for the trial; and, when this is done, the accused would be entitled to alter his interrogatory.

10. Witnesses are privately heard: and, if the Court commit the accused for trial, the Law officers of the Crown, as usual, frame their indictment: if he deny the relevancy of the facts, the accused pleads Not guilty; if he pleaded Guilty, witnesses would equally be called to prove the case on the trial: and, after hearing all the objections of the accused both of law and fact, the Court determines the relevancy or otherwise.

11. The same as above, the Court, on the facts as proved by evidence, acquitting or condemning.

12. If he deny the relevancy, he pleads Not guilty, "et au reste se référe à son interrogatoire:" and, on the trial, the Crown Lawyers are still bound to prove the facts alleged constituting the crime, and the accused has full liberty to plead every exception of law or fact as to the relevancy.

13. No. He can on his trial plead every exception, both of law or fact, he thinks proper.

14. Yes. To one counsel only to plead the case. The accused himself selects his counsel from among the members of the bar. When the accused has no means of defraying the expense of his defence, any member of the bar whom he may select is bound to undertake it and to act gratuitously. If the accused have means, the counsel is entitled to payment. The accused sometimes avails himself of the additional assistance of one or more advisers: and it is customary to allow an adviser, if a member of the bar, to assist the pleading counsel in the examination of the witnesses.

15. The Crown Lawyers, as public prosecutors, have authority over the executive officers of the Court and over the Police of the Island to compel witnesses to appear and to produce what documentary evidence they may require; and refusal would be treated as contempt of Court and punished by fine or imprisonment. The accused is entitled to claim from the Crown Lawyers the same exertions on their part to bring forward the evidence for the defence; and they are bound to cause his witnesses to be duly subpœned. This power can be exercised during all the stages of the proceedings where evidence is admissible.

16. Previous to the committal, evidence is first received; and it is taken in presence of the Bailiff or his Lieutenant and the Jurats composing the Court, the Crown Lawyers and officers of the Court.

17. If the accused be tried feloniously "au grand criminel," when all the evidence is taken down in writing; a copy of the evidence is first given to him or to his counsel previous to the "confrontation;" and at the confrontation he may cross question the witness on the evidence, and name his witnesses to rebut the evidence brought against him. If he be tried "au criminel," he does not know precisely the evidence to be brought against him except on the day of trial.

18. "Au grand criminel," after all the evidence of the Crown is taken, he is called upon to name his witnesses, and their examination is proceeded with after those of the Crown; "au criminel," the witnesses of the accused are heard on the trial immediately after those of the Crown.

19. Previous to committal, the witnesses are heard in the absence of the accused. "Au criminel," when the trial is heard vivâ voce, the Crown Lawyers may bring twelve witnesses, and the accused twelve witnesses only. And both parties have full liberty to cross question the other parties' witnesses. "Au grand criminel," the accused and his counsel have only knowledge of the evidence against them on which the indictment is based just previous to the "confrontation" with the twelve witnesses of the Crown, when he may cross question them; on his handing to the Crown Lawyers the names of twelve witnesses for the defence, they are bound to cause them to be examined.

20. "Au grand criminel," fresh evidence for the prosecution cannot be produced after the "récolement" and "confrontation" are complete; when, all the evidence for and against being in writing, the accused is sent to judgment which is pronounced on the evidence in writing; "Au criminel," the accused can bring no further evidence when once the witnesses for the prosecution and those of the defence have been sworn.

21. "Au grand criminel," after the committal, all the evidence is in writing. "Au criminel," none.

22. As the accused is entitled at the "confrontation," which takes place immediately after the re-examination or "récolement," to cross question the witnesses, copy is taken of the deposition on cross examination. I have never seen the accused offer to prove that the written evidence was not a fair transcript of the verbal declaration of the witnesses; but I conceive he would not be allowed, after the "récolement" and "confrontation" "faite et parfaite," to adduce further evidence of any kind.

23. After the examination of witnesses, which the counsel for the prisoner is at full liberty to cross question, he is still at full liberty in his pleading to avail himself of any question of law or fact or both, which may tell in favor of the prisoner.

24. The Crown Lawyers as public prosecutors are heard last. (N. B. This requires revision). The counsel for the defence is compelled to plead before they are heard.

25. The Bailiff or his Lieutenant and at least seven out of the twelve Jurats of the Royal Court decide all questions both of law and fact.

26. By the Royal Court composed as above.

27. The Court has power to adjourn or suspend its proceedings; but, I conceive, when once the witnesses are sworn, neither prosecutor nor accused can legally claim to have the case suspended in order to produce further evidence. Should, however, the counsel of the accused offer to produce further evidence to rebut any special fact deposed against the accused, if essential to the ends of justice, I think the Court would be justified in allowing the production. But such production rests entirely in the discretion of the Court.

28. We conceive the above to be sufficiently explanatory; we shall merely add that, when an accused is tried "au grand criminel," when all the evidence is taken in writing, he can on the trial be adjudged to loss of life or limb, to banishment for life or a term of years, to transportation, and to civil death entailing confiscation of his estate; when the accused is tried "au criminel," neither of these can ensue, but execution of sentence is immediate. In the first instance, "au grand criminel," he has no legal means afforded of appealing to the mercy of the Sovereign, the period however elapsing between the judgment and execution, which is never less than six days in cases of capital punishment, allows time for a petition to the Sovereign.

29. Neither of the parties have right of appeal. On incidents arising during the proceedings reference is at once made to the Court, which decides finally.

30. The accused is in the custody of the Sheriff, who causes the sentence to be executed: but the Crown Lawyers are bound to be present to see the sentence properly carried out. If, in case of life or limb, the accused through his counsel manifest a desire of appealing to the mercy of the Soveriegn, the Royal Court, although not bound to suspend the execution, always most readily grant delay to afford the requisite time.

31. As reference is, I understand, made to the Greffier and Crown Lawyers, who have these forms in their books, it would be useless to multiply them.

32. The Bailiff is chosen by patent from the Crown and holds his office during pleasure. This is decidedly wrong: it should be "quamdiu se bene gesserit." The Lieutenant Bailiff is chosen by the Bailiff invariably from among the Jurats, but I believe not necessarily so; he holds the office during pleasure only. The Jurats are elected by the States of the Island from among "les plus sages, loyaux, discrets, et riches:" they are elected for life, and can be discharged only by order in Council. The Sheriff is also elected for life by the States, and he names his deputy or deputies.

The Crown Lawyers, and Greffier or registrer are appointed by commission from the Crown, and hold office "durante bene placito."

The advocates are appointed and sworn by the Court: they are limited to six, independent of the Crown Lawyers who plead as advocates in civil cases. The number is seldom full; for, as the business is not lucrative, there are seldom more than four practising at the bar. This is the case at present.

33. All cases of recovery of damages in minor assault, defamation, libel, or slander must be entered as a mixed criminal action, on the assumption that the peace of our lady the Queen has been broken and that part of the damages are due to the Crown. The Crown Lawyers claim to act in all these cases, one for the plaintiff and another for the defendant, each party being at liberty also to employ a member of the bar. But by the law, as it now stands, the case cannot proceed without the "Adjonction" of the Crown lawyers. This is worse than a useless form: it entails unnecessary expense on the parties, the Crown derives no advantage, the fines asked for and imposed being trifling in amount. The public service suffers from the strange exhibition of one officer of the Crown claiming in the name of the Crown damages for the Crown, the other declaring that no damages are due and that the Crown does not ask them. But, worse than all, the Crown Lawyers have, in the recent case of Sir William Collings v. Major General Napier, the Lieutenant Governor, assumed the right of refusing to act at all for the plaintiff, and thus causing him a denial of justice. Hence the law provides but one form of remedy: and this form can be withheld at the caprice or owing to the pusillanimity of the Crown Lawyers, who are ministerial officers only, and not judges.

In all these cases the Crown Lawyers should act for neither plaintiff nor defendant. But, when, on discussion of the case, it became apparent that the public peace had been broken or endangered, then, on the requisition of the Crown officers, a fine to the Crown should be imposed on the party in fault, or on both if needful. At any rate it should not in such cases be compulsory to employ a Crown Lawyer. The dignity of their office, the administration of justice, and the service of the Crown, would all three derive advantage from this change.

Infraction of Ordinances.

The same objection exists as to the right of a Law officer of the Crown to plead for the defendant, in cases where the Crown, a public officer, or an informer sues through the Crown Lawyers, "les officiers du Roi joints," for the fines or penalties arising out of a breach of the ordinances or police regulations of the Island. The one, in the name of the Crown, first expatiates on the utility of the ordinance, and the necessity of repressing its infringement. The other also, on behalf of the defendant and in the name of the Crown, ridicules the ordinance and eulogizes its infringement as praiseworthy.

In these cases the plaintiff should select which of the Crown Lawyers he chose: but the other, out of respect of his public office, should never plead for the defendant.

34. 1°. It is not fitting that the committing Magistrates should sit on the trial of the accused.

2°. The accused should be present with his counsel at the examination of all the witnesses both before the committal and after, in order that he may know the evidence to be brought against him.

3°. Twelve witnesses should be allowed both to the prosecution and to the defence on each charge in the indictment; and the number should not be restricted, as at present, to twelve each, on the whole accusation, let it contain ever so many separate charges. Such was the law, but a vicious practice has crept in. (Terrien, page .)

4°. The counsel for the prisoner should speak after the public prosecutors.

Observations.

The criminal law of the Island, sufficiently precise in its forms, is extremely vague and undefined in the punishment it awards. This evil is, however, not so serious as may appear at first sight; and in practice the system works well. Every case meets with a rigid investigation; the punishments are mild; and the public is perfectly satisfied with the administration of Criminal justice.

It is also theoretically very unsound that the committing Magistrates should form part of the Bench that try the accused: and it would be well if this could be remedied by the appointment of an inferior Court, composed of at least a president with a salary (who might be the Lieutenant Bailiff), and to be assisted by at least two assessors out of four or six to be chosen by the States, as are the Jurats.

The assessors I hold to be indispensable; for in no case should the decision and punishment be left to the erring judgment of one man, even were he provided with the most explicit code of laws. This Court might also do the duties of coroner, try police cases, and perhaps all trifling civil cases. But these appointments would require a Staff: and, to be efficient, the President and Staff must be paid; and I am not aware whence the funds are to be derived. As I have observed, the evil is not so great as at first appears. In a small community such as Guernsey the same division of duties that obtains in a large county cannot be expected. The functions of the Magistrates are naturally much more multifarious. This is an evil which is unavoidable, and is in a great measure corrected by the circumstance of the Court being multitudinous. The error, the severity, or the lenity, if any, in one Magistrate is tempered by the judgment and discretion of the others; and justice is administered impartially and in mercy.

Confiscation.

I may be permitted to suggest the propriety of abolishing confiscation of property as a consequence of condemnation to civil death. I do not believe that confiscation has ever operated to deter from the commission of crime. It is a law instituted more to punish political infidelity to the suzerain, rather than as an augmentation to the punishment inflicted for crime; and the pecuniary advantages that have been derived by the Crown are inconsiderable. Whereas the widow and orphan are left, not only to deplore the stigma of crime and condemnation, but also the ruin and misery consequent on absolute destitution.

The continued existence of this law, even modified as it has been in England, is a blot on the jurisprudence of the country. A change is the more requisite in Guernsey, where confiscation is absolute, and where the Crown revenue is barely sufficient to cover the expenditure, and where, notwithstanding, the Crown Lawyers, as public prosecutors, have part of their salary dependant on the existence of a surplus of revenue over expenditure. The Crown Lawyers are doubtless honorable men: but the duty and the interests of men entrusted with the administration of justice should never clash; too frequently has the community seen a public wrong committed to serve a private end. Confiscation should be abolished altogether: and the salary of the officers of the Crown not allowed to remain contingent on a revenue which partly arises from fines awarded in lieu of imprisonment in cases of minor offences.

I believe that, however undefined the punishments of the law may be, the whole community would deeply regret and deplore the introduction of any fundamental alteration in the Criminal jurisprudence of the Island.

The Answer of Peter Jeremie, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Guernsey, to the First Series of Questions.

Peter Jeremie, Esq., Advocate.

1. The knowledge which may have been gathered from the pursuit of seventeen years, as an advocate.

2. The Criminal and Police Courts, which are composed of the Baliff or President and twelve Jurats or Judges. In Criminal cases, as contradistinguished from petty or minor offences, the Bailiff presides with at least seven Jurats; in Police cases he presides with at least two Jurats. The Royal Court is understood to have been established by King John; its jurisdiction in Police and Criminal cases extends over all offences committed in the Island, except high treason, coining, and laying hands on the Bailiff in the discharge of his functions, in which three cases the Court indicts the prisoner and takes the evidence, but the Sovereign in Council pronounces judgment.

3. Terrien; and authors generally followed in the English Courts; Serpillon, Jousse, and the French Criminal Ordinance of August, 1760, are also not unfrequently alluded to upon questions arising from the proceedings; but punishments are arbitrary, each case being decided on its peculiar merits.

4. The Constable or any Police officer, either with or without the authority of the Bailiff or Chief Judge or the advice of the Law officers of the Crown, apprehends him and puts him in custody of the jailor: if the Police officer do this on his own authority, he usually acquaints the Bailiff and Law officers of the prisoner's detention within twenty four hours.

5. In all cases, when the offence does not amount to a crime or is not a bailable one.

6. He is sent to prison; his interrogatory is taken in writing and witnesses are heard; and, if from their evidence there appears reasonable ground for supposing that a conviction will ultimately follow, he is, when the offence is not bailable, committed to prison to take his trial.

7. The Criminal Court composed of the Bailiff and at least seven Jurats. The Bailiff and Jurats, who first enquired into the charge and committed the prisoner may, and most frequently do, judge at the trial.

8. The proceedings are instituted by the Crown officers. They may abandon the proceedings at any stage; but, if the abandonment is not a formal one, if it precede committal, I do not apprehend that by such abandonment the suspected party would be discharged were fresh suspicions to arise against him.

9. At the commencement of the proceedings the charge is put against the accused in a definite shape. It may, however, be varied until the accused is finally committed, and the evidence ordered on the charges set forth against him; after which process, issue being joined, the charge cannot be varied. The accused stands his trial upon an indictment in the form in which the charge has been definitively drawn out and delivered to him.

10. The Bailiff and Jurats decide upon the merits of such relevancy. If found irrelevant, the prisoner is discharged; if relevant, witnesses are ordered and the trial proceeds in the ordinary way by condemning the prisoner to such punishment as the nature of the case deserves.

11. Witnesses are ordered to inquire into their veracity.

12. No: he may plead both a denial of fact and relevancy at the same time; and by the admission of either he is not precluded the benefit of the other.

13. He is not.

14. He is entitled to the assistance of counsel, and he may have as many advisers as he pleases. But one counsel can be heard on his behalf before the Court. Both counsel and advisers are selected by himself; and, if he cannot defray the expense attendant on their services, they must go without, as they most frequently do.

15. He has the same means as the Crown officers possess as public prosecutors.

16. It is received at the onset of the proceedings, and is taken by the Bailiff and Jurats who attend the ordinary Court, which is generally composed of the Bailiff or President and two Jurats; but, when the offence is a serious one, a greater number of Jurats are convened. It need not be stated that the Crown officers, as public prosecutors, attend all the meetings of the Court; and they, in fact, may be said to direct all their preliminary proceedings. The evidence is different in crimes, misdemeanors and offences; in the former the evidence is taken in writing; in the latter, which entail a less punishment than seven years' banishment, the evidence is heard vivâ voce.

17. After his committal to stand his trial.

18. In petty offences at the trial. But, when the proceedings are taken in writing, as is the case when the crime entails a punishment amounting to seven years' banishment which entails the confiscation of his estate, the evidence is sent in by the accused immediately after that of the prosecutor has been produced; and it is understood that the evidence to be brought by the prisoner should go immediately to rebut the charges which have been brought against him. It is at this stage of the proceedings that the counsel of the prisoner may be said to furnish the prosecutor with the grounds of his defence, as he must furnish the Court with a statment of the facts he intends to prove, and of which the Court judges the relevancy. In petty offences the evidence is brought forward at the trial; in serious crimes this evidence is brought forward at the third appearance of the witnesses before the Court, usually termed the confrontation, the prisoner, prosecutor and witness being brought before the Court.

19. The same latitude is allowed the counsel for the defence as is enjoyed by the public prosecutor: and this both may do whenever the witnesses are brought up to make any declarations.

20. In cases of misdemeanor and petty offences, witnesses may give evidence to the moment of trial; but in cases of crime, when the declaration of the witnesses is taken in writing, no evidence can be brought forward after the examination of the witnesses has been closed by the Court, and delivered to the counsel, duly attested by the Greffier.

21. In cases of serious crime the whole is in writing, the original accusation as all other incidental proceedings; in petty offences and misdemeanors the accusation only is in writing; and in Police cases there is no writing at all, but a simple record taken of the accused's name, the nature of his offence, and the punishment to which he has been condemned.

22. It is produced at the trial. And the evidence such as was recorded at the time it was taken in writing must be received by the Court: no proof would be allowed to call in question its veracity or to show that, when produced, it did not faithfully correspond with that which was originally deposed. All parties having it in their power to see that the depositions, when originally made, are correctly set forth by the Greffier and that they faithfully represent the testimony of the witnesses, the party afterwards calling in question its veracity would not be allowed to give evidence to support such pretension.

23. Counsel enjoys the same privilege as the public prosecutor. He may plead both law and fact, and may examine and cross-examine the witnesses as much as he pleases, the patience of the Court being the only limit to the exercise of this faculty.

24. The public prosecutor speaks last in all criminal cases, whether for crimes, misdemeanors, or petty offences.

25. The Bailiff and Jurats are at all times sole judges of both law and fact.

26. By the Bailiff and Jurats: the Bailiff sums up, the Jurats decide by a majority, and the Bailiff pronounces their sentence or result of their opinions, giving a casting vote where the votes are equal.

27. The Bailiff and a majority of the Jurats may adjourn or suspend at any period or stage of the proceedings and for any cause they may deem reasonable. Adjournments and suspensions are however seldom resorted to; and I am aware but of one case not having been decided the same day it was brought up for trial.

28. The answer to this question will be best given by briefly setting forth the mode of proceeding in criminal cases. In the first place, the prisoner is brought up in the custody of the Constable or his assistant, and the Court, composed of the Bailiff and two Jurats or more, proceeds to inquire into the validity of the charge brought against him. Witnesses are then heard on behalf of the prosecutor in the absence of the accused; and, if from their evidence there appear sufficient grounds to substantiate the charge, he is committed to prison, if the offence be not bailable. If the grounds are insufficient, he is immediately released, and sometimes put upon oath to be forthcoming at any time to answer the charge. On the committal, the charge is reduced to writing and the prisoner called upon for his interrogatory, which he may or may not give as he pleases. If he does answer, it is set down in writing by the Greffier in presence of the Bailiff and Jurats and made use of at the trial, as any other document or evidence which may be brought forth. After this interrogatory the charge is made out in a definitive shape, and in the meantime the prisoner sent to custody, when, after a week or a fortnight, he is served with a summons containing the definite charge upon which he has been interrogated and committed. In this state of the proceedings the Court or public prosecutor may vary or alter the charge, as the parties are not yet understood to have joined issue. Upon this summons the prisoner is called upon to meet the charge or to plead to the merits of the case, when the Court issues, on the demand of the public prosecutor, the following interlocutory decision: "The Crown will prove the accusation against the prisoner," and calling upon the Court to allow the production of evidence to substantiate the same. This is ordered after a record of Guilty or Not guilty, as the prisoner may have pleaded, and that he has chosen Mr. Such-a-one as his counsel. The evidence being ordered and the counsel chosen, the charge cannot be any further altered or varied, but must be gone on with or abandoned. If abandoned, it is very questionable whether the Crown, in this state of the proceedings, could bring forth the same charge in any other shape. I should deem not. The prisoner is then remanded, in the custody of the Sheriff: and on the next Court day, or as soon after as circumstances will allow, the prisoner is served with another summons in which are detailed the charge, its peculiarities, a notice that evidence has been ordered to try its validity, the day when, and place where the trial will occur; and with this notice he comes prepared with evidence to rebut the same. The summonses to all the witnesses must be signed by the Crown officers, who thus become pretty well acquainted with the prisoner's grounds of defence. At the trial, the witnesses are sworn in the language they understand best, by the Bailiff, to tell the truth touching the matter in question. It is not necessary here to give forms either of the oath, or any other, whether of committal, indictment or judgment of prisoners, authenticated forms of which proceedings and all others will be furnished by the Greffier. Witnesses may be challenged at the trial if their evidence is given vivâ voce; at the time of their deposition if taken in writing. The challenge does not, however, prevent the taking of the deposition. The Court summarily disposes of these questions; but in either case the full Court, that is to say, composed of the President and at least seven Jurats, is alone competent. The depositions once taken and authenticated by the Registrar, they are read at the trial as the sole evidence that can be heard. Those for the prosecution are read over by the Crown officers, and those of the defence by the prisoner's counsel, who immediately afterwards proceeds with his defence. If there are any documents as evidence to be read, or instruments by which the crime has been committed to be adduced as evidence, they are brought into Court as "pièces de conviction" at the time of the trial. The counsel in defence, speaking always before the Crown officers, may plead in abatement or irregularity of the proceedings before the evidence is read. The Crown officers rejoin; and, if the pleas are rejected, the trial proceeds upon the evidence, the counsel speaking first and the Queen's Procureur and Comptroller afterwards. In their respective pleadings both counsel and Crown officers bring forward matters of law, fact, evidence and punishment, and each individual member of the Court pronounces in the same manner upon the merits of the defence and prosecution thus presented to them, The Bailiff commences by summing up the whole, and generally, though not necessarily, abstains from pronouncing any opinion upon the merits; the Jurats, according to seniority, delivering their judgments and opinions upon the charge and amount of punishment. The Bailiff takes the sense or result of their opinions, proclaims it in open Court, and the Greffier records it, as he does all other judicial decisions on the public registries. The trial is always in open Court, which is not the case with the preliminary proceedings. I think that in cases of rape, and others affecting public morality, it should be discretionary with the Court to hear the evidence in private and give their opinions and decisions in open Court.

29. The Bailiff and Jurats decide without appeal: their sentence can by no possible incidents be impeded in its execution. If the convict be condemned to banishment, he is put on board of the first ship that departs from the Island to the place he selects; if to flogging, the punishment is inflicted the same hour the decision is pronounced in presence of the Crown officers, Greffier and Sheriff; if he be condemned to death, he is hung on the Friday following the Saturday of his condemnation, in presence of the same officers before alluded to. I should suggest that a more appropriate place than the public market be found for the flogging of criminals.

30. Steps are immediately taken by the Sheriff; and execution soon follows all decisions for crimes, misdemeanors and minor offences.

31. As authentic forms of the proceedings will be furnished by the Court, it is unnecessary here to furnish them.

32. The Bailiff, Crown officers, Greffier, and Serjeant are appointed by the Crown, and discharge their functions durante bene placito; but experience shows that they hold their commission quamdiu se bene gesserint. The Jurats and Sheriff or Prevôt are appointed by the States of Election, composed of the Bailiff, the Jurats, the Clergy, the Queen's Procureur, the Constables and Douzeniers of all the parishes, in number two hundred and twenty two. These parochial officers are themselves elected by the rate-payers. The Constables and Douzeniers are elected at parish meetings; the Constables for three years; the Douzeniers for life. It may, however, be stated that the Constables generally serve but one year, though there are some instances of their having served nine.

33. I think that the questions and answers to the preceding statements disclose as much as may be deemed necessary for the purposes of the Commission.

34. I should propose that the confiscation to the Crown, or Lord of the Manor, of the convict's property, which now takes place when condemned to a penalty exceeding seven years' banishment from the Bailiwick, be abolished as inconsistent with the legitimate ends of punishment, and that his property go to the nearest of kin. That the prisoner's counsel be present at all the examination of witnesses in criminal proceedings from the moment he is formally constituted prisoner. That the prisoner's counsel be allowed to speak last in all public prosecutions. That in mixed actions, such as defamation of character, assault and battery, here known as "causes en adjonction," the Crown officers, as public prosecutors or guardians of the public peace, be interdicted to plead for private individuals; but that they watch the proceedings and give their opinions thereon, as independent ministers of justice, to the Bailiff and Jurats who decide. That the punishment of death be abolished as inconsistent with the authority of human tribunals, themselves subject to err, and opposed to the main ends of punishment, the reformation of the offender and the prevention of crime.

No 11.

James Gallienne, Esq., Advocate.

The Answers of James Gallienne, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court at Guernsey, to the first Series of Questions.

1. I was admitted to practise as Advocate on the 12th May, 1838, and am still a member of the Bar. I have not, however, practised since the year 1843.

2. The Royal Court is the only tribunal exercising criminal jurisdiction in this Island. It is composed of the Bailiff and twelve Jurats. It is also attended by certain other functionaries or ministerial officers: the Queen's "Procureur" and "Contrôle," the Queen's "Greffier," and the Queen's "Sergent:" their various official duties will be specified below.

The Bailiff (Ballivus, Bailly) appears originally to have been an officer exercising both military and civil power. It is likely that a Bailiff was first appointed to Guernsey when the Dukedom of Normandy (to which Guernsey was annexed) was divided into Bailiwicks ("Bailliages") by Rollo. There being then no criminal jurisdiction in the Island, criminals could only be tried at the General Assizes, held by the Bailiff and two Knights ("Chevaliers") residing in the Island together with two other Knights annually deputed to attend. As far as can be ascertained, the civil and military power appears to have been separated in the reign of King Edward I., the Civil officer retaining the name of Bailiff, and the Military officer being styled "Custos," "Capitaneus," now Governor.

The origin of the term Jurat is found in the "Constitution of King John." By this document (supposed to have been written after the expulsion of John from Continental Normandy by Philip Augustus, A.D. 1204), twelve Jurats (Coronatores jurati) were appointed as Judges collectively with the Bailiff. Notwithstanding the appointment of these twelve Jurats, Justices itinerant still visited the Island; but the power of the Bailiff and Jurats in criminal matters was not thereby curtailed. These visits seem to have ceased in the reign of King Edward III. ("Iceux douze jurés . . . . sont mis et ordonnés au nom et au lieu de quatre Chevaliers." Précepte d'Assize." 1311.). Commissioners have at various times been appointed by the Crown for the purpose of revising the Laws and redressing grievances.

Of the Constitution of King John, the original is lost. The copy at the Record Office ("Greffe") is not dated. The power and attributes of the Bailiff and Jurats have, however, been confirmed by the Sovereigns of England at various times. They were confirmed by an Inquest made in the reign of King Henry III. (1249): by another Inquest made in the reign of King Edward III. (1331) called the Précepte d'Assize: by a charter granted in the 20th year of the reign of King Charles II.: by another Charter granted in the 2nd year of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, &c.

The judicial power given to the Bailiff and Jurats is almost unlimited. The 5th article of the Constitutions recites that they have a right of judging of all cases whatsoever arising in the island, "exceptis casibus nimis arduis, et si quis legitimè convictus fuerit à fidelitate Domini Regis, tanquam proditor, recessisse, vel manus injecisse in ministros Domini Regis modo debito officium exercendo."

The "Précepte d'Assize" directs that the Jurats have "la connaissance, jurisdiction, précognition et jugement, en la compagnie du dit Baillif, de toutes matières de causes civiles et criminelles échéantes en la dite Ile toutes fois et quantes." By the same authority three cases are excepted out of this jurisdiction: treason, coining, and laying hands on the Bailiff or Jurats when in the discharge of their functions. The Royal Court is, however, authorized to bring the offenders to trial, the punishment only being reserved to the Crown.

3. The only recognised legal authority is the 12th Book of the "Ancien Coûtumier de Normandie" with the Commentary by Terrien. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Commissioners were appointed to examine into the laws of the Island; and a document, called "L'Approbation des Loix," was drawn up, purporting to be a revisal of the laws and customs actually in force at the time. Some chapters were "approved," others were declared to be "nihil," and others (where changes had been introduced, and the existing customs were contrary to the written law) were modified. The 12th Book, "Des Crimes et procès Criminels," was revised by the Commissioners; and their remarks thereon form part of the "Approbation des Loix," which was confirmed by Council on the 27th October, 1583.

The work of Terrien and the "Approbation" can, however, scarcely be called an "authority;" the public prosecutor being necessarily obliged to have recourse to the ancient and modern French authorities, as well as to the modern English criminal law. It is nevertheless certain that, although the law contained in Terrien may be applicable to the offence, it is not always adhered to. The Crown officers appear to have a discretionary power in such cases.

Punishments are arbitrary in all cases, except those which are laid down by statute law. So says Terrien; and such is the actual practice of the Court. This disposition is however annulled by the "Approbation." That is but one proof, out of many, of the negligent manner in which this document was drawn up.

4. Information being given to a constable, he, either on his own responsibility or after consulting the Crown officers, lodges the suspected person in jail. Should he not have consulted the Crown Officers, primâ facie, he is considered bound to report the charge to the Bailiff and Crown Officers within twentyfour hours. The accused is brought before the Police Court (vide Answer 5), which holds its sittings every Thursday or more often if required.

Should the suspected party evade the Police, a writ called "Prise de Corps" is issued against him by the Crown officers. This writ contains a description of his person, and a prohibition to all persons to give him an asylum or furnish him with the means of escape from the Island. Copies of the writ are affixed in the hall of the Court-house, at the doors of the different parochial churches, in the market place, and published "au cri du marché."

5. Here a distinction is to be made as to the offence. Should the party in charge be merely accused of a minor offence, breach of the peace, in fact, an offence not amounting to a crime, he is brought before the Police Court, composed of the Bailiff or Lieutenant Bailiff and two Jurats (at least two being a quorum of the "Cour du quartier," or "Cour ordinaire"). The charge is not put into writing. The police officers having ordered the witnesses in support of the accusation to attend, they are heard upon oath vivâ voce. Witnesses for the accused are also obliged to appear on a verbal order from the constable. The accused has the right of employing counsel. On a police case, the Court cannot condemn to more than one month's imprisonment. Pursuant to an order in Council, dated 19th June, 1844, prosecutions for the enfringement of Ordinances of the Court are instituted before the Police Court in and out of term, provided the maximum of the fine does not exceed thirty livres tournois (2*l.* 2*s.* 10½*d.* sterling). Previous to this Order, all prosecutions of this nature were entered before the Criminal Court. (Vide Answer 16.)

When the accused is condemned, an Act is drawn up stating the charge and the verdict. This Act is registered at the Record Office ("Greffe") in the "Livre en Crime." Should the party charged be acquitted, no act is made of the accusation.

6. The witnesses in support of the charge are, as before, ordered to attend the Police Court. They are, however, examined in private. Both Crown officers, as public prosecutors, are present at all these examinations of witnesses, although by the "Approbation des Loix" this right is limited to the "Procureur." Should the Court find the evidence sufficiently conclusive to commit the accused party, he is called into Court and the charge (which has been reduced into writing) is read to him. He then undergoes an examination, private, of course. The first question asked him is, "Guilty," or "Not guilty?" The answers of the accused are taken down by the "Greffier de la Reine" (Queen's Registrar) or his deputy, and are made use of, on the trial, as part of the evidence: not so often in favour of the accused, however, as against him. He is not compelled to answer. He is not allowed counsel at this stage of the proceedings; nor is he made acquainted with the evidence which has been heard against him. The public is then admitted; the accusation is read; the Crown officers are heard; the Jurats give their individual opinions; and the accused is committed for trial: "Afin que les officiers de la Reine informent contre lui." The accused is retaken into custody by the "Prevôt de la Reine" (Queen's Sheriff,) or his deputy; or he is allowed to give bail for his appearanec when summoned for trial.

SERIES I.

James Gallienne, Esq., Advocate.

Witnesses are not always heard on the accused party's behalf at this stage.

The Court has sometimes been satisfied with the oath ("Caution juratoire") of the party accused, that he will not quit the Island and will appear when called upon so to do. As above stated, bail or imprisonment is the ordinary mode of securing his reappearance.

The accused having been committed for trial, he is subpœned by the Queen's "Sergent" (whose duty it is, amongst others, to serve all official notices and summonses) before a full Court (vide Answer 7.). Should the accused not have been liberated upon bail, he is placed at the bar by the Sheriff, in whose custody he remains till his return to prison. The accusation (containing the definite charge upon which the accused has been committed) having been read by the "Greffier," he is again asked by the Crown officers, "Guilty or Not Guilty?" He then chooses his Advocate, and the following rule is granted: "les officers de la Reine prouveront, après que le dit (prisoner) a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime, au rest se référe à son interrogatoire, et a fait choix de l'Avocat... pour son conseil." That is, when the accused pleads "Not guilty." Should he plead "Guilty," the rule taken is: "remise à ... pour entendre les témoins des officiers de la Reine, après que le dit ... a reconnu avoir commis le dit crime, et a fait choix de l'Avocat ... pour son conseil." These Acts of Court are all registered on the "Livre en Crime." The accused (when not bailed) is then reconducted to prison by the Sheriff.

On the day appointed for trial, the prisoner and his witnesses and those of the prosecution having been subpœned by the "Sergent," evidence is heard, the accusation being read by the "Greffier." The accused has however a right of challenging witnesses. These challenges are summarily disposed of by the Court. Should the counsel for the accused wish to plead any irregularity in the proceedings, the form of the indictment &c., he does so before the hearing of the witnesses. Both the prosecutor and counsel for the accused have the right of cross-questioning. When a question is not considered relevant, it is submitted to the Court. After the witnesses have deposed and the documentary evidence, if any, has been read, the counsel for the accused is heard. The Crown officers then give their "conclusions" as to the guilt and punishment. The Bailiff sums up; and the Jurats deliver their opinions, according to seniority. In all cases of an equal division, the Bailiff gives the casting vote. The Jurats give their opinions both as to the guilt of the accused and the amount of punishment at the same time. The Bailiff pronounces the sentence, which is recorded by the "Greffier" together with the indictment on the "Livre en Crime."

When evidence is heard vivâ voce, the indictment is said to be "au criminel."

7. The Royal Court, composed of the Bailiff or Lieutenant Bailiff and seven Jurats (at least seven being a quorum of the "Cour en corps"). The functionaries who send the accused to trial may, and invariably do, act as members of the Criminel Court. The indictments before this Court are "au Criminel" (vide Answer 6), or "au grand Criminel" (Answer 16).

8. By the Crown officers (commonly called "les officiers de la Reine"). When once a party has been sent to trial, there is but one case in which the proceedings can legally be abandoned: that is, in the event of an accomplice's evidence becoming requisite. The party whose evidence is required is, however, put upon his trial pro formâ, and a verdict of acquittal is returned "faute de preuve," the Crown officers calling no witnesses against him. An acquittal is the only method that can be adopted of formally abandoning proceedings. In this case, the same charge could not be again brought forward although in a different form.

It has often happened that the Court, after hearing witnesses in private, has not deemed the offence of sufficient gravity to proceed "au criminel;" it has then exercised a summary jurisdiction. (Vide Answer 5.)

An accused party has sometimes been set at liberty immediately after hearing the witnesses in private; but, there being in this case no formal abandonment of the charge, the party might again be brought up, should further grounds of suspicion come to light. He is sometimes put upon oath to be forthcoming to answer the charge at any future period. Parties are sometimes liberated by the Police officer who has put them into custody, either on his own responsibility or after consulting the Crown officers, and no charge is preferred.

9. For the stage at which the charge is put into writing, vide Answer 6. I conceive that the Crown officers have no right to vary the form or substance of the charge after the accused party has been committed for trial, or, at all events, after the accused has chosen his advocate and the witnesses have been ordered. In either case, the accused would undergo a second private examination or "interrogatoire." Should the Crown officers think proper to abandon the proceedings, after the "interrogatoire" has been taken or the witnesses ordered, the same charge could not again be preferred in any form whatever. I have never known or heard of a case in point. There is a text in Terrien, by which the prosecutor is declared to have the right of adding to, but not of abandoning, any part of the charge. No stated stage of the proceedings is mentioned at which the charge may, or may not, be amplified.

As before stated, the accused party has no right of counsel but after his actual committal for trial. It is true he is allowed to make such defence as he may think proper at his private examination, and that is inserted in his "interrogatoire;" but this mode of proceeding is, unfortunately, more calculated to convict the guilty than to save the innocent.

10. He pleads "Not guilty." But, should the committing magistrates consider the facts alleged against him relevant, he is sent to trial. On the trial, the Crown officers are bound to prove the charge, and counsel is heard on the relevancy of the facts.

11. He pleads "Not guilty;" and on the trial witnesses are heard to substantiate the charge. Counsel's defence embraces every exception, both of law and fact, which may bear upon the case.

12. He is not. Having pleaded "Not guilty" in general terms, witnesses are called upon the trial in support of the charge; and counsel is heard, both on the facts alleged and their relevancy.

13. He is not. He pleads "Not guilty;" and on the trial counsel has the same ground of defence as above.

14. The party charged is entitled to the assistance of counsel. One only is allowed to plead; but a second counsel may be selected as adviser. The party charged chooses both counsel and adviser. When the party charged is unable to defray the expense of legal assistance, counsel is bound to defend him gratis. Should he have the means, counsel is entitled to payment.

15. The accusing and the accused party have an equal right of compelling the production of evidence, but at different stages. The accused can only produce evidence after his committal for trial; whereas the prosecutor not only produces evidence in private before the committing magistrates, but has the right of producing further evidence on the trial "au criminel," and at the second private examination of the witnesses when the indictment is "au grand criminel." (Vide Answer 16.)

The Crown officers (having the requisite power over the executive officers of the Court and the Island Police) are bound to employ the same means of compelling the production of evidence on behalf of the accused, as for the prosecution. Witnesses, refusing to appear or refusing to produce the documentary evidence which may be required, are punished by fine or imprisonment.

By an Order in Council, dated 19th June, 1844, the Crown officers, in cases of felony, have the right of detaining an essential witness (about to leave the Island) for three days after the committal of the accused. The latter has the right of cross-examining the witness at the "Confrontation" (vide Answer 16). The deposition of a witness about leaving the Island before the trial may be taken in writing, even in ordinary cases. A witness, either for the prosecution or on behalf of the accused, refusing to be sworn or refusing to answer a question which the Court may consider relevant, is liable to imprisonment for contempt of Court.

16. I ought, perhaps, to have before stated that we have, in Guernsey, three distinct indictments in criminal prosecutions. 1. Indictments "au criminel," when the offence charged is not capital. On an indictment of this nature the accused is put upon his trial, as before mentioned. (Answer 6.) 2. Indictments "au grand criminel," when the offence charged is capital, amounting to felony: punishment, loss of life or limb, banishment for life, transportation for seven years or upwards, and civil death entailing confiscation of estate real and personal. On these indictments the whole of the evidence, as it is to be used on the trial, is taken down in writing. The accused having been brought before the "Cour du quartier,' his "interrogatoire" is taken, and he is committed for trial in the ordinary way, the Court having at this stage examined the witnesses vivâ voce. The next step taken is the same as if the offence were not capital; the accused chooses his counsel; and the same rule is granted. The witnesses are again examined in private by the "Cour du quartier:" their depositions are taken down in writing by the Greffier or his deputy. These examinations over, a day is appointed for a re-examination ("Récolement"): each witness has his former deposition read to him; he is sworn a second time, when he either corroborates his former statement, corrects any mis-statement, or deposes further. After the "Récolement," the witnesses attend the "Confrontation." Each witness' deposition being read, the accused, assisted by his counsel (who for the first time hears the evidence), puts such counter-interrogatories as he may consider essential. The accused may challenge any of the witnesses of the prosecution at this stage; but such challenges can only be argued before the full Court on the day of trial. The members of the Court have also the right of questioning the witnesses. The accused may, at this stage, demand that witnesses be heard on his behalf: he is, however, obliged to specify the particular facts he may wish to prove; and the Court judges of the relevancy of these facts. A day is fixed for the hearing of the witnesses; and their evideuce is taken down in writing. After having given in a list of his witnesses at the "Confrontation," the accused is entirely debarred from producing others. He is bound as to time and shackled in his evidence.

The prosecutor and the accused each receive an authenticated copy of all the depositions. The Queen's Greffier or his deputy is the functionary whose duty it is to take down the evidence and to authenticate it. At the trial, the challenges are first disposed of. These having been rejected or considered valid, the evidence or remaining evidence for the prosecution is read by the Queen's "Procureur" or "Contrôle," and that on behalf of the accused by counsel. Whatever documents may be intended as evidence, either as "pièces de conviction" or "pièces de justification," are also read. After which, counsel proceeds with his defence; and the same mode of proceeding is then adopted as on an indictment for an offence not capital. (Vide Answer 6.)

3. We have also a third kind of indictment (for libel, slander, minor assault and battery) which is of a mixed character, being partly criminal and partly civil, and is called a "cause en adjonction," one of the Queen's officers being necessarily joined to the prosecutor and the other to the defendant. The proceedings commence by the complainant entering an action for damages, and praying "d'obtenir l'adjonction des Officiers de la Reine." The Court finding sufficient grounds for entertaining the action, witnesses are ordered to be heard; and a rule to that effect is granted, with this addition, "adjonction permise." The indictment is afterwards entered in the name of the complainant "et Officiers de la Reine joints." Challenges are allowed, as in other criminal cases, and are summarily disposed of by the Court. After the evidence has been heard, the Crown officers give their "conclusions;" one naturally claiming damages for his client and a fine to the Crown; the other asking for a verdict of "à la folle adjonction et aux frais," and declaring that the Crown is not entitled to damages. The Crown officer acting for the defendant gives his "conclusions" first. In these cases the Crown officers are adjoined as representatives of the Sovereign, on the assumption that the public peace has been broken. How conciliate these opposite proceedings with the dignity and respect due to Her Majesty's officers! It, however, appears that the Crown officers are not compelled to act. In a recent case they refused acting for the complainant. What a denial of justice! There is but one remedy afforded in these cases; and that may be denied at the caprice of a Crown officer.

17. This question is answered above.

18. Vide Answers 5, 6, and 16.

19. The accused party has the same latitude allowed him, in questioning and cross-questioning the witnesses, as the prosecutor. The different stages, at which the accused is allowed to avail himself of this right, are pointed out in Answer 5, 6 and 16.

20. On indictment for capital offences, no fresh evidence can be produced for the prosecution after the "confrontations faites et parfaites." The reason is obvious: it is at the "confrontation" that the accused claims his right of calling evidence to rebut the charges alleged against him. But, what an advantage is here given to the prosecutor over the accused! The first is only debarred from producing fresh evidence, when the witnesses have been actually confronted with the accused: whereas the latter has but one opportunity afforded him; he is obliged, at once, to name all his witnesses at the confrontation, and that without having previously had the slightest information given him as to the nature of the evidence to be produced against him.

On indictments "au criminel" no fresh evidence can be received after the witnesses have been sworn on the trial.

21. Evidence is taken down in writing in prosecutions for felony only. (Answer 16.)

The accused party's "interrogatoire" is, however, often produced as evidence by the prosecutor. That is taken down in writing before the Police Court, at the first stage of the proceedings.

22. It is produced at the trial. The Queen's "Greffier" having duly authenticated the evidence, after the "confrontations faites et parfaites," it is not allowable, either against or on behalf of the accused party, to give proof that the written evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to.

23. The counsel of the party charged is heard, both on questions of fact and law, immediately after the witnesses have deposed: that is the general rule. (Vide Answers 10 to 13, 6 and 16.) He has the usual privileges of counsel in criminal matters, as well in pleading as in questioning and cross-questioning witnesses.

24. The Crown officers have the privilege of being heard last in all police and criminal cases.

25. The Bailiff and Jurats decide both law and fact.

26. The Bailiff, after hearing the "conclusions" of the Crown officers, and summing up, calls upon the Jurats, according to seniority, for their judgment as to the guilt of the accused and the punishment. The sentence is decided by the majority. The Bailiff has only a deliberate voice: but, should there be an equality of division, he gives the casting vote. Sentence is communicated to the prisoner by the Bailiff.

27. The power of the Bailiff and Jurats to adjourn or suspend the proceedings appears to be discretionary. A case has sometimes been adjourned through the absence of witnesses. These are fined seven livres tournois (10*s*.) for non-attendance. (Vide Answer 15.) The incarceration of a principal witness, for refusing to be sworn or refusing to answer, might cause the adjournment of the proceedings. Neither the prosecutor nor the accused party has any legal right to claim an adjournment, after the swearing in of the witnesses, in order to produce fresh evidence. The Court, however, having a discretionary power in these cases, unforseen circumstances might sometimes occur to warrant an adjournment.

28. I have endeavoured to detail, as circumstantially as possible, the incidents to accusation and trial, in the foregoing answers.

29. There is no appeal from the sentences of the Police or Criminal Courts. They are, or may be, immediately put into execution. I have already alluded to the only three cases in which the punishment is reserved to the Crown. (Answer 2.)

When sentence of death is pronounced, the condemned is ordered for execution on the Friday following the Saturday on which the trial has taken place. But the sentence might be put into execution forthwith. Should the condemned have petitioned Her Majesty for pardon or commutation of punishment, and Her Majesty's pleasure not have been received within the specified time, the Court, if requested, has invariably granted an additional respite. This is however entirely optional with the Court; the condemned has no legal right to demand a delay.

Her Majesty has the undoubted prerogative of pardon in all cases; but, with the above exception, the execution of a sentence is never deferred. All petitions of this kind are forwarded through the Home Secretary of State.

30. The prisoner is immediately taken into custody by the Queen's Sheriff. If the sentence be imprisonment, the prisoner is delivered up to the Gaoler by the Sheriff. If banishment, he remains in prison till sent off the Island. He has a right of choosing his place of banishment. When a prisoner is sentenced to be transported, a memorial is sent up by the Court to the Home Secretary of State in order to know Her Majesty's pleasure as to the place of transportation. The Sheriff, accompanied by the Gaoler, delivers him up to the English authorities. In the three cases in which the punishment is reserved to the Crown, the prisoner is kept in the Gaoler's custody until the Sovereign's pleasure be known. The extreme penalty of the law is carried into execution in presence of the Crown officers, the Queen's "Prevôt" and the Queen's "Greffier." Flogging takes place in presence of the same functionaries, and, generally, the same day as the sentence is pronounced.

A convicted party is condemned to pay all costs. When unable so to do, they are defrayed by the Crown.

31. The Crown officers and the "Greffier" are the functionaries whose official duties best enable them to give the required information.

32. The Bailiff, since the reign of King Charles II. (order in Council, 27th May, 1674), receives his appointment by patent from the Crown. He is appointed "durante bene placito," and is sworn into office by a Judge delegate and Jurats. The Bailiff appoints a Lieutenant Bailiff; the senior Jurat is generally nominated, and is sworn into office by the Bailiff and Jurats.

The Jurats and "Prevôt" (although called "le Prevôt de la Reine") are chosen by the Elective States of the Island, composed of the Bailiff and Jurats, the Queen's "Procureur," the Rectors of the different parishes, and the "Douzeniers" or members of the Parochial and Cantonal corporations. The service of the Jurats is compulsory. They are sworn into office by the Bailiff and Jurats, and are removable by the Crown alone, either by their elevation to the rank of Bailiff, or by their being deposed for malversation. Should a Jurat wish to resign, he is obliged to memorialize Her Majesty to that effect, after first obtaining the consent of the Royal Court.

The "Procureur" (whose office corresponds to that of Attorney General), the Contrôle (Solicitor General) and the "Greffier" are nominated by the Crown. The "Sergent" is appointed by the Governor. All these functionaries are sworn into office by the Royal Court.

Nothwithstanding the right claimed by the Governor of nominating the "Sergent," it is evident by the "Précepte d'assize" that this appointment belongs to the Crown. By the same authority, the nomination of the Bailiff, "Procureur," and "Greffier" is reserved to the Sovereign; that right appears, however, to have been usurped by the Governor up to the year 1674, when it was claimed back by the Crown. The date at which the office of "Contrôle" was established is unknown; it must have been since the "Précepte d'assize," as no mention of that officer is therein made.

The "Prevôt," "Greffier" and "Sergent" have deputies chosen by themselves, and sworn into office by the Royal Court. They are removable at pleasure.

When the "Procureur" and "Contrôle" are absent from the Island, the advocates, according to seniority, are sworn in as Crown officers delegate.

33. I have, to the best of my ability, given such information respecting the criminal law of Guernsey as has appeared to me important for the purpose of the Commission.

34. Before entering into the detail of what appear to me to be defects in the present system, I cannot refrain from candidly stating that I consider them, for the most part, to be purely theoretical. In practice, the causes of complaint are few. The members of the Royal Court may be considered as upright conscientious jurymen deciding on the guilt or innocence of the accused, according to the abstract merits of the case, and as lenient, merciful judges awarding such punishment as they conceive the gravity of the offence really to deserve. I can safely aver that, when the Royal Court does err in its judgment, in nine cases out of ten it is on the side of mercy. But however good the system may appear in practice, that is not sufficient: the theory is bad. No discretionary power, at least of any magnitude, should be allowed to those entrusted with the administration of Criminal Law. The admission of a contrary principle would be conferring a right to the judge which belongs to the legislature alone.

The first defect I will mention, and that is a radical one, is that the accused does not enjoy those privileges which are the natural consequences of the axiom that a person is always to be considered innocent till actually proved guilty. Private examinations and interrogatories are made use of against him. In default of positive evidence, he may be condemned by his own "interrogatoire." He has not the opportunity given him of calling witnesses before his committal. The same judges who commit him sit upon his trial. The Bailiff and Jurats act as Coroners on an inquest: they sit as judges on the trial of a person against whom they have brought in a verdict of "Wilful murder" on the inquest. The accused not knowing the names of the witnesses in support of the charge before his committal, he has no means of producing evidence which might destroy the credibility of these witnesses. He can issue no summons to a witness without its being first signed by the Crown officers, who, by this means, are most likely put in possession of his intended grounds of defence. The prosecutor has a still more decided advantage over the accused when the evidence is taken in writing, the latter being obliged to particularize the evidence he intends producing for his defence, and the Police Court having the power of judging on the relevancy of such evidence. Moreover, he has not a sufficient time allowed him to prepare his cross-questioning, or to decide upon the evidence best calculated for his defence. Counsel is bound to plead before the public prosecutor, and, on that account, frequently obliged to anticipate objections which might not perhaps be raised.

There is no fixed classification of offences, either as to their gravity or punishment. An offence of the same nature is sometimes indicted criminally, sometimes made a police case. Some cases have been tried before the Criminal Court of a far more trivial nature than others tried before the Police Court. The Crown officers, it would seem, exercise their own individual judgment in the classification of offences according to the light in which they may view the offence or the accused. Cases have been tried criminally, which partook more of the nature of a civil action for damages than of a criminal accusation. On this point, no decided rule is followed.

There is a great irregularity in the recording of sentences. When a person is indicted on several counts, the opinions of the Jurats are invariably delivered on each count separately, but no record is made of this fact; the verdict, on the contrary, is recorded "Guilty," without specifying on what counts the prisoner may have been convicted and on what others he may have been found "Not guilty." Thus, on an indictment for murder, the sentence is recorded "Guilty," although the accused may have been convicted on some minor count only and acquitted on the principal count. I know of but one solitary instance in which a sentence was recorded "Not guilty" on some counts, and "Guilty" on others. This took place Saturday, the 18th instant.

Another anomaly is allowing a Crown officer to plead for the defendant in cases of "adjonction." The prosecuting Crown officer, besides asking for damages on behalf of his client, concludes to a fine to the Crown; the other, as a matter of course, argues for an acquittal, and declares that the peace has not been broken, and that, consequently, the Crown does not demand a fine. The fine awarded is but nominal, certainly; that, however, does not affect the right or wrong of the question. It is evident, that both Crown officers swear to maintain and defend (not plead against) the rights of the Crown. The same practice, as above, is followed when a party is prosecuted for a fine for the infringement of an ordinance of the Royal Court. A part of the fine is always applicable to the Crown. I have already shewn (Answer 5) that this evil is partially remedied by an Order in Council of the 19th June, 1844, by which order fines for infringements of Ordinances, not exceeding thirty livres tournois, are sued for before the Police Court; the defendant is then assisted by counsel only. In these last cases, the Court, which made the Ordinance, tries the accused and applies the punishment.

However numerous the counts of an indictment may be, the prosecutor can only call twelve witnesses in support of the charge. The number of the accused party's witnesses, is also limited to twelve.

Although the Police Court has no power of imprisoning a person beyond one month, it has the means, indirectly, of banishing a person from the Island for life. The mode adopted is by obliging the party to find bail for his future good conduct or quit the island. This, amongst other discretionary powers, requires a limitation.

Many of the improvements called for are suggested by the defects of the present system above enumerated. A regular classification of offences and their punishment to be made. Confiscation to be abolished. The grand object of penal enactments is the repression of crime. To intimidate, to reform, such are the ends to be aimed at. By rendering punishment inevitable one end will be attained; by proportioning the punishment to the crime, by endeavouring to conciliate mercy with justice, the other end will be attained. It therefore follows that the offender must be punished: society demands it; justice demands it; the ends aimed at by the law demand it. But what are the practical results of confiscation? Is it calculated to reform the criminal? No. Will a man be deterred from the commission of a crime through the dread of his estate being confiscated? No. In fine, is it productive of one beneficial result? No. By this remnant of despotism the innocent are punished, not the guilty. A father's crime benefits a royal treasury; it begars his child. Flogging to be abolished. It is a degrading spectacle, an outrage on public decency, to see a man paraded through the principal street of the town in a state of comparative nudity, exposed in the market place, and a second time taken through the town with his back lacerated by the whip.

Constables' powers to be defined.

The number of witnesses not to be limited, or, at least, twelve to be allowed on each count of an indictment. Prosecutions for libel, minor assault &c. to be entered as civil actions for damages without the intervention of the Crown officers, or, at all events, a distinction to be made according to the nature of the libel or assault. By that I mean, the Crown officers to have the right of themselves making a charge or intervening, should the offence be of an aggravated nature, or the peace have been broken. The "interrogatoire" of an accused not to be used on the trial, or no private examination to take place. A list of the witnesses for the prosecution to be furnished to the accused. Counsel to be present at the examination of witnesses before the committal. Summonses to the witnesses of the accused to be valid without the signature of the Crown officers. The accused not to be bound to specify the facts he may wish to prove when the evidence is taken down in writing; or witnesses, in all criminal cases, to be examined vivâ voce on the trial. Depositions in writing are very tedious and not so well calculated for the investigation of truth as the cross-questioning of witnesses at the time of trial. Counsel to be heard last on the trial. A record of guilt or acquittal to be made on the several counts of an indictment. This precaution is most essential, not only in a jurisdiction where punishments are arbitrary and precedents cited by the Crown officers in giving their "Conclusions," but even, where such is not the case, it is but just that the accused should be entitled to a recorded sentence of acquittal on a serious count, when only convicted on a minor one.

The power of the Royal Court to be limited. Police, examining and committing Magistrates and Coroners not to form part of the Criminal Court. This improvement might be effected by the creation of an inferior Court, to be composed of a President and not less than four members; the President and two members sitting by rotation to form a quorum. One Crown officer to attend. This Court to judge of infringements of the Ordinances enacted by the Royal Court. Its members to be elected by the States of the Island.

It will be seen, by the above summary, that no subversionary measures are broached. A reform is wanted. And from the few imperfect suggestions made I have no doubt but that some improvements in the present system might be effected. One improvement naturally leads to another.

The Answers of Stephen Martin, Esq., Her Majesty's Deputy Sheriff at Guernsey, to the First Series of Questions.

Stephen Martin, Esq., Deputy Sheriff.

1. Upwards of ten years practice as Deputy Sheriff, and a few years previously clerk in the office of the Procureur du Roi.

2. The Royal Court, composed of the Bailiff and twelve Jurats. This body is supposed to have been invested with its present attributes, about the year one thousand two hundred and four, by the constitutions of King John shortly after the cession of Normandy to France: and by a certain inquest made in the reign of Edward the Third, in the year one thousand three hundred and thirty one, called the "Précepte d'Assize," they are said to have "la cognaissance, jurisdiction, précognition et jugement en la compagnie du Baillif de toutes matières de causes civilles et criminelles échéantes en la dite Ile toutes fois et quantes."

3. The Commentaries of Terrien on the Norman Law and the best English and French writers on Criminal Jurisprudence, are usually referred to.

4. When a party is suspected of having committed an offence, he is seized by one of the constables, by whom he is either held to bail or lodged in prison. The Constable then reports the case to the Bailiff and Crown officers, by whose directions the party accused is brought before the Court composed of the Bailiff and at least two Jurats and the Crown officers; which Court sits at least once a week, but oftener if necessary.

5. The Police Court, composed, as above mentioned, of the Bailiff and at least two magistrates, often exercises a summary jurisdiction in cases of minor importance and in which the maximum of punishment awarded is one month's imprisonment, or fifty livres tournois fine.

6. When no summary jurisdiction is exercised, after hearing evidence produced by the Crown officers for the prosecution and by the accused for his defence, if the Court deems the evidence sufficient, at the request of the officers of the Crown he is committed for trial, and his appearance secured by his being either sent to prison or admitted to bail until the trial, acccording to the nature of the offence with which he is charged.

7. Before the full Court, composed of the Bailiff and at least seven magistrates. The magistrates who have sent the party to trial are capable of acting as members of such Court.

8. By the Crown officers. When a person has been committed for trial, the Crown officers may (if they consider they have no sufficient evidence to ensure a conviction) abandon their proceedings: but the accused is entitled, in that case, to a verdict of acquittal, and cannot be proceeded against a second time for the same offence.

9. After the Court has held a secret examination on the subject of the charge, they decide either to acquit the prisoner, or to commit him for trial; in the latter case the accusation is reduced to writing, and the interrogatory of the prisoner is taken, and, in the same manner, reduced to writing. The Crown officers may vary the form or substance of the charge, at any time, previous to the hearing of witnesses; but the alteration must be communicated to the prisoner and a fresh interrogatory taken on the accusation in its altered form. This does not affect the defence, which only commences after the hearing of the evidence for the prosecution and the defence.

10, 11, 12, and 13. In all these cases the form of proceeding is the same, as the defence only commences after the evidence has been heard. But the prisoner's defence includes any objection, whether relating to questions of law or fact.

14. The party charged is entitled to make choice of an advocate, when first called upon to plead to the indictment, out of the members of the bar, who are limited to six. The advocate is bound to undertake the defence, whether the accused can pay or not.

15. The Crown officers summon the witnesses, both for the prosecution and for the defence: and they are bound to attend when required, at all stages of the proceedings, on pain of fine or imprisonment.

16. In the proceeding called "au petit Criminel," that is, in cases not amounting to felonies, the evidence is heard vivâ voce on the day of trial in presence of the prisoner. "Au grand Criminel," or in cases amounting to felonies, which entail the punishment of death or transportation for seven years and upwards, the witnesses are first heard in private before the Court and their evidence reduced to writing, the prisoner or his counsel not being present; on a subsequent day, the witnesses are again brought forward and confronted with the prisoner, when he or his counsel can cross-examine them on their evidence, the whole of which examinations are in same manner reduced to writing.

17. Answered as above. Question 16.

18. "Au petit Criminel," on the day of trial; "au grand Criminel," after the confrontation of the accused with the witnesses of the Crown.

19. "Au grand Criminel," at the time of the confrontation; and at the day of trial, "au petit Criminel." Every latitude is offered to the prisoner or his counsel to question the witnesses produced against him.

20. After committal for trial, when once the witnesses are sworn, no fresh evidence can be produced against the party accused.

21. "Au grand Criminel," all the evidence is taken down in writing previous to the trial. "Au petit Criminel," the evidence is taken for and against the prisoner, vivâ voce, on the day of trial.

22. "Au grand Criminel," the evidence taken down in writing, both for and against the prisoner, is read over on the day of trial; and it is not allowable, either for or against the prisoner, to offer proof that the evidence does not correctly represent the whole of what was deposed to. There is no distinction made between the evidence taken at the different stages of the proceedings.

23. The counsel of the prisoner has every latitude to plead on all questions of law or fact that may arise, and to examine and cross-examine the witnesses on the trial.

24. The party accused speaks last, the prisoner's counsel being obliged to anticipate the arguments that may be made use of by the Crown officers from the evidence adduced.

25. The Royal Court, composed as before stated, decide all questions of law and of fact.

26. By the majority of the Jurats; the Bailiff has the casting vote when the opinions are equally divided.

27. The Court has the power to adjourn its proceedings, when the case cannot be finished in one day; but such cases occur very seldom, the Court sometimes sitting until ten or eleven o'clock at night to finish a case.

28. Answered on the previous questions.

29. There is no appeal allowed in criminal cases; the only relief is by an act of grace from the Crown: the Court has no power to alter or mitigate its sentences.

30. If imprisonment is awarded, the execution of the sentence takes place as soon as judgment is awarded; if banishment out of the Island simply, the prisoner is sent away by the first vessel; if the sentence is transportation to the penal colonies, the prisoner is sent back to gaol to await the pleasure of Her Majesty; if the sentence be death, the execution is appointed to take place, generally, in a week from the passing of the sentence; but an application for delay to give time for an application to the mercy of the Crown, is never refused. The Sheriff, as executive officer, is obliged to see the sentences of the Court carried into effect.

31. Answered by the previous questions. The witnesses are sworn to "declare the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth touching the matter in question." There is a special oath taken by the Bailiff, Jurats, Officers of the Crown and Advocates, respectively, on being admitted to office, which would occupy too much space if recited at length in this place.

32. The Bailiff is appointed by the Crown. The Jurats are chosen for life by the States of Election of the Island: these functionaries, when once appointed, can only be removed by the Crown, and are compelled to serve until, by application to the Crown, they are allowed to resign their office.

33 and 34. I am not competent to enter at length into the answers to these questions, but will merely state the improvements which, I consider, would be advantageously effected in our mode of proceeding.

The Court should not be empowered to hold Coroner's inquests. The committing magistrate should not sit afterwards on the trial. The accused should have the privilege of being heard last on his trial. No secret examination of a prisoner should take place, unless in the presence of his counsel. The law by which the property of a prisoner convicted of a felony is confiscated to the Crown should be abrogated. That a bare majority of the Jurats should not be sufficient to condemn a prisoner, but at least two thirds of their number. That the witnesses in criminal prosecutions should not be limited to twelve in number. That cases for defamation, &c., &c., called "causes en adjonction," be made civil actions, the Crown officers being allowed in each case merely to watch and protect the interests of the Crown. And, finally, that some means should be devised to enable the Court to inflict punishment more in accordance with the nature of the crime, which, amongst other things, the want of a house of correction precludes their doing at the present time.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Jean Naftel, Esq., Deputy Greffier.

The Answers of Jean Naftel, Esq., Her Majesty's Deputy Greffier at Guernsey, to the first series of Questions.

1. From my attending Court officially, as Deputy Greffier, since January, 1837.

2. The Royal Court, composed of the Bailiff and twelve Jurats. Their jurisdiction has most probably originated in the Constitutions of King John, and extends to any offence, with the exception of false coining, treason, or assaulting the Bailiff or Jurats when discharging the duties of their office, of which the Court take cognizance and sentence is reserved to the Crown.

3. The ancient Norman law of Terrien: but the modern, as well as ancient, English and French Criminal law are quoted.

4. A Constable takes him in custody, then apprizes the Crown Lawyers and the Bailiff, and receives his instructions of the Crown Lawyers.

5. In minor offences, before the Court called "Cour Ordinaire," assembled "en Police Correctionnelle," composed of the Bailiff and at least two Jurats; the utmost punishment that can then be inflicted being one month's imprisonment.

6. He is questioned before the Court, composed of the "Cour Ordinaire," in private, when his answers are reduced in writing, which is called taking his "Interrogatoire." His appearance before the Court is secured by his being committed to prison or his being obliged to give bail for his appearance.

7. Before the Royal Court, constituted as aforesaid. The functionaries who have sent the party to trial are capable of acting as members of the Court.

8. The proceedings are instituted against the accused party by the Crown Lawyers; that being done, the proceedings are not abandoned, unless it be in cases where, among several having been committed for further information, one has been admitted (in default of sufficient legal proof without) to be a Crown witness against the rest.

9. After a private enquiry is made by the examination of the witnesses, the charge is put in writing; after which the accused's "Interrogatoire" is taken. The form or substance of the charge may be varied by the Crown Lawyers, the accusing parties; after which (if it be done) the prisoner must submit to another "Interrogatoire." The defence of the party accused commences when the witnesses are heard in support of the charge.

10. Whether the party accused admits the facts alleged against him or not, the proceeding is the same.

11. It is also the same.

12. He is not.

13. He is not.

14. He is entitled to an Advocate, of which he makes choice. The Advocate is bound to defend him whether he is able to defray the expenses or not.

15. Witnesses for either are obliged to attend at any stage of the proceedings, under pain of fine or imprisonment.

16. In cases "au petit criminel," viz., cases not amounting to felony (cases amounting to felony being "au grand criminel"), after being committed for trial, the accused receives a summons from the Crown Lawyers, containing the indictment made out against him, to appear at Court to make choice of an Advocate. Previous to the trial, he is again served with another summons to appear; the Crown Lawyers likewise cause the witnesses to be summoned, both in support of the charge as well as in the defence of the accused. On the day of trial, the indictment is read and the witnesses sworn; after which the accused's "Interrogatoire" is read and the witnesses heard, the counsel of the accused being allowed full liberty to cross-question the witnesses of the Crown.

17. 18. At the trial, as above stated.

19. He is allowed full liberty to do so, as above mentioned.

20. Not in cases "au petit criminel;" when the witnesses are heard vivâ voce at the trial.

21. If it be a case of felony, "au grand criminel," the depositions of the witnesses of the Crown are taken in writing in private before the "Cour ordinaire." When this is done, a day is fixed for the "Récolement" and "Confrontation;" at the "Récolement" each witness hears his deposition read to him, and is asked if he confirms it; and at the "Confrontation," which takes place immediately after, the deposition of each witness is again read in the presence of the accused and his counsel, who has a right to cross-question each witness, and which questions and answers are also taken in writing (the depositions of the witnesses being given to the counsel of the accused the morning of the day the "Récolement" and "Confrontation" takes place). The "Récolement" and "Confrontation" ended, the accused names such witnesses as he may wish to be heard; and the Court then meet to hear their evidence, which is likewise taken in writing.

22. After the whole evidence is completed, a copy is given by the Greffier, duly authenticated by him, both to the accusing party as well as to the accused, which is read at the trial. That evidence is deemed to represent correctly the whole of what was deposed to.

23. He has full liberty to be heard on all questions, either of law or of fact; and in cases "au petit criminel," where the witnesses are heard vivâ voce, to examine them.

24. The party accused is bound to speak first.

25. Both the law and the fact is decided by the Bailiff and Jurats.

26. By the majority of the Jurats; the Bailiff has the casting vote.

27. They can do so, when, by reason of cases of very long duration, they cannot be finished in one day.

28. They are as before stated.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES I.

Jean Naftel, Esq., Deputy Greffier.

29. There is no appeal allowed, except it be obtaining pardon from the Crown.

30. If it be an imprisonment, the sentence is put into execution at once; if it be banishment, as soon as a vessel be found to take the prisoner on board; if it be transportation, as soon as Her Majesty's pleasure is known as to what place he is to be sent; and, if it be sentence of death, such sentence is generally delayed a reasonable time, not less than from the day of trial (Saturday) to the following Friday.

31. The indictment is drawn out (see Appendix "A.") when choosing his counsel; the indictment is read (see Appendix "B.") when he pleads Guilty or Not guilty; then, at the trial, the indictment is again read, when the witnesses are sworn, the "Interrogatoire" read, the witnesses examined vivâ voce (except in cases "au grand criminel," as above mentioned, when the depositions are taken in writing), and the judgment recorded (see Appendix "C."). For the oath taken by the witnesses (see "Appendix D."); for that taken by the Bailiff (see Appendix "E."); for that taken by the Jurats (see Appendix "F."); for that taken by the Procureur and Comptroller (see Appendix "G."). The other officers of the Court are respectively sworn to perform faithfully the duties of their office.

32. The Bailiff is appointed by the Crown: the twelve Jurats are elected by the members of the States of Election, in all, 222. They are named for life, and cannot resign without the sanction of the Crown, obtained by an Order of Her Majesty in Council.

33. 34. I am not aware, at present, that I could, by way of suggestion, add anything more than I have done in answering the questions contained in the first Series.

SERIES II.

Peter Stafford Carey, Esq., Bailiff.

ANSWERS TO THE SECOND SERIES OF QUESTIONS.

No. 1.

The Answers of Peter Stafford Carey, Esq., Bailiff of the Island of Guernsey, to the Second Series of Questions proposed by the Commissioners.

1. From the age of puberty a person is considered absolutely responsible to the criminal law. The age of puberty, for this as for other purposes, is fixed at fourteen in males and twelve in females. Before the age of puberty there is no absolute exemption from responsibility: but the cases in which children under that age have been made responsible are very rare.

2. I find that, in the year 1770, a case occurred in which, after a woman was committed to prison on a charge of arson, it appearing to the Court that she was deranged, it was ordered that proceedings should be stayed.

I find that, in 1813, a case occurred in which a man was tried for murder; and, it appearing on the trial that he was insane at the time of the offence, he was acquitted.

I find that, in 1826, under the like circumstances, the prisoner was acquitted and ordered to be detained in prison till further order.

I find that, in 1844, a case occurred in the Cour Ordinaire, sitting as a Court of Police, in which a person was charged with divers acts of violence; and, it appearing to the Court that he was insane, it was ordered that he should be taken back to Jersey, where he had property, and that his return should be notified to the authorities there.

These are all the cases I have been able to find among the records of the Court.

With respect to the test of unsoundness, I have only to observe that no case of the kind has occurred since I have been Bailiff; but I apprehend that the authorities chiefly relied on would be those of the English law.

3. With respect to the cases in which a married woman is considered not to be responsible to the criminal law, I apprehend that the law of Guernsey differs from the law of England in this respect only, that coercion on the part of the husband is not presumed from the mere fact of his being present.

4. With respect to the cases in which a person, otherwise responsible to the criminal law, is relieved from such responsibility by having acted under the control of another, I am informed that the law of Guernsey differs in no respect from the law of England; but I cannot ascertain that any such case has ever been before the Court.

5. When a party is charged with having committed an offence, if it appear on the trial that, though not the actual perpetrator, he was present at the time of the offence assisting the perpetrator, the result is a conviction.

With reference to the questions put respecting a person, who, being charged with having committed an offence, should appear on the trial not to have been the perpetrator, and not to have been present at the time of the offence, and to have had nothing further to do with it than by assisting the perpetrator, either before or after the perpetration; I must observe that no such case has occurred since I have been Bailiff, nor can I ascertain that any such case has ever occurred: I am, therefore, not in a condition to state as a fact what the result is. Any speculative opinion I may have on the subject will find its place in my answer to the next question.

6. A person who was not the actual perpetrator, but was present at the time of the offence, assisting the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching or otherwise, may be charged with the principal offence; and this is the regular mode of proceeding.

I understand that this mode of proceeding is also applicable to a case not contemplated in Question No. 5; viz., that of a person who, though not the actual perpetrator and not present, was, nevertheless, at the time of the offence, assisting the actual perpetrator by watching or otherwise.

When a person is charged with having instigated or assisted the perpetrator before the time of the offence, supposing the instigation or assistance to have been of such a nature as to make him what in England would be termed an accessory before the fact, I am informed that the proper way to draw the act of accusation would be to charge him with the principal offence, and then to set forth the acts constituting his complicité.

In case he were indicted for the principal offence simply, it appears to be considered that no objection could be taken to the act of accusation on the ground of the legal nature of the offence being misdescribed; the ground of objection would be merely that the charge was not set out with the requisite particularity.

Where a person is charged with having assisted the actual perpetrator after the perpetration, supposing the assistance to have been of such a nature as to make him what in England would be termed an accessory after the fact, I apprehend that he is chargeable with such act of assistance as a specific crime, and not as a participator in the perpetration of the principal offence.

And with reference to the inquiry contained in Question No. 5, I apprehend that such a person could not be found guilty of the principal offence.

7. From the answer which I shall have to give to Question No. 10 it will appear that the party participating must be indicted alone.

I am informed that it is not the practice to require that the actual perpetrator should be first convicted.

8. With reference to the inquiry contained in Question No. 7, there is no distinction as to different offences.

9. The theory of constructive presence is unknown in Guernsey.

10. Only one person can be charged in a single prosecution.

11. Different offences may be charged in a single prosecution against the same party. An offence committed by him alone may be charged with an offence committed by him jointly with another.

12. With respect to crimes properly so called, the period of limitation is twenty years. But a penalty cannot be sued for, nor a "cause en adjonction" commenced, after a year and a day.

13. I am not aware that a prosecution can be instituted in Guernsey for any offence committed out of the Bailiwick.

14. For the difference in practice, as far as regards offences committed in Alderney or Sark, I beg to refer to the answer given by the Queen's Procureur.

15. The law of Guernsey may be considered to recognize a classification of offences founded on the different modes of proceeding, which are as follows.l

(1). Summary convictions.

(2). Prosecutions conducted by the Crown Officers.

(3). Causes en adjonction, which are partly of a civil nature and partly criminal, hence termed Causes Mixtes. A cause en adjonction is brought by a party who seeks to recover damages for an assault, for defamation, &c. The Crown in such cases is also entitled to a fine; and the two Crown Officers are necessarily engaged, one on the side of the plaintiff, the other on the side of the defendant.

(4). Le Bref de Nouvelle Dessaissine" (now nearly obsolete) is the same proceeding as, in the old law of England, the Writ of Novel Disseisin, now abolished. It is in fact a possessory action; but, inasmuch as it complains of something in the nature of a forcible entry, I find that it is commonly classed with criminal proceedings.

(5). La Clameur de Haro, originally a sort of hue and cry, is still in existence, but is confined in practice to the stopping of injuries done to real property; and, though it belongs to the criminal law in its form, it is in effect a civil remedy.

In speaking of criminal matters in general, I must be understood to refer only to the two first classes above enumerated, viz.: Proceedings by way of summary conviction; Proceedings by way of prosecution, conducted by the Crown Officers. With respect to prosecutions, it is right to observe that there are three different forms of accusation corresponding to three different degrees of punishment. The lowest degree is where the punishment is only by fine or imprisonment. In this case the acte d'accusation runs thus: "à se voir adjuger à telle peine, punition ou amende que la Cour trouvera condigne." The second degree is where, besides imprisonment, the Court may inflict corporal punishment, e. g. flogging, or the pillory. Banishment for less than seven years is a punishment of the same class. In these cases the acte d'accusation runs thus: "à se voir adjuger à telle peine punition ou châtiment corporel que la Cour trouvera condigne." The highest degree is where the Court is authorised to award capital punishment, i. e. death, either natural or civil.

GUERNSEY

SERIES II.

Peter Stafford Carey, Esq., Bailiff.

Banishment for seven years constitutes civil death. Of late years, in capital cases, the Royal Court has exercised the power of sentencing to transportation, such sentence being carried into effect by means of an application to the Secretary of State. So that in effect capital punishment means death, banishment for at least seven years, or transportation.

In this class of cases the acte d'accusation runs thus: "à se voir adjuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les Loix pour avoir félonieusement—.

Where the acte d'accusation is so drawn as to limit the Court to either of the two lower degrees of punishment, the mode of trial is by what is termed "le Procès ordinaire." The proceeding "au grand criminel" is appropriated exclusively to cases where the acte d'accusation describes the offence to have been committed "félonieusement," and authorizes the highest degree of punishment. When the trial has not been "au grand criminel," there can be no capital punishment. But it frequently happens that, in cases where the offence is of such a nature as in law to admit of capital punishment, it is quite clear that no such punishment will in fact be awarded; and in such cases it is not unusual for the Court to authorize a trial by the "Procès ordinaire."

No. 2.

The Jurats of the Royal Court.

August 8th, 1846.

The Answers of the Jurats of the Royal Court at Guernsey to the Second Series of Questions proposed by the Commissioners.

1. Before the age of seven no person is responsible to the criminal law; and the general rule is considered to be that he does not become indictable before the age of puberty, which for males is fourteen, and for females twelve years of age. But a few instances have occurred, in which persons of an earlier age, who clearly appeared "doli capaces," have been convicted and punished: and the Police Court has frequently inflicted slight punishments on children found guilty of petty thefts.

2. If at any stage of the proceedings a party charged with an offence is found to have been of unsound mind at the time it was committed, he is discharged from the prosecution, and means are taken for his being kept in safe custody. The test of such unsoundness of mind is that the party was incapable of comprehending the nature of his offence, or of discerning that what he did was wrong.

3. Except in cases of treason and homicide, a married woman is acquitted when she appears to have acted under the coercion of her husband. But the mere fact that her husband was present at the time of the offence is not of itself sufficient to free her from responsibility, without additional evidence, direct or presumptive, that coercion was used.

4. We are not aware of any instance of the kind referred to by this question having occurred here; but we have no doubt that a person would not be held responsible for an offence committed under compulsion, provided the means of compulsion used were such as to induce fear of death, or of some grievous bodily harm.

5. (1.) In the first case supposed by this question, the party would be found guilty of the offence itself. But in awarding the punishment the circumstances of the case would be taken into consideration by the Court.

(2.) In the second case he would be acquitted, that is, if he were charged with the offence simply. In such a case the practice is to charge the party with the principal offence, and further to specify the particular acts anterior to the perpetration by which he instigated or assisted the perpetrator.

(3.) In the third case he would be acquitted. He cannot in such case be charged with the principal offence at all, but only with the specific criminal acts having relation to the principal offence.

6. This question is answered in the replies to that immediately preceding.

7. It is an invariable rule of our procedure to bring a separate indictment against each party accused, even in cases where many have jointly committed the same offence. It is not necessary that the actual perpetrator should have been convicted previously.

8. We are not aware of any distinction in this respect as to different offences.

9. We do not think the question, as proposed, would ever come under discussion, the terms "actual or constructive presence" having no technical meaning in our law. We conceive the question to be considered would be, in the case contemplated in the fourth question, whether the means of compulsion employed were such that the party was unable to withdraw himself from their operation; and in that contemplated in the fifth question, whether the party accused was in any way assisting or encouraging the perpetrator at the time of the offence.

10. No more than one person can be charged in a single prosecution. When an offence may have been committed by more than one person, he is charged with having committed it "soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou avec autres ses complices."

11. Different offences may be charged in a single prosecution against the same party; and an offence committed by him alone may be charged together with one committed by him jointly with another person.

12. Public crimes must be prosecuted within twenty years of their commission; assaults, batteries, and minor offences, within a year and a day.

13. The offence must have been committed within the Bailiwick, which comprehends the islands of Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark.

14. For an answer to this question we beg to refer to that given by Her Majesty's Procureur.

15. There are three classes of indictable offences, distinguished by the difference in the punishment which may be awarded, and by the form in which the action is brought against the accused.

(1.) Cases where the punishment may be death or banishment from the Bailiwick for not less than seven years (such banishment being generally preceded by corporal punishment or imprisonment), the sentence always including forfeiture of property. The form of the action is, "Les Officiers de la Reine actionnent A.B., à se voir adjuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix, pour avoir le dit A.B. félonieusement, &c." The proceedings are conducted according to the method called "procès à l'extraordinaire," in which the whole of the evidence is taken down in writing; these are called cases "au grand criminel." The punishments above-mentioned can only be inflicted when the proceedings "à l'extraordinaire" have been observed; and it is further essential that the indictment should state that the act of which the party is accused has been committed "félonieusement;" otherwise, though he may be found guilty, he can only be sentenced to a punishment of inferior degree, and no forfeiture of property can ensue.

(2.) Cases which may be punished with corporal punishment, imprisonment, and banishment for less than seven years. Here the party is actioned "à se voir adjuger à telle peine, punition et châtiment corporel que la Cour trouvera condigne, pour avoir, &c." The word "félonieusement" is not used; and conviction never involves forfeiture of property.

(3.) Cases in which the punishment is restricted to fine or imprisonment only. Here the action is "à se voir adjuger à telle peine punition ou amende que la Cour trouvera condigne."

The cases falling under the two last heads are called "au criminel" simply; and the proceedings used are those termed "procés à l'ordinaire," in which the witnesses are all heard "vivâ voce" before the Court at the trial.

The following actions are also considered as being of the nature of criminal proceedings, and, as such, can only be brought before the "Cour en corps," composed of the Bailiff and seven Jurats.

(1.) "Causes pour amendes," which are actions brought by one or both of the Crown Officers, either alone "ex officio," or jointly with an informer, for penalties imposed by Acts of Parliament in force within the Island, or by local ordinances.

By a recent order in Council, all penalties, not exceeding thirty livres tournois (2*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*), imposed by local ordinances, may be sued for summarily, before a Court composed of the Bailiff and two Jurats.

(2.) "Causes en adjonction," which are brought by a complaining party, with the view to recover damages in cases of assault, battery or libel. They are so called because, in the first stage of the proceedings, the plaintiff applies to the Court to be allowed "l'adjonction des Officiers de la Reine." This, when granted, has the effect of making the Crown Officers parties to the proceedings; after which it becomes necessary that one of them should act as counsel for the plaintiff, and the other for the defendant, though not to the exclusion of other counsel, if the parties think proper to employ them. Whenever the defendant is amerced in any amount of damages, he is also condemned to pay a fine to the Crown, as being guilty, not only of a private wrong, but also of a breach of the public peace. At present this fine is merely nominal, being almost invariably assessed at three livres tournois (4*s.* 3½*d.*)

(3.) "Causes en Clameur de Haro and en Nouvelle Dessaisine." These originate in certain trespasses or attacks (attentats) committed upon realty; but, though still technically considered as criminal actions, their practical effects are now purely of a civil nature.

The actions described under the two last heads are termed "causes mixtes," as partaking of the nature of both civil and criminal proceedings.

sidered "doli capaces" until they had attained the age of puberty; possibly in consequence of a law which declares in express terms that minors, under the age of puberty, cannot be witnesses, and which has to this day been strictly adhered to. But, in the year 1819, the question was solemnly argued in the case of a lad only eleven years of age, named McCarthy; when the Court ruled that he could be legally indicted, and he was in consequence convicted and punished. And, in the year 1838, another lad, named Dixon, also under the age of puberty, was indicted, convicted and punished.

2. Should it appear, on the trial, that the party charged was of unsound mind at the time of the offence, that fact is recorded in the judgment. In the only two felonies, both murders, perpetrated during the last forty years by persons of unsound minds, the Court by its judgment directed that they should be confined for life, or until otherwise disposed of by the Court. When the charge against a party proved to have been of unsound mind at the time of perpetration is for a minor offence, the fact is recorded in the judgment, and the perpetrator, if he have the means of maintenance, is placed under the care of his relations, and if he be a pauper he is placed under that of the parochial authorities. Should it be proved, before the trial, that the party was of unsound mind at the time of the offence, an acte is passed ordering all proceedings to cease. I am not aware of any specific "test" for unsoundness of mind. In practice the Court requires full and sufficient evidence to that effect, before it declares a party not responsible to the criminal law.

3. I apprehend that, as a general rule, a married woman is considered not to be responsible to the criminal law when she has acted under the coercion of her husband; but coercion would not be presumed from the mere presence of her husband.

4. A person under the fear of death or other grievous bodily harm would, I apprehend, in some cases, be relieved from responsibility to the criminal law; but not for murder or for other atrocious felonies. I am not aware of any case in point; nor do I believe any has occurred during the last forty years.

5. (1.) A party charged with an offence though not the actual perpetrator, but present at the time of the offence and assisting the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching, or otherwise, is by our law called "Complice," and if charged with the offence would be convicted. The words of the indictment against such a person and those in the indictment against the actual perpetrator would be the same, viz., "pour avoir le dit (name) soit seul, ou avec autre son complice, ou autres, ses complices."

(2.) A party not present, but that instigated or assisted the actual perpetrator before the time of perpetration by furnishing him with the ladder, false keys, or other means of committing the offence, knowing they were to be used for that purpose, would, I apprehend (for I do not remember a single analogous case since I am at the bar), be indicted in the same words as the actual perpetrator, "pour avoir soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices;" but the time and the manner in which he had assisted would be added. I do not apprehend that mere counsel unaccompanied by any act would be sufficient to sustain an indictment.

(3.) A party not present, but who, after the perpetration, assists the actual perpetrator by counsel or otherwise, if charged with the offence, could not be convicted.

(Firstly.) "If charged with disposing of property stolen by the actual perpetrator." He would be indicted as "réceleur," that is, as receiver of stolen goods knowing them to be stolen.

(Secondly.) "In escaping from justice." He would be indicted for having, on a given day, by a specific act therein set forth, assisted the perpetrator in escaping from justice.

Mere "counsel," unaccompanied by any act, given to a party would not, I apprehend, be sufficient to sustain an indictment.

6. In the first case suggested, the party so instigating and assisting might be charged with the principal offence; in the second, he might be charged with the principal offence adding thereunto the time and manner in which he knowingly assisted the actual perpetrator; in the third, he would be charged with a specific offence.

7. and 8. One person only can be charged in a single prosecution. Anciently, I apprehend the rule to have been, that the actual perpetrator was to be convicted or "décrété de prise de corps" (outlawed), before the "complices" could be tried; but the Court has by degrees departed from this rule; and, at present, I apprehend the "complice" might be charged, though the actual perpetrator should not have been convicted or outlawed previously. There is no distinction in this respect as to the different offences.

9. Our law considers all persons aiding and abetting the actual perpetrator by watching or otherwise at the time the offence is committed as "complices," and, as stated in my answer to the 5th question, they are all indicted in the same form of words.

10. One person only can be charged in a single prosecution.

11. Different offences may be charged in a single prosecution against the same party. An offence committed by him alone may be charged in the same prosecution with one committed by him jointly with another person.

12. The limitations, as to the time reckoned from the commission of a criminal offence, within which a prosecution must be instituted is twenty years; there is no distinction in this respect between different indictable offences.

13. To subject the offender to prosecution in Guernsey the offence must have been committed within the bailiwick.

14. When an indictable offence is committed in Alderney, as the Court of that Island has no criminal jurisdiction, the mode of proceeding is as follows. The party is taken up and brought before the Alderney Court; witnesses are examined and their depositions put into writing; the interrogatory of the party is also taken and put into writing; and an Acte is then passed by the Alderney Court remitting the case to the Royal Court of Guernsey.

A copy of the Acte and of the evidence, signed by the Greffier, is given to the Prevôt or Sheriff, who takes charge of the prisoner and brings him to Guernsey by the first opportunity. On his arrival at Guernsey, the Prevôt makes his report to the Bailiff and to the Crown Lawyers, on which the Bailiff brings it before the "Cour Ordinaire," when the evidence and the interrogatory taken in Alderney are examined, and, if the offence appear to the Court of a sufficiently serious nature and the evidence sufficiently strong, the witnesses are ordered to attend from Alderney. On their arrival in Guernsey they appear before the ordinary Court and are examined, and the interrogatory of the prisoner is taken: in a word, proceedings are commenced and carried on as if "ab initio," and in precisely the same manner as if the offence had been committed in Guernsey. When an indictable offence is committed at Serk, the prisoner and the witnesses are brought over at once by the Prevôt of Serk, and proceedings similar to those in cases for like offences committed in Guernsey take place.

Charles de Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

August 4th, 1846.

15. The law recognises three distinct classes of offences with respect to the punishment to which they subject offenders.

1st. Offences "de quoy l'homme doit et peut perdre vie ou membre." These are described in the indictment as felonies, which runs thus: "à se voir ajuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix pour avoir félonieusement," &c. &c. The punishment may be death or banishment for seven years or upwards from this Island (i. e., mort civile): in these the property real and personal of the culprit is forfeited to the Crown or to the Lord of the Manor.

2ndly. Offences which render the perpetrator liable to corporal punishment. These are indicted "à se voir ajuger à telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel;" the punishment may be flogging, pillory, imprisonment, or banishment from the Island, but for a term not exceeding six years.

3rdly. Offences which are punishable by fine and imprisonment. In these the prisoner is indicted "à se voir adjuger à telle peine, punition, ou amende," and can only be punished by fine or imprisonment.

The proceedings for the first class of offences are indifferently designated, "procès à l'extraordinaire," or "procès au grand criminel," those of the second and third classes merely "procès criminels."

Complaints before the ordinary Court sitting as a Court of Police are usually designated "plaintes en Police Correctionnelle."

Actions for the recovery of penalties for infringement of Acts of Parliament or Ordinances are designated "Actions pour Amendes."

Actions for slander, libel, assault and battery, if entered by the party aggrieved with a view of obtaining damages, are called "Actions en adjonction," or "Actions mixtes."

Actions in the Cry of Haro, "Actions en Clameur de Haro."

Actions in Nouvelle Dessaissine, "Actions en Nouvelle Dessaissine."

The Answers of John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Her Majesty's Contrôle at Guernsey, to the Second Series of Questions.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

August 8th, 1846.

1. There is no written law stating precisely the age before which a person is not responsible to the criminal law, or drawing any distinction in this respect between different offences. Judging from the precedents I have seen, I apprehend that a child charged with an indictable offence would be tried by the Court and punished, provided they were satisfied that he was "doli capax" at the time of the commission of the offence.

2. If, during the investigation of a criminal charge, it should appear to the Court that there were grounds for supposing that the accused had committed the offence at a time when he was of unsound mind, the criminal proceedings would be stayed, in order to have that particular fact ascertained by evidence: the fact once proved, the accused would be discharged from all criminal responsibility and committed to the custody of his family or of the parochial authorities. In any case, a prisoner's counsel is at liberty to urge unsoundness of mind at the time of the offence as a complete defence to a charge; it then becomes his duty to support this plea by evidence. This being proved on the trial, the prisoner would be detained in prison during Her Majesty's pleasure. There is no specific test as to the degree of unsoundness of mind which would prevent a party from being responsible to the criminal law; but the English authorities and dicta are made use of in such cases as a guide to the Court.

3. There is no written law precisely bearing on this point. In practice the Court follow the English authorities; coercion, however, would not so easily be presumed from the mere presence of the husband.

4. I am not aware of any precedent applicable to this question, or of any law bearing upon it. I apprehend that in such a case the Court would consult and follow the principles of the English law.

5 and 6. According to our forms of proceeding, any number of persons may be indicted separately for the same offence in this form, "pour avoir le dit A. B." (each prisoner on his indictment) "soit seul ou avec autre son complice, ou autres ses complices—."It is usual in practice to indict all on the general charge, adding the particular circumstances specially affecting each in his indictment only. Supposing a person charged with the substantive offence only, and the evidence to bring him under the first designation, he may be found guilty; under the second and third, he must be acquitted.

The offences of assisting the actual perpetrator in attaining the end aimed at or assisting him in escaping from justice are considered as offences entirely distinct from the actual perpetration of the original crime, and are specially indictable. I do not consider that mere counsel, either before or after the perpetration of an offence, would warrant the framing of an indictment.

7. The former part of this question is answered above; some difference of opinion exists on the latter part. I am of opinion that, to find a receiver of stolen goods guilty, proof of their having been stolen would be sufficient without evidence of the conviction of the thief; and likewise that, to find a person guilty of assisting a criminal in escaping from justice, proof that the criminal was at the time of his escape in charge of an officer of justice, or even that a warrant or "décret de prise de corps" had been issued for his apprehension, would be sufficient. I am not aware of any precedent precisely applicable.

8. There is no distinction in this respect between different offences.

9. As by our law proof of presence at the time of the commission of an offence is not necessary for the conviction of an offender, the doctrine of actual and constructive presence is not recognized.

10. No more than one person can be charged in a single prosecution.

11. Different offences may be charged in a single prosecution against the same party. And an offence committed by a party alone may be laid in the same indictment as that which charges him with an offence committed jointly with another person.

12. No prosecution at the instance of the Law Officers of the Crown can be instituted after the lapse of twenty years from the date of the commission of the offence. Actions "au Petit Criminel" (described below in Answer 15) are prescribed by the lapse of a year and a day from the date of the injury complained of. I will here quote the law from Terrien, p. 502 :—

"Plainte d'excez et mal-façons de corps se doit faire dedans l'an et jour du delict. Mais suite d'homicide et d'autre crime publique, ne se prescrit que par le laps de vingt ans."

13. In the Islands of Guernsey, Alderney, Sark, Herm, or Jethou; these collectively forming the Bailiwick.

14. The Court of Alderney has no criminal jurisdiction strictly speaking (except for the enforcement of its local ordinances), but inquires into all offences committed there, the depositions of the witnesses being taken in writing and the accused interrogated. The accused is then sent to Guernsey in the custody of the Sheriff of Alderney; and the Court of Guernsey, after examining the evidence taken in Alderney, orders the witnesses over to appear before them in Guernsey; and the case is gone into as if it had happened in Guernsey.

The Sénéchal or Magistrate of the Island of Sark has the power to condemn to an imprisonment of twenty-four hours, or to a fine of three Livres Tournois. Any offence requiring severer punishment must be investigated ab initio in Guernsey, the witnesses and the accused being brought to the Island by the first opportunity.

The Island of Herm has a constable with authority to apprehend and bring before the Court of Guernsey any person committing an offence at Herm.

The Island of Jethou is inhabited by one family.

15. In practice we recognise the following classification of criminal proceedings.

Cases described in the indictment as felonious are prosecuted "au Grand Criminel," and the offender is sued "à se voir adjuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix." Persons convicted under this proceeding are subject to death, transportation, or banishment from the bailiwick for a term of or exceeding seven years, accompanied in all such convictions with confiscation of all their property, real and personal, to the Crown, or lord of the Manor.

Cases not described in the indictment as felonious are prosecuted "au Criminel ordinaire," and are subdivided into two classes.

The first for serious misdemeanours, in which the offender is sued "à se voir adjuger à telle peine punition ou châtiment corporel que la Cour trouvera condigne," and may be condemned to flogging, the pillory, banishment for a term not exceeding six years, or imprisonment in the public gaol for a term seldom exceeding six months, part of which may be solitary and on bread and water.

The second for offences which are not considered as infamous, or showing great moral turpitude, in which the offender is sued "à se voir adjuger à telle peine punition ou amende que la Cour trouvera condigne," and may be condemned to imprisonment, part of which may be solitary and on bread and water, or to a fine to the Crown.

Cases "en Police Correctionnelle" are summarily disposed of, and apply to all offences, which the sitting Court thinks, if proved, to be adequately punished by an imprisonment of not more than one month, part of which may be solitary and on bread and water, or by a moderate fine. In these cases the charge is verbally stated by the constable who produces the offender; and, the witnesses ordered to appear by the constable, as well as those whom the prisoner may have desired the constable to warn on his behalf, having given their evidence vivâ voce, the prisoner may address the Court himself or by counsel, and the "conclusions" of the Law Officers are taken. The Court then decides upon the guilt or innocence of the accused and the adequate punishment.

August 8th, 1846.

Cases for the recovery of penalties for infringement of Acts of Parliament or of local ordinances are called "actions pour amendes." In these, the Law Officers may sue jointly or separately, as public prosecutors, or separately with an informer, and the offender may defend himself by counsel. If found guilty, he is condemned to the whole or a portion of the fine mentioned in the Act of Parliament or ordinance on which he is sued, and his person or property may be taken in execution on the judgment.

Cases of slander, libel, assault and battery, for "crimes ou délits privés qui n'intéressent que les particuliers qui se trouvent offensés et non le repos et la tranquillité publique," are called "causes au petit Criminel," and are prosecuted by one of the Law Officers and the plaintiff thus: "A. B." (plaintiff) "et Officiers de la Reine joints," the other Law Officer being heard for the defendant, and both receiving fees from their respective clients. Should the defendant be found guilty, the Court invariably sentence him to pay a fine to the Crown, in addition to the damages payable to the plaintiff, and costs.

Actions "en Clameur de Haro" and "en Nouvelle Dessaisine" for disturbance of real property, and infringements of the rights of the proprietor, are also sued "au petit criminel" in a similar manner, and subject either of the parties (plaintiff or defendant) to a fine to the Crown, independently of the civil reparation.

I cannot close my answers to this series without pointing out two defects which force themselves on my consideration in connexion with these questions.

The first is the necessity of investing the Court of Alderney with some kind of criminal jurisdiction.

The second, the necessity of some change in the manner of proceeding "au petit criminel." It is a matter of some difficulty to me whether such actions should be treated as purely civil, or whether the plaintiff should not be bound to employ one of the Law Officers, whose duty would oblige him to examine into the case before entering it.

No. 5.

The Answers of Robert M'Culloch, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Guernsey to the Second Series of Questions proposed by the Commissioners.

Robert M'Culloch, Esq., Advocate.
August 8th, 1846.

1. Some uncertainty exists on this subject. It is generally considered that a person becomes indictable at the same age at which he becomes admissible as a witness, being the age of puberty, which is held to be fourteen years in males and twelve in females. There are, however, a few cases on record in which persons of an earlier age have been tried and convicted; and, when children are charged with petty thefts or other minor offences, the Court is in the habit of exercising summary jurisdiction and awarding a trifling punishment, when they appear to have sufficient capacity to be conscious of the nature of crime.

2. If it appears that the party charged was of unsound mind at the time of the commission of the offence, he is discharged from the prosecution, and means are to be taken for placing him in safe custody. The test of such unsoundness of mind I conceive to be, that, at the moment of the commission of the offence, the party charged was under the dominion of insanity, and was impelled to it by a morbid delusion.

3. A married woman is not considered responsible to the criminal law when she appears to have acted under the coercion of her husband, except in cases of treason and homicide. Coercion is not, however, fully presumed from the mere fact that the husband was present at the commission of the offence, some additional evidence of coercion derived from the circumstances of the case being required to free the wife from responsibility.

4. I have no knowledge of any case of this sort having occurred in the Island, and therefore can do no more than express my private opinion, which is, that, except in cases of treason and homicide, a person would be relieved from responsibility who had acted under such compulsion as was calculated to induce a well-grounded fear of death or of grievous bodily harm.

5. (1.) A party charged with an offence, who was not the actual perpetrator, but was present at the time of the offence, and assisting the actual perpetrator by watching, counsel, or otherwise, would be convicted of the offence itself; but the same punishment would not necessarily be inflicted on him as on the actual perpetrator.

(2.) A party not present at the time of the offence, but having instigated or assisted by counsel or otherwise the actual perpetrator before the time of perpetration, could not be convicted of the principal offence.

(3.) A party not present at the offence, but having, after the perpetration, assisted by counsel or otherwise the actual perpetrator, either in attaining the end aimed at or in escaping from justice, could not be convicted of the principal offence.

6. In the first case supposed in the last question, the party present and assisting the actual perpetrator at the time of the offence is charged with the principal offence. In the two other cases supposed, the party instigating or assisting is charged with a specific crime as a participator in the perpetration of the principal offence. But mere counsel given to the perpetrator, either before or after the commission of the offence, would not render the party who had given such counsel responsible to the criminal law.

7. It is the invariable practice to lay a separate indictment against each party charged with the perpetration of an offence, and against each party charged with instigating or assisting the actual perpetrator or perpetrators. In the several cases proposed in the

GUERNSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES II.

Robert M'Culloch, Esq., Advocate.

August 8th, 1846.

5th question it is not necessary that the actual perpetrator should have been previously convicted.

8. I am not aware of any distinction in this respect as to different offences.

9. The doctrine of actual or constructive presence is unknown here. The several cases contemplated in the 4th and 5th queries would have to be determined by the Court as questions of fact on the evidence before them.

10. No more than one person can be charged in a single prosecution. When a party is charged with an offence in which others may have participated, he is charged with having committed it "either alone or with other his accomplice or with others his accomplices."

11. Different offences may be charged in a single prosecution against the same party. And an offence committed by the party alone may be charged in the same prosecution with one committed by him jointly with another person.

12. A prosecution for a public crime must be instituted within twenty years from the commission of the offence. Batteries, assaults, and other offences of the same nature, not sufficiently grave to amount to public crimes, must be prosecuted within a year and a day. The words of the law are "Plainte d'excès et mal façons de corps, se doit faire dedans l'an et jour du delict mais suite de homicide et d'autre crime public ne se prescrit que par le laps de vingt ans, comme il est dit de crime de faux, in l. querela C. de fals."

13. In order to subject an offender to a prosecution by the criminal law of Guernsey, the offence must have been committed within the bailiwick, which comprehends the Island of Guernsey, Alderney, and Serk, and the adjacent Islets.

14. There is no substantial distinction with respect to apprehension, trial, or punishment, or any of the incidents thereto respectively, between offences committed in different parts of the bailiwick of Guernsey. Parties charged with having committed offences in Alderney or Serk are sent to Guernsey in the custody of an officer; and the charge is investigated in the same manner as if the offence had been committed in Guernsey.

15. Independently of cases of minor offences, in which the court exercises summary jurisdiction, there are two classes of indictable offences, the second of which is subdivided into two degrees. They are distinguished by the form in which the indictment is laid and the difference in the punishment which may be awarded.

(1.) Cases "au grand criminel," or "criminel extraordinaire," in which the punishment may be death or banishment from the bailiwick for a period of not less than seven years (such banishment being generally accompanied by corporal punishment or imprisonment), involving the confiscation of the offender's property both real and personal. The action runs thus: "Les Officiers de la Reine actionnent A. B. à se voir adjuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix pour avoir le dit A. B. félonieusement" committed the crime of &c. &c. In these cases the evidence is taken down in writing, as explained in my answer to the 17th question of the first series, and the punishment above mentioned cannot be awarded unless it has been so taken down. It is moreover essential that the word "félonieusement" should appear in the action in order to such punishment being awarded. The prisoner would not be acquitted were this word omitted; but, if found guilty, he could only be sentenced to a punishment of inferior degree.

(2.) Cases "au criminel ordinaire," sometimes called "au criminel" simply. These are subdivided into two classes. (Firstly.) Offences which may be punished with corporal punishment, imprisonment, and banishment from the Bailiwick for a period not amounting to seven years. The action runs thus: "Les Officiers de la Reine actionnent A. B. à se voir adjuger à telle peine punition ou châtiment corporel que la Cour trouvera condigne pour avoir le dit A. B." committed the crime of &c. &c. (Secondly.) Offences which can only be punished by fine or imprisonment. The action runs thus: "Les Officiers de la Reine actionnent A. B. à se voir adjuger à telle peine punition ou amende que la Cour trouvera condigne pour avoir le dit A. B." committed the crime of &c. &c. In these two classes of cases the word "félonieusement" is not used, and the witnesses are examined vivâ voce at the trial.

There are also other matters which are treated as partaking of the nature of criminal proceedings.

(1.) "Causes en adjonction," which are actions brought for the recovery of damages in cases of battery, assault, libel, and slander, and of which I have spoken in my answers to the 33rd and 34th questions of the first series.

(2.) Actions in cases of Clamour of Haro and Nouvelle Dessaisine, of which I have also spoken in my last mentioned answers.

These two classes of proceedings are designated as proceedings "au petit criminel," or "causes mixtes."

(3.) Actions brought for the purpose of levying fines imposed by Acts of Parliament in force in Guernsey, or by local ordinances. These may be brought ex officio by the Crown Lawyers or either of them, or by an informer jointly with the Crown Lawyers or either of them.

In these cases, as in those of a strictly criminal nature, no appeal is allowed. The proceedings must take place before the Bailiff or Lieutenant Bailiff and at least seven jurats, except in cases of the third class, relating to the infraction of local ordinances, in which the fine sued for does not exceed thirty livres tournois, equal to 2*l.* 4*s.* 3½*d.* sterling, which may be disposed of summarily by the President and two Jurats, under the authority of an Order in Council of the 19th June, 1844.

ROBERT M'CULLOCH, Advocate.

Guernsey, 8th August, 1846.

No. 6.

The Answers of Henry Tupper, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Guernsey, to the second Series of Questions.

1. The age of puberty, fourteen years in males and twelve in females, is generally considered the age at which persons are strictly indictable, this being the age when persons become admissible as witnesses; but there are precedents, where persons under fourteen or twelve respectively, appearing to be "doli capax," have been tried and convicted. When children are charged with petty thefts or other minor offences, a punishment commensurate with the offence is awarded by the Court.

2. If on the trial evidence be adduced to prove that the party charged was of unsound mind, he is discharged from the prosecution, and steps are taken to secure his person. I am asked what is the test of unsoundness of mind? I know of none: unsoundness of mind, I presume, depends on the facts proved in evidence. If the Commissioners will favour me with the test of mental soundness, I might probably give the converse as the test of mental unsoundness.

3. Coercion of the husband, except in cases of treason and homicide, would relieve the wife from responsibility to the criminal law. But even his participation with the wife in the crime of which they are accused would not be alone sufficient evidence of coercion; substantive evidence of coercion would be required.

4. I am not aware of any. Neither do I think that any party could successfully allege coercion as a relief from responsibility, except it were coercion calculated to induce fear of death or grievous bodily harm.

5. (1.) He would be charged with the principal offence, tried and condemned, as an accomplice.

(2.) He would be tried on a specific indictment.

(3.) Idem. But I do not conceive that mere counsel given would be indictable, certainly not that given after perpetration of the crime.

6. Answered as above.

7. A separate indictment is always made out against each accused, whether he be tried as a principal or on a specific charge as an accomplice either before or after the fact, or otherwise. Previous conviction of the actual perpetrator is not necessary; but proof of the principal crime is required before an accused can, on a specific action, be convicted as an accessory.

8. I am not aware of any.

9. The cases contemplated in the preceding queries would be considered by the Royal Court as questions of fact, and determined on the evidence adduced. The abstract doctrine of constructive presence is not much thought of here.

10. A separate indictment is preferred against each accused; but there are frequently several charges in each indictment, in some of which there may be accomplices. The accused is consequently charged with having committed the offences imputed to him, either alone, "or with other his accomplice, or others his accomplices."

11. Answered in the preceding.

12. Prosecution of a crime must be entered withing twenty years of the commission. Prosecution for batteries, and other offences, not amounting to public crimes, are limited by the lapse of a year and a day.

13. Within the Bailiwick, which includes the islands of Guernsey, Alderney, Sark, and the other adjacent Islets.

14. There is no distinction. Persons accused of crime in Alderney or Sark are sent to Guernsey in the custody of an officer. The witnesses also are brought over, and the charge is investigated and tried by the Royal Court of Guernsey.

15. Yes.

1°. Summary jurisdiction is exercised by the Royal Court sitting as a Police Court to try minor offences, as explained in the answers to questions in Series, No. 1.

2°. "Les Causes en Clameur de Haro et Nouvelle Dessaisine" are mixed civil and criminal actions, entered in cases of trespass or usurpation on real property.

3°. "Les Causes en adjonction" are mixed civil and criminal cases, entered for the recovery of damages in cases of assault, defamation, &c., and to which the Crown nominally becomes party, in order that, if the public peace have been endangered or disturbed, a fine be awarded in favour of the Crown. But, as I have before observed, in answer to the first series, this form of procedure has become an abuse detrimental to the ends of justice, and in which the public weal is altogether overlooked.

4°. Prosecutions for the recovery of fines arising out of the infraction of local ordinances, &c.

5°. Prosecutions "au criminel."

6°. Prosecutions "au grand Criminel."

7°. Prosecutions "au grand Criminel," in cases of treason, false coining, and striking the Bailiff or Jurats in the exercise of their offices; in which three exceptional cases the trial is prosecuted by the Royal Court, but the punishment is especially reserved to the Crown.

There are separate forms of procedure for most of these cases: but it would be needless to give them at length.

ANSWERS TO THE THIRD SERIES OF QUESTIONS.

GUERNSEY.

Answers to Questions.

SERIES III.

P. S. Carey, Esq., Bailiff.

The Answers of P. S. Carey, Esq., Bailiff of the Island of Guernsey, to the Third Series of Questions.

1 and 2. A. With respect to offences punishable summarily. When a witness is produced against or for the party charged, the evidence is given by the witness in the presence and hearing of the accused party, and of the tribunal which has to decide on the charge. The evidence of such a witness is given orally, partly by way of statement, and partly on questions put to him at the time by the court, the Crown officers, or the party accused.

B. With respect to proceedings previous to commitment. When a witness is produced against or for the party charged, the evidence is given by the witness, out of the presence and hearing of the party accused, in the presence and hearing of the tribunal which has to decide whether the accused is to be committed or not. The evidence of such a witness is given orally, partly by way of statement, and partly on questions put to him by the Court.

C. In proceedings "au grand criminel." When a witness is produced against the party charged, the evidence is given by the witness out of the presence and hearing of the accused party, in the hearing and presence of the Cour ordinaire, but not in the hearing and presence of the Cour en corps, which has to decide on the guilt or innocence of the accused. The evidence of such a witness is given orally by the witness, in answer to questions orally put to him at the time by the Court, the questions and answers being severally taken down in writing by the Greffier. When the witness is to be cross-examined, the mode of proceeding is the same, except that the prisoner and his counsel are present. When a witness is produced for the party charged, the mode of proceeding is the same as with a witness produced against him, except that, in this case, the evidence is given in the hearing and presence of the prisoner and his counsel.

D. In proceedings à l'ordinaire. When a witness is produced against or for the party charged, the evidence is given by the witness in the presence and hearing of the accused party and of the tribunal which has to decide on his guilt or innocence. The evidence of such a witness is given orally, partly by way of statement, partly on questions put to him at the time by the Crown officers, the counsel for the accused, or the Court.

It will be observed that in these answers I have not said anything of the presence of the prosecutor. There is no private person to whom that term can in any sense be applied. In cases before the Cour ordinaire sitting as a Police Court, the charge is brought forward by the constable; but he can hardly be termed a prosecutor. The proceedings against the accused are conducted in Court by the Crown officers; and they are present at the examination of every witness, whether produced for or against the party charged.

3. Evidence must be given upon oath, except in cases where an affirmation is allowed. The only difference, that I know of, in this respect, is that sometimes, in a preliminary enquête before the Cour ordinaire, children not old enough to take an oath have been allowed to make their statement without oath. This statement, however, has not been taken as evidence, but merely to assist the Court in its subsequent enquiries.

4. Children cannot take an oath before the age of puberty. The age of puberty, as I have had occasion to observe in my answer to SERIES No. 2, Question No. 1, is fixed at fourteen in males, and twelve in females.

5. From the necessity of an oath, I infer the necessity of religious belief.

6. I understand the rule to be, that conviction of felony or perjury renders a person incompetent as a witness for or against a party charged with an offence.

7. The competency of such a witness may be restored by a pardon. I may also observe, that Stat. 9 G. 4, c. 32, has been registered in the island.

8. I apprehend that, two persons being indicted for the same offence, one of them is not admissible as a witness on the trial of the other.

9. Supposing it to appear that the two persons so indicted were accomplices, it is in the discretion of the Court, on the application of the Crown officers, to order the proceedings against one of them to be abandoned, in order to make him admissible as a witness against the other.

10. There is no precise rule as to the extent to which the evidence of an accomplice requires to be confirmed. It is, however, to be observed, in anticipation of my answer to Question No. 26, that the testimony of any one witness, not supported by other evidence, is deemed insufficient to support an accusation.

11. The effect which marriage has upon the admissibility of the husband or wife as a witness, where either of them is charged with an offence, is either to prevent or to destroy it, as the case may be.

The husband can not, under any circumstances, be a witness for or against the wife; nor the wife for or against the husband. I understand this rule to extend even to the case where one of the parties is charged with having committed personal violence against the other.

12. No incompetency arises on the score of any consanguinity or affinity with the accuser, there being, as I have before had occasion to observe, no individual to whom that title can apply. But, with respect to the relatives of the party charged, the case is otherwise; the general rule is that no person who is related to the party charged, whether by consanguinity or affinity, as first cousin or in any nearer degree, is competent as a witness in his favour, nor can any such person be compelled to give evidence against him.

13. It is competent to the Court, at the Interrogatoire (the nature of which I have described in my answer to SERIES No. 1, Question No. 6), to question the party charged touching the offence he is charged with, or to ask him any questions tending to explain the evidence previously given.

14. I apprehend that the statements of the party charged, or his conversations with third persons whenever made, are admissible in evidence against him, and that such statements or conversations are admissible in his favour, if made recently after the transaction in question, or, generally, "dans un temps non suspect."

15. A statement made under the influence of a promise or a threat would not be admissible in evidence against the party who made it.

16. A confession is not conclusive evidence of guilt; the person who made it is, notwithstanding his confession, permitted on his trial to contend that he is not guilty, and, if need be, to produce evidence in proof of his innocence.

17. The general rule is that hearsay is not evidence. This rule is subject to exceptions, in particular with respect to statements made by a party "dans un temps non suspect." With respect to the admission of dying declarations, I understand that the rule is the same as in England. I must, however, observe that in the procès ordinaire, where the evidence is taken vivâ voce, the witnesses being usually allowed to tell their own story, they frequently introduce matter which is not strictly evidence without being interrupted; and that, even when a witness is under examination by counsel, it not unfrequently happens that hearsay evidence, not being objected to by the counsel on the other side, is allowed to be gone into.

18. I apprehend the rule to be that parol evidence of a written document can not be given till the non-production of the document has been accounted for to the satisfaction of the Court.

19. With respect to any written document which the accused wishes to put in evidence, I must recal attention to the fact that there is no such person as an accuser. No individual who stands to the accused in the position of an opposite party. Any individual who may have documents in his possession is to be dealt with by the party charged as a witness. But any document which comes into the possession of the Crown officers it is their duty to produce, whether it tells in favour of the accused or against him. With respect to any document in the hands of the accused, I am informed that the Crown officers have the right to serve him with a "Signification," or notice to produce it, and that, in default of his so doing, secondary evidence is admitted. But I am not aware of any case in which this course has been pursued.

20. When it is necessary to prove the execution of any written instrument, this is done by proof of the handwriting of the person who executed it, or otherwise, according to the nature of the instrument. Where there are attesting witnesses, it is sufficient that two of them be produced, or, if dead, that the handwriting of two be proved. I am not aware of any difference in the mode of proof depending on the age of the instrument; the English rule that, under certain circumstances, an instrument thirty years old proves itself seems to be unknown in Guernsey.

21. The Seal of a Court of Justice, or of a Municipal Corporation proves itself.

22. Evidence of the character of the party accused may be given for him at the trial. But I apprehend that the statement of any particular fact is not, strictly speaking, evidence.

23. A witness may refuse to answer a question on the ground that it may subject him to criminal liability; or, as I understand, on the ground that it may discredit him: but not on the ground that it may subject him to civil liability.

24. I have known evidence given of the bad character of a witness, such evidence being confined to general reputation. I apprehend that such evidence might be met by the opposite evidence of any other witness sworn on the trial, who could speak to the character of the witness whose credit has been impeached.

25. A witness may be asked what he has formerly said; but, before evidence can be given to contradict his answer, I apprehend that it is necessary that he should be asked specifically whether or not he said that which is intended to be proved.

26. The testimony of one witness, not supported by other evidence, is deemed insufficient. As the rule is expressed by Domat, Loix Civiles, liv. iii. tit. 6, sec. 3. "Un seul témoin, de quelque qualité qu'il puisse être, ne fait point de preuve."

27. With respect to the payment of witnesses, I refer to the answer of the Queen's Procureur.

SERIES III.

Jurats of the Royal Court.

August 29th, 1846.

No. 2.

The Answers of the Jurats of the Royal Court of Guernsey to the Third Series of Questions.

1, 2. These questions have already been, in great measure, answered in the replies to Series No. 1. It is however necessary to observe that there is, properly speaking, no prosecutor in purely criminal actions. The suspected party is first brought up by a constable who prefers the charge; when the party is committed, the Crown officers are then empowered by the Cour ordinaire to conduct the prosecution; and in this respect they act, both in theory and in practice, not as opposed to the prisoner, but as seeking the ends of public justice. It has already been stated that before the commitment the witnesses are heard separately and in private before the "Cour ordinaire," assisted by the Crown officers, and not in the presence of the prisoner. At this stage the evidence is always given vivâ voce. After the commitment, there is a distinction between the "procès à l'extraordinaire," in which the evidence is all taken in writing before the day of trial, and the "procès à l'ordinaire," in which the evidence is taken vivâ voce at the trial. The details of these different proceedings have been already given. It should be added that, in examining a witness vivâ voce, it is usual to commence by calling on him to state what he knows of the facts of the case; afterwards, the Crown officers, the Court, and the counsel for the accused, put the witness such questions as may be necessary to explain his statement or to elicit further facts. In cases where the evidence has to be taken down in writing, it is also usual to begin by calling upon the witness to state the facts he knows. He is then further questioned as the Court thinks fit, the interrogatories and the answers thereto, being taken down in writing at the time. At the confrontation, the interrogatories of the prisoner's counsel and the answers of the witness are reduced to writing in the same manner.

3. It is necessary that, at all stages of the proceeding, the evidence relating to a criminal charge should be given under the sanction of the oath of the witness, except he be a quaker, and then his affirmation is taken as equivalent to his oath.

4. No person is admitted to give evidence before the age of puberty, which for males is fourteen, and for females twelve years of age.

5. We are not aware of an instance having ever occurred in which a witness has been objected to on the ground of a want of religious belief. But it can hardly be doubted that a person would not be allowed to go through the ceremony of an oath who appeared to acknowledge no religious bond whatever.

6. Persons convicted of murder, arson, larceny, perjury, or of any other public crime of a like nature, are incompetent to be heard as witnesses.

7. The competency of such a person as a witness would be restored by a pardon from the Crown. The Act 9 G. 4. c. 32. is registered here: and there is no doubt that it would be acted upon, although, as the name of the Island is not mentioned in it, it is not clear that it has the force of law.

8. A party charged with an offence, so long as the charge continues to be entertained against him, is not capable of being a witness for or against another party charged with the same offence.

9. It is in the discretion of the Court, with the advice of the Crown officers, to direct that a party so charged should be discharged from prosecution in order to become capable of giving evidence against another party charged with the same offence.

10. It is necessary that the evidence of such witness should be confirmed by extrinsic evidence. By our law the testimony of a single, though unimpeachable, witness, unsupported by other evidence, does not constitute proof; the evidence of a party discharged from the prosecution for the purpose of giving evidence would be received with still greater caution.

11. The husband can, under no circumstances, be a witness for or against the wife, nor the wife for or against the husband.

12. There is legally no accuser in cases of indictment; therefore no incompetency can arise on account of the relationship of the witness to such party. The injured party being himself a competent witness, no reason can be urged against the admissibility of any of his relations. With regard to the party charged, his relations by affinity or consanguinity to the degree of first cousins inclusively, if called by him as witnesses, may be objected to, except for the purpose of proving an alibi. If called against him, it is generally understood that they may themselves refuse to appear as witnesses.

13. It is competent for the Court, at that stage only of the proceedings called the "interrogatoire," which takes place before the commitment, to question the party charged touching the offence with which he is charged, or in explanation of any part of the evidence.

14. The statements of the party charged, and his conversations with third persons before he has been charged with the offence, are admissible in evidence for or against him; and such statements, if favourable to himself, would have more or less weight, according to the circumstances under which they were made. His statements, after he has been charged, we consider would only be admissible against him.

15. Statements made, by the party charged, under the influence of a promise or threat would be inadmissible in evidence.

16. The confession of a party is taken as evidence of his guilt, provided no error appear, and the corpus delicti be proved. But he is, notwithstanding such confession, permitted on his trial to give evidence in proof of his innocence.

17. Hearsay is not considered evidence. With regard to the declarations of a person who at the time believes himself to be dying, the English rule is followed.

18. A witness will not be permitted to state in evidence the contents of a written document, unless its non-production be accounted for to the satisfaction of the Court.

19. There is no opposite party to the accused, unless the Crown officers be improperly considered as such; and they are bound by their duty to produce any document which may have come into their hands, capable of being used as evidence on the trial, whether its contents be favourable to the accused, or the contrary. With regard to the accused, the production of any essential document in his possession may be demanded at the time of the interrogatoire. He cannot be compelled to produce it; but, if he should refuse, a minute to that effect would be made, and the Crown officers would then be at liberty to produce other evidence of its contents at the trial. All other persons having documents in their hands may be called as witnesses, and be required to produce such documents at the trial.

20. In criminal proceedings, proof is required of the handwriting of the person who executed a written instrument produced in evidence, unless it has been admitted as valid by the accused in the "interrogatoire." When there are attesting witnesses, it is sufficient that two of them be produced; or, if that be not possible, that the handwriting of two of them be proved. The necessity of proving ancient instruments is here of such rare occurrence that we do not know that any precise rules exist as to the mode of proof. There is no fixed period, as in England, after which execution of the instrument is presumed without proof.

21. The seals of Courts of Justice, of Governors of Colonies, and of Municipal Corporations in the British Empire, prove themselves. Actes of the Royal Court of Guernsey may be proved by the production of the records themselves in the custody of the Greffier. It is generally understood that foreign documents of a like nature should be certified under the seal of a British Consul.

22. Evidence of the character of the party accused may be given for him at the trial. As no fresh witnesses can be called on the part of the prosecution, such evidence can only be contradicted when the witnesses already sworn happen to be acquainted with the character of the accused. Though, strictly speaking, any particular acts cannot be taken as proofs of character, a witness would not be interrupted when stating instances in support of his good opinion of the accused.

23. A witness may refuse to answer a question put to him on the ground that it may subject him to criminal liability, or that it may discredit him, but not on the ground that it may subject him to civil liability.

24. Evidence may be given of the bad character of a witness, and the statement of particular facts for that purpose may be objected to. In cases which are heard vivâ voce, such evidence may be met by opposite evidence, provided it can be obtained from witnesses already sworn on the trial.

25. A witness can be asked what he has formerly said in conversation, and evidence can be given to contradict his answer.

26. The general rule is, that the testimony of one witness does not constitute proof; such testimony requires to be supported by other corroborative evidence either direct or circumstantial.

27. We beg to refer to the answer of Her Majesty's Procureur.

No. 3.

Answers of Charles De Jersey Esq., Her Majesty's Procureur at Guernsey, to the Third Series of Questions.

Charles De Jersey, Her Majesty's Procureur.
August 17th, 1846.

1 and 2. In Guernsey, no private individual can prosecute criminally, except in cases in which he has a personal interest, such as in actions for assault, battery, libel, defamation, cries of haro, and nouvelle dessaisine, or (as informer) for penalties for the infringement of Acts of Parliament, or of ordinances of the Royal Court. In all these, one of the Queen's officers is adjoined to the prosecutor: and the limitation, as to the time reckoned from the commission of the offence within which a prosecution must be instituted, is a year and a day.

Parties charged with any criminal offence, the prosecution for which may be instituted at any time during twenty years, reckoned from the commission of the offence, are invariably produced before the Court, in the first instance, by a constable or by an assistant constable, whose duty it also is to warn all necessary witnesses to attend. The proceedings are then carried on as follows. 1st. In cases which are disposed of summarily, evidence is given by the witness in the presence and hearing of the Queen's law officers, of the accused party, and of the tribunal (i.e. the Cour ordinaire sitting as a Court of "police correctionnelle") which has to decide on the charge. The evidence of the witness is given orally, partly by way of statement, and partly in answer to questions put to him on the part of the Court, of the Queen's officers, or of the party charged.

SERIES III.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Her Majesty's Procureur.

2ndly. In cases indictable, but not feloniously, evidence is given by the witness, in the first instance and before the commitment, before the "Cour ordinaire," which is not the tribunal which finally has to decide on the charge, though the functionaries who sit in the Cour ordinaire usually form a part of it, and in the presence of the Queen's law officers, but in private, and in the absence and out of the hearing of the accused party, orally, partly by way of statement, and partly in answer to questions put to him by the Court. After the commitment, the proceedings are carried on in the names of the Queen's officers: and, on the day of trial, the evidence of the witness is given orally in the presence of the Queen's officers, of the accused party, and of the tribunal which has to decide on the charge.

3rdly. In cases which are indictable feloniously, evidence is given by the witness in private, and, until the commitment, in precisely the same manner as in cases of offences indictable, but not feloniously. After the commitment, and after the prisoner has chosen his counsel and the Queen's officers have been ordered to prove, the evidence of the witness is taken in private before the Cour ordinaire in presence of the Queen's officers, and out of the presence and hearing of the accused party, partly by way of statement and partly in answer to questions put to him at the time by the Court, and the whole is put into writing. And at a future stage of the proceeding, namely, when the witness is confronted with the accused, thence technically called "La confrontation," the evidence previously taken, and of which a copy has been delivered to the accused, is read in the presence of the witness, of the "Cour ordinaire," of the Queen's officers, of the accused party, and of his counsel who may then put what interrogatories they please to the witness. On a future day the witnesses on behalf of the accused party are examined in his presence, in that of his counsel, and of the Queen's officers before the "Cour ordinaire, on questions put to them at the time by the prisoner or his counsel, or by the Court. The whole of the evidence, as well against as for the prisoner, is put into writing, and read at the trial in the presence and hearing of the Queen's officers, of the accused party, of his counsel, and of the tribunal, that is, of the "Cour en corps," which has to decide on the charge.

3. The law of Guernsey requires that all evidence relating to a criminal charge, except that of Quakers and Moravians, whose affirmation is admitted, shall be given under the sanction of the oath of the witness.

4. A person cannot give evidence before the age of puberty; that age is fourteen years for males, and twelve for females. Children under the age of puberty have sometimes been allowed to give information to the Court before the commitment, but never on oath, nor at the trial.

5. The excluding a party from giving evidence on the ground of "want of religious belief" is a point which has, I believe, never been raised. Our law, speaking of the exclusion of persons from giving evidence under the words "mal renommez," merely says, "ceci est special en ces deux crimes de parjure et de mescreantise, c'est à dire d'hérésie et de mal sentir la foi que la renommée suffise pour débouter un témoin." Terrien, Livre 9e, fol. 394.

6. Conviction of perjury or felony renders a person incompetent as a witness for or against a party charged with an offence.

7. The sovereign's free pardon restores the competency of such person as witness.

8, 9, and 10. A party charged with an offence cannot be a witness either for or against another party charged with the same offence. But a party charged may be admitted evidence for the Crown by the Court on the prayer of the Queen's officers: the evidence of such a witness would be received with much caution, and would require confirmation by extrinsic evidence.

11. The husband and wife can never be witnesses for or against each other.

12. I have already observed that in Guernsey no private person can prosecute for indictable offences, and that all proceedings after the commitment are carried on in the names of the Queen's officers: consequently the question of affinity or consanguinity of the witness with respect to them cannot arise. With respect to the party charged, affinity or consanguinity to the degree of first cousin inclusively is sufficient to cause the witness to be declared incompetent, if objected to by the Queen's officers. A witness within that degree of affinity or consanguinity to a party charged may refuse to declare.

13. Before the commitment, the Court may question the party charged touching the offence: but, after the Interrogatory is taken and the party committed, it is not competent in the Court, or in the Queen's officers, to question the party charged on any point whatever.

14. The statements of the party charged, or his conversation with third persons, "en temps non suspect," are admissible in evidence either for or against him.

15. If such statements have been made by the party under the influence of a promise or threat, they are inadmissible.

16. Perhaps the best answer to this question may be by citing the law, Terrien, book 12, 523. "S'aucun recognoit en lieu commun le crime dont il est suy, lui mesme se juge et damne. Pourveu que le crime soit vérifié et qu'il n'apparoisse de l'erreur de la confession." Notwithstanding such confession, the party on his trial is permitted to adduce evidence in proof of his innocence.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Her Majesty's Procureur.
August 17th, 1846.

17. The examination of a witness, whether for or against an accused, is confined to what he knows of his own knowledge; the declaration of a person who, at the time of making it, believes himself to be dying, is admitted.

18. I apprehend that no evidence of the contents of a written document can be received without producing it, or accounting to the satisfaction of the Court for its non-production.

19. Should a written document be in the hands of the Queen's officers they would produce it as a matter of duty. The question with respect to a written document in the hands of the accused has not arisen, that I am aware of, during the last forty years: but I apprehend that, on legal notice being given to the accused to produce it and on his failing to do so, evidence would be admitted of its contents.

20. When there are attesting witnesses, they need not all be produced; two are sufficient. In case of the death of some or of all the attesting witnesses, proof of their handwriting is required. I am not aware that the age of the instrument makes any difference in the mode of proof. It may be proper to observe that the cases alluded to in this question can never arise in matters of real property, as in this Island all deeds for the transfer of such property are passed before the Court in the nature of "Confessions," and are never signed by the parties or by witnesses; and that by a most wholesome law, invariably acted upon, no transfer of real property is valid except it be passed "devant justice."

21. The seal of the Island, the seal of the Ecclesiastical Court of this Island, the seals of Municipal Corporate bodies, the seals of British Courts of Justice, and the seals of any Foreign Courts of Justice, when duly attested by the proper English authorities resident in the countries, prove themselves.

22. Evidence of the character of the party accused may be given for him at the trial. Evidence of particular acts of good conduct may be given in proof of character.

23. A witness may refuse to answer a question on the ground that it may subject him to criminal liability, and also, I apprehend, because it may discredit him, but not that it may subject him to civil liability.

24. Evidence may be given of the bad or good character of a witness. Such evidence may be met by opposite evidence.

25. A witness can be asked what he has formerly said; and evidence may be given to contradict his answer.

26. The evidence of one witness is not sufficient for the establishment of any particular fact without corroborative circumstances.

27. Witnesses are not paid for the expense to which the inquiry has put them. Witnesses residing in this Island are not paid until the commitment; after the commitment they are summoned by the Queen's officers, and are entitled to one shilling and sixpence for each day they attend Court. A witness from Sark is paid passage money, and one shilling and sixpence for each day he remains in Guernsey. A witness from Alderney is paid passage money to and from one Island to the other, and five shillings per day for board and lodging while absent from Alderney, and one shilling for each case each day he attends Court. They are all paid by the Queen's Receiver General from Her Majesty's revenues in Guernsey; but when persons are found guilty they are condemned to costs; and, if they have the means, they are bound to reimburse the Queen's Receiver General.

The Answers of J. De Havilland Utermarch, Esq. Her Majesty's Contrôle at Guernsey to the Third Series of Questions.

J. De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Her Majesty's Contrôle.
August 20th, 1846.

1 and 2. These questions are fully answered in Series No. 1.

3. All evidence relating to a criminal charge must be given on oath, with the exception in favour of Quakers and Morvians as admitted in England by Acts of Parliament, some of which are registered in Guernsey.

4. No male under fourteen years of age, or female under twelve, can be admitted as witness.

5. I have never known this question raised; and the law on the subject is obscure: but I apprehend that want of religious belief would exclude a person being admitted as witness.

6. Conviction of perjury, homicide, arson, larceny, or other public crime would render a person incompetent as a witness.

7. The Sovereign's free pardon would restore the competency of such a person; and the Act of 9 Geo. 4, c. 32, being registered in the Island by virtue of an Order in Council, I apprehend the provisions of that Act would be held to apply.

8, 9, and 10. A party charged with an offence cannot be admitted a witness for or against another party charged with the same offence, unless when admitted as evidence for the Crown by permission of the Court, on the prayer of the Law Officers. In practice, the testimony of such a witness is not considered sufficient for the conviction of the accused without some confirmatory evidence.

11. Neither husband nor wife can, under any circumstances, be admitted as witness for or against each other.

12. As all prosecutions for crime are conducted by, and in the name of, the Law Officers of the Crown, no incompetency from affinity or consanguinity can arise except with the party charged; and this extends to the degree of first cousins inclusively. The Law Officers may summons relations of the accused within that degree as witnesses for the Crown; in which case it is optional with them to give their testimony or to refuse it.

13. The party charged is never questioned except in his "interrogatoire."

14. The statements of the party charged, or his conversations with third persons, are admissible in evidence for or against him; but they must appear to have taken place "dans un temps non suspect."

15. It does.

16. The confession of a party charged with having committed an offence is sufficient evidence of his guilt, provided the offence with which he is charged is proved to have been committed at the time and place and in the manner laid in the indictment. Notwithstanding such confession, he may adduce on his trial evidence in proof of his innocence.

17. It is usual, in practice, for the witness to be told to state generally what he knows about the matter in question. His examination is confined to the facts which he knows of his own knowledge. The declarations made to a witness by a person believing himself dying and since dead would, I conceive, be admissible as evidence, with the restrictions adopted by the English law.

18. I do not conceive that the contents of a written document can be stated in evidence without the production of the document, unless the Court be satisfied as to the cause of its not being produced.

19. The Law Officers of the Crown are bound to produce every document they may have in their possession as "pièce des procès," and, in practice, do so during the interrogatoire of the prisoner. During this proceeding the prisoner is asked to produce any written document he may have in his possession bearing on the case; should he refuse to do so, I apprehend, the Law Officers might serve on him a written notice (by means of the Queen's Serjeant) to produce it on the trial, and in default thereof might offer evidence of its contents.

20. When witnesses have attested the execution of a written instrument, two of their number must be produced. In case of the death of all the attesting witnesses, proof of their handwriting is required. I am not aware of any rule respecting the age of an instrument.

21. The seal of the Bailiwick, that of the Ecclesiastical Court of the Island, that of a Municipal Corporate body in England, of an English Court of justice, or of any Foreign Court of justice attested by the English Consul or other functionary resident in such foreign country, all respectively prove the document to which they may be annexed.

22. Evidence of the general character of the accused may be produced on his trial; and evidence of particular acts of good conduct in proof of such character is usually allowed. The Law Officers of the Crown, in giving their "conclusions" as to the punishment to be awarded, may, and in practice do, usually produce records of former convictions of the accused.

23. A witness may refuse to answer a question, on the ground that the answer may subject him to criminal liability, but not on the ground that it may subject him to civil liability. I do not know of any case in which the question of discredit has been raised.

24. Evidence of the bad character of a witness can be given; and such evidence may introduce particular facts. This may be met to the fullest extent by opposite evidence.

25. A witness can be asked what he has formerly said; and evidence can be given to contradict his answer.

26. The general rule is that two witnesses are required for the complete proof of a particular fact. In practice, this having been found unsatisfactory, the evidence of one witness is sufficient on each particular circumstance.

27. No witnesses resident in Guernsey are paid, except for their attendance on summonses for the trial, in which case they are paid 1*s.* 6*d.* a day on each summons. Witnesses, coming to the Island from Alderney or Serk to give testimony concerning offences committed in those Islands, receive their passage money and board while in the Island, with a similar fee of 1*s.* 6*d.* for each day's attendance at Court. Medical men, when required by the Court to attend an inquest, receive 10*s.* 6*d.* for their depositions concerning the state, &c. of the body and cause of death, and 1*l.* 1*s.* if there is a regular post mortem examination. The whole of these expenses are paid by Her Majesty's Receiver General out of the Crown Revenues of the island.

SERIES III.

Robert M'Culloch, Esq., Advocate.

August 29th, 1846.

The Answers of Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Guernsey, to the Third Series of Questions.

1. This question is answered in my replies to the 6th, 9th, 17th, and 18th questions of the first series.

2. This question is also answered by my above mentioned replies. I need only add, that it is the practice to call upon witnesses to make a statement of the facts within their knowledge before any questions are put to them.

3. All evidence relating to a criminal charge must be given, at every stage of the proceedings, under the sanction of the oath of the witness. The evidence of Quakers is received upon their solemn affirmation.

4. No person under the age of puberty can be admitted as a witness. Fourteen years is considered the age of puberty in males, and twelve in females.

5. I am of opinion that he can be excluded.

6. Conviction of perjury, homicide, arson, larceny, or any other public crime of a like nature, renders a person incompetent as a witness either for or against a party charged with an offence.

7. The ancient law, as laid down by Terrien, is silent with respect to the restoration of the competency of such persons as witnesses, though I have no doubt that it would be restored by a Royal pardon. I conceive that the provisions, relating to this subject, contained in the statute 9 G. 4, c. 32, would now be followed, that statute having been registered in Guernsey in obedience to an Order in Council, dated 3rd January, 1840. The subject is not, however, free from difficulty, the Island not being named in the Act.

8 and 9. A party charged with an offence is incapable of being a witness for another party charged with the same offence. He is also incapable of being a witness against such party, unless the proceedings against him be abandoned by the Crown Lawyers, with the sanction of the Court, in order to enable him to give evidence.

10. The testimony of a party who has been admitted to give evidence for the Crown must be confirmed by extrinsic evidence. I cannot undertake to define the extent to which such confirmation is necessary, as that must depend on the circumstances of the case.

11. A husband cannot, under any circumstances, be a witness for or against his wife, nor a wife for or against her husband.

12. The Crown Lawyers being the sole prosecutors in all purely criminal proceedings, no incompetency arises from the affinity or consanguinity of the witness with the injured party, who is himself admitted as a witness. No person can be admitted to give evidence for a party charged with an offence who stands to such party in the relationship of husband or wife, or in the relationship of father or mother, son or daughter, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, great uncle or great aunt, nephew or niece, great nephew or great niece, or cousin germain, whether by consanguinity or affinity. These relatives, with the exception of the husband and wife, are, however, admitted for the purpose of proving an alibi. Persons standing in the above mentioned degrees of relationship to an accused party, except the husband and wife, may be admitted as witnesses against him; but it is generally understood that they cannot be compelled to depose.

13. It is not competent either to the Crown Lawyers or the Court to question the party charged, except at the period when his "Interrogatoire" is taken, as explained in my answer to the 6th question of the 1st series.

14. The statements of the party charged, or his conversations with third persons, before or after he has been charged with the offence, are admissible in evidence against him. The statements made by him before he was charged with the offence are admissible in evidence for him, provided such statements were made "en temps non suspect."

15. Statements made by the party charged, under the influence of a promise or a threat, are inadmissible in evidence.

16. The confession of a party charged with an offence is evidence of his guilt, provided the corpus delicti be substantiated by other evidence, and provided his confession do not appear to be erroneous ("Pourvu que le crime soit vérifié et qu'il n'apparaisse de l'erreur de la confession"). He is, notwithstanding such confession, permitted on his trial to adduce evidence in proof of his innocence.

17. Hearsay may be objected to in criminal cases, except with respect to a declaration made by a person who believed himself to be dying at the time of making it, the English rules on the subject of dying declarations being followed here.

18. A witness is not permitted to state in evidence the contents of a written document, unless its non-production be satisfactorily accounted for.

19. The circumstances supposed in this question can rarely occur in Guernsey, in consequence of the Crown Lawyers being the accusers in all criminal prosecutions, and in consequence of the "Interrogatoire" to which the accused is subjected. The Crown Lawyers are clearly bound to produce every producible document in their hands; and the practice is to exhibit all such documents to the accused when his "Interrogatoire" is taken, and to lodge them at the Greffe Office until the trial. If the party accused were supposed to have in his possession any document which was considered important, he would be called upon at his "Interrogatoire" to produce it; and, should he refuse to do so, a minute would be taken by the Greffier of such refusal, which would authorize the introduction of other evidence to prove the contents of such document.

GUERNSEY.

SERIES III.

Robert M'Culloch, Esq., Advocate.

August 29th, 1846.

20. In consequence of the mode of procedure to which I have referred in my answer to the preceding question, proof of the execution of a written instrument does not often become necessary, such instruments being generally produced at the time of the "Interrogatoire" of the party accused, and frequently admitted by him. Proof of handwriting is generally required; but there cannot be said to be any particular rules respecting the proof of the execution of written instruments, the Court exercising considerable discretion in such cases according to circumstances.

21. When Actes of the Royal Court of Guernsey are required to be produced in evidence, the originals are generally produced in Court in the custody of the Greffier. Copies of such Actes, authenticated under the seal of the Bailiwick, are admitted as authentic. Copies of contracts or deeds regarding transfers of real property in Guernsey (which are always passed before the Court) are also evidence when produced under the seal of the Bailiwick; or the books in which such contracts have been registered at the Greffe Office may be produced in the custody of the Greffier. Acts or judgments of Courts of justice in every part of Her Majesty's dominions are regarded as authentic when under the seals of such courts. Documents certified under the official seals of Municipal Officers in the British empire, or Governors of Colonies, are also regarded as authentic. It is generally considered that foreign documents of the above description ought to be further certified under the official seal of a British Consul or other like functionary.

22. Evidence of the character of the party accused may be given for him at the trial. In cases in which the evidence is given vivâ voce at the trial, the Crown Lawyers may recal any of the witnesses who have been examined on the part of the prosecution, or may examine any of the witnesses called by the party charged, to contradict such evidence of character; but they cannot call any fresh witnesses. A witness is permitted to instance particular acts of good conduct. The Crown Lawyers may produce former convictions against an accused party.

23. A witness cannot refuse to answer a question put to him on the ground that the answer may subject him to civil liability; but he may refuse to answer on the ground that the answer may subject him to criminal liability, or may discredit him.

24. Evidence may be given of the bad or good character of a witness; but particular facts cannot be introduced. Such evidence is allowed to be met by opposite evidence. I must, however, observe that, in the case of offences described in the indictment as felonious, in which the evidence is all taken down in writing, the limits within which such evidence is restricted are, from the nature of the proceedings, exceedingly small. In cases in which the evidence is given vivâ voce there is more latitude; but, as all the witnesses on both sides are sworn together and no fresh witnesses can afterwards be called, no evidence of the bad or good character of the witness can be derived except from the other witnesses who have sworn at the same time. If a person who has been summoned as a witness is objected to on the ground of his being inadmissible by reason of bad character derived from the commission of crime, such objection is made, as in every other case in which a witness is objected to as incompetent, before the swearing in of the witnesses. Should it be necessary to bring forward witnesses for the purpose of substantiating such objection, as, for example, to prove that the witness objected to had formerly been convicted of perjury, such witnesses may again be objected to on the ground of incompetency; but witnesses called to substantiate an objection to a witness who has himself been called to substantiate an objection to another witness cannot be objected to. "Et est à noter qu'on peut reprocher les témoins produits pour la vérification des saons et sur ce appointer les parties en preuve. Mais on ne peut reprocher les témoins produits sur les secondes reproches. Quia testes reprobatorios probatoriorum reprobare licet: sed reprobatorios reprobatoriorum reprobare non licet. Sinon qu'on fit promptement apparoir par lettre de saon qu'on voudrait alléguer contre les derniers témoins réprobatoires."

25. A witness may be asked, with a view of impeaching his present evidence, what he has formerly said; and evidence may be given to contradict his answer. But such evidence can only be derived from the other witnesses who have been sworn at the same time as himself.

26. The rule is as follows: "Tout témoignage doit être en la bouche de deux ou de trois hommes." This rule, however, is not at present construed as meaning that each individual fact must be substantiated by two witnesses de visu, but merely as rendering the unsupported testimony of a single witness insufficient to procure a conviction.

27. Witnesses are not paid for the expense to which the inquiry has put them. When a surgeon is called upon to make a post mortem examination, he receives one guinea if it is found necessary to open the body, and half a guinea if it is not found necessary to do so. These payments are made out of the Crown Revenues of the island. Witnesses are not entitled to be paid for attending Court previous to the committal for trial of the party charged. After he has been committed they are entitled to eighteen pence for each day's attendance. Witnesses from Alderney and Serk are paid their passage money, board and lodging, and one shilling and sixpence for each day they attend at Court. These payments are also made out of the Crown Revenues; but, if the party charged is convicted, the amount may be recovered from him if he has means.

SERIES III.

Henry Tupper, Esq., Advocate.

The Answers of Henry Tupper, Esq., Advocate of the Royal Court of Guernsey, to the Third Series of Questions.

1. The answers given to the questions in Series No. 1 answer this question, to meet which fully would require a statement of the whole system that has already been given.

2. Idem.

3. Yes, except in cases of Quakers and Moravians, as provided by the English Acts of Parliament registered here. There is no difference in this respect in the several stages of the proceedings.

4. Infants under the age of puberty are not admissible as witnesses. Fourteen years old in the male, and twelve in the female, are respectively the ages of puberty.

5. I apprehend that the want of religious belief in a person produced as a witness would determine the court to refuse administering the oath; but it would require the profession of very strong opinions to warrant the exclusion.

6. Conviction of perjury, or of a crime carrying with it civil death, operate against the competency of a witness. In lighter offences he is not held to be admissible while under sentence.

7. The Sovereign's free pardon.

8. No.

9 If the Law Officers of the Crown withdraw their charge against an accused, and pray the Court to have him admitted as evidence for the Crown, such evidence is received.

10. Other confirmatory evidence would be required besides that of such a witness to warrant a conviction.

11. Marriage operates absolutely against the admissibility of the evidence of either husband or wife against each other.

12. Witnesses within the degree of first cousin, either by blood or affinity, can be objected to.

13. The party accused is never questioned after the interrogatory has once been taken, as explained in the answers to series No. 1.

14. Yes. But these conversations would never of themselves constitute an absolute proof.

15. Yes.

16. Not unless the "Corps du délit" be also proved, and the indictment offer no irregularity.

17. The declaration of the witness may strictly be confined to what he knows of his own knowledge. The declaration made to a witness by a person believing himself dying, and who is since dead, would be evidence under the circumstance, for what it is worth.

18. No, except he account satisfactorily for its loss, destruction, or non-production.

19. The Law Officers of the Crown are bound to produce whatever documents they may possess; and, if they believe a document to exist in the possession of the accused, of which they require the production, they may cause the Police to make every search for the same; but, if unsuccessful in the search, I am not aware of any means they have to compel its production. They are bound to make out their own case; and an accused is not bound to criminate himself. If the existence of a document is fully proved, but of which the production is withheld, I conceive that evidence of the contents would be admissible.

20. When proof of the execution of a document is necessary, two witnesses are required either to attest the signature of the principal and of the attesting witnesses, one of whom, at least, is produced if possible. I do not know of any rule respecting the age of an instrument.

21. The acts of courts of justice, or of other bodies or persons, are required to be under the seal of the Court, whether civil or ecclesiastical, or to be duly authenticated under a public or corporate seal. The acts of foreign courts, or of bodies or persons acting in foreign countries, independent of their own seal, require the attestation of the English Consul or other British resident authority; but this latter is not always exacted.

22. Evidence of the character of the party accused can be given for or against him; and particular acts of good or bad conduct may be alleged: but such evidence is susceptible of explanation and contradiction.

23. A witness may refuse to answer a question that will subject him to criminal liability.

24. Evidence, both general and particular, of the character of the witness can be given; and this evidence may be fully rebutted by other evidence.

25. A witness can be asked what he has formerly said; and evidence can be given to impeach his present evidence. But, when the witnesses have been sworn, and the trial has commenced, it is not usual to allow the production of further evidence.

26. The general rule requires two witnesses to establish a particular fact; but one witness, with corroborating facts or evidence, is held sufficient.

27. Resident witnesses are paid one shilling and sixpence sterling per day's attendance. Witnesses from Alderney or Serk receive in addition their passage and board and lodging money.

These expenses in criminal cases are paid out of the Crown Revenues of the Island.

MINUTES OF EVIDENCE

TAKEN BEFORE THE

COMMISSIONERS appointed to inquire into the STATE of the CRIMINAL LAW in the CHANNEL ISLANDS.

AT THE COURT HOUSE, ST. PETER PORT, GUERNSEY.

---

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

September 24th 1846.

Thursday, September 24, 1846.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine, examined.

3282. Will you be kind enough to give the Commissioners the names of the Bailiff and Jurats?—The name of the Bailiff is Mr. Peter Stafford Carey. The names of the Jurats are Mr. Jean Le Messurier, Mr. Jean Le Marchant, Sir William Collings, Mr. Hilary Olivier Carré, Mr. Frederic Mansell, Mr. Thomas William Gosselin, Mr. Thomas Le Retilley, Mr. Harry Dobrée, Jun., Mr. Thomas De Havilland, Mr. Thomas Andros, Mr. Edgar MacCulloch, Mr. William Peter Metivier.

3283. Will you name the gentlemen of the Bar?—Myself, Mr. John De Havilland Utermarck, the Contrôle.

3284. The office of Contrôle answers in some respects to that of Solicitor General, does it not?—Yes.

3285. The Procureur de la Reine being the Attorney General?—Yes.

3286. Are they considered as members of the Bar?—It has been usual, when the Procureur has been obliged to enter a cause for any work done by him for any client, to put "Charles de Jersey, Procureur de la Reine et Avocat de la Cour Royale."

3287. Will that apply exclusively to civil proceedings?—Yes.

3288. Will you give us the names of the rest of the Bar, who are in actual practice?—Mr. Robert MacCulloch, Mr. Thomas John Blondel Falla, Mr. Henry Tupper, Mr. Peter Jeremie.

3289. There are only four in actual practice?—That is all.

3290. The whole number being six?—Yes; the limited number is six.

3291. One gentleman, we understand, at present is suspended?—Yes.

3292. Is the other office absolutely vacant?—Yes.

3293. How long has it been so?—Since Mr. Utermarck has been Contrôle.

3294. How long is that?—A twelvemonth.

3295. (To Mr. Utermarck.) Of what standing were you at the Bar when you were appointed?—I was junior member.

3296. When were you first called to the Bar?—In April 1839.

3297. (To Mr. De Jersey.) Are the Crown officers appointed by the Crown?—Yes.

3298. Can you trace the origin of the style "Royal Court?" Do you know how early it was called so?

3299. Colonel De Havilland. I conceive it was appointed the Royal Court after the King had given fiefs to which he attached jurisdiction: it was necessary to have a Court of Appeal. There is nothing positive in history that I know of: but I consider that it has constantly been called La Cour du Roi. I have never seen any document extant to shew how or when the jurisdiction was transferred from the Court of Rouen to the King in Council; but it seems naturally to have been so.

3300. Your view is, that, upon the separation of the Island from the Duchy of Normandy, there ceased to be any Superior Court, and therefore it became the Cour Royale?—Yes.

3301. How is it styled in the "Précepte d'Assize?"—It is there called La Cour Nôtre Seigneur le Roy. I believe there is no other term used for this Court but the Cour Royale.

3302. In what ancient document is the term Cour Royale first used?—I believe it is used in the Précepte d'Assize.

3303. There are much earlier documents, are not there, than the Précepte d'Assize?—There is the Inquest of Henry the Third.

3304. What is the style of the Court as mentioned in that document?—I do not think it is mentioned in that document.

3305. Can you give us the date of the Précepte d'Assize?—The year thirteen hundred and thirty one.

3306. Mr. Pierre S. Carey (Bailiff). The following is a Writ in the 4th year of Edward the Third, to which the Précepte d'Assize in the following year was probably the return. It is a Copy of the Record in the Tower of London.

3307. The same was put in, and is as follows.

We have several ancient documents of this kind from 1400 to the present time. I know there are some earlier than 1400. I dare say Mr. MacCulloch would be able to produce dates considerably earlier. Here (producing them) are certain ancient contracts, which I produce merely for the purpose of showing the Title of the Court. The first is of the 5th of November, 1408. The Bailiff is there stiled Bailli de nostre Seigneur le Roi d' Engleterre. The Jurats are called " Jureis de la Court nostre dit Seigneur le Roi." In this of the year 1426, the Bailiff is called " the Bailiff under the Most Noble and Puissant Prince, the Duke of Bedford, the Lord of the Isles ;" and it mentions " jures de la Cour de mon dit seigneur." I can shew you also in a printed work, Berry's History of the Island of Guernsey, a Grant by Letters Patent under the Privy Seal, the 27th Nov., 3rd Henry V., of the Islands of Jersey, Guernsey, Sark, and Alderney, to the Duke of Bedford, who held them en appanage. The same book also contains the Grant of a Public Seal of the 15th of Nov., 7th Edw. I. The Public Seal is this (producing the same), which, the Commissioners will observe, contains the Arms of England. He calls it sigillum nostrum. The Seal can only be affixed by the Bailiff.

Insularum de Jersey et Guernsey Salutem. Quia homines nostri Insularum prædictarum diversa damna et pericula non modica, quandoque in mari per naufragium, quandoque in terrâ per depredationes et alia viarum discrimina, multo toties hactenus sunt perpessi, pro eo præcipuè quod in insulis illis nullum huc usque sigillum habuimus, cum quo seu per quod brevia hominum de partibus illis consignari, aut ipsorum negotia ibidem possent expediri. Nos ad communem utilitatem hominum partium earundem hujusmodi periculis et damnis congruo remedio prospici cupientes, quoddam sigillum nostrum, quo de cætero ibidem uti voluimus et quod vobis transmittimus, fecimus provideri, ut in posterum brevia, quæ homines Insularum prædictarum hactenùs in Cancellariâ nostrâ Angliæ impetrare consueverunt et de cætero impetrare voluerint, et conventiones et contractus quos ibidem a modo alternatim fieri contigerit, et qui hactenus tantummodo verbo tenus, et non per scripturam fieri solebant, eodem sigillo de cætero consignentur. Grant of King Henry V. to his brother, the Duke of Bedford, of the Government and Regalities of the Islands.

" Anno 3 Hen. V.

3309. Do any of the grants which confirm the privileges of the Island refer specifically to the power of the Cour Royale to make ordinances?

3310. Mr. De Havilland. Yes. The Order in Council of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in 1568.

3311. Can you refer the Commissioners to that particular part of the Order in Council which gives that authority?—The 4th article of the Order of 1568, is the following. " Item. That all grants and confirmations of privileges from the Queen's Majesty and her progenitors shall be always inviolably observed, maintained, and kept in force with the credit of the Bailiff and Jurats, to be obeyed in all their ordinances made and to be made for the good government, surety, and quietness of the said Isle, and that no officer or Minister of Justice be at any time hereafter resisted, impeached, or imprisoned for executing the sentences, ordinances, and constitutions aforesaid, but maintained and assisted according to the laws, usage, and ancient customs of the Isle." It is also mentioned in the Approbation des Loix.

3312. What is the title of that Order in Council of 1568?—It was in answer to petitions of complaint from this Island.

3313. Are the petitions set out?—No, not at length. It recites that complaints have been lately made to " the Lords, and others of Her Majesty's Privy Council, of divers troubles and quarrels."

3314. (To the Procureur.) The language of the 4th Article to which Colonel De Havilland has referred us is this: " That all grants and confirmations of privileges from the Queen's Majesty and her progenitors shall be always inviolably observed, maintained, and kept in force with the credit of the Bailiff and Jurats, to be obeyed in all their ordinances made and to be made for the good government, surety, and quietness of the said Isle." The Commissioners understand the inference intended is that the word " Ordinances " refers to the species of bye-law which the Court now claims the power of making?—Yes.

3315. How do you distinguish that from a decree or a direction in a particular case over which the Court might have jurisdiction?—The one we consider as being a Legislative Act, and the other a Judicial Act.

3316. What induces you to draw that distinction? Why do you think that the word "Ordinance" means more than a decree in a particular case?

3317. Mr. Andros. We infer it from the following words: that Ordinances are to be made "for the good government, surety, and quietness of the said Isle."

3318. The Procureur. We have three pleas in the year which we call the Chief Pleas. The Ordinances are made there.

3319. Do you ever now use the word "Ordonnance" for a decree in a particular case?—Never.

3320. Have you any trace of its having been so used?—No: I ought to add, that an Ordonnance is never passed without hearing the conclusions of the Crown lawyers.

3321. Is not that the case with reference to every other Acte?—The Crown lawyers never give their conclusions in civil cases.

3322. You have stated that those Ordinances could not pass without their being preceded by the conclusions of the Crown Officers; in that particular respect they would not differ, would they, from the form of proceeding in any particular criminal prosecution?—In certain criminal prosecutions the Crown lawyers, as public accusers, give their conclusions, and ask for a punishment. In this case they give their conclusions either for the passing of the law or against it.

3323. Mr. De Havilland. It should be said that the 4th Article arose from the circumstance of a constable having been put in prison for having obeyed an Ordinance of the Royal Court.

3324. Do you know what was the particular Ordinance?—No; it is not stated what particular Ordinance it was.

3325. A constable would hardly be carrying into effect so much a Legislative Act as a sentence of the Court?—It refers to either case.

3326. You think that this means a Legislative Ordinance of the Court?—Yes, an order taken in the Court of Chief Pleas. The Governor is always present there, or at least has been invited to come.

3327. The Bailiff. There are no Judicial Orders made by the Court of Chief Pleas.

3328. What is the Court of Chief Pleas?

3330. The Court of Chief Pleas is not a Judicial Court, but a Legislative Court?—It is Legislative and not Judicial. "The Ordinances are passed after hearing Her Majesty's Law Officers, without whose conclusions or opinions no Ordinance can be passed."

3331. What are you reading from?—From the case of Tupper and others against the Treasurer of the Hospital of St. Peter Port, and Tupper and others against the Constables of St. Peter Port. There were two cases in which the same questions were submitted to Her Majesty, and they are reported in 3rd Knapp, p. 406, the last case in the book. I think I can express my meaning more clearly by reading from this case. "An Ordinance binds all the inhabitants. The Court, in its judicial capacity, cannot set it aside. On the contrary, it is bound to respect and enforce it; so much so, that from time immemorial, all the public functionaries, from the Lieutenant Governor to the assistant-constables inclusively, on admission to office, swear they will observe the Ordinances of the Royal Court, and cause them to be observed. No appeal is admitted from any Ordinance."

3332. Do you mean no appeal from the passing of the Ordinance?—On the passing of an Ordinance, I apprehend that a complaint may be made to the Privy Council, not a regular appeal.

3333. That would be incidental to every Legislative Act of the States, would it not?—Yes.

3334. Is there any appeal from a sentence given under an Ordinance?—No: there may be a complaint to the Privy Council against the Ordinance itself, but no appeal from a sentence under it. That is provided in the following Order in Council of October 9th, 1580, Art. 2nd. Item.—"Whereas they complain that they are restrained from appeals, it is ordered, that it shall be lawful for any of the inhabitants of that Isle, and all others, finding themselves grieved with any judicial decree, sentence, or judgment, made and given by the Bailiff and Jurats of that Isle, to appeal from the same to Her Majesty and the Lords of Her Privy Council, so as the same may be made at the time of such decree, sentence or judgment, or within fifteen days after notice of the same, provided that it shall not be lawful to appeal in any case criminal or of correction, nor from the execution of any order taken in the Court of Chief Pleas, nor in cries of Haro, nor from any matter moveable not exceeding the sum of 10*l.* sterling."

3335. Is the presence of any particular number of Jurats necessary for making an Ordinance?—Yes; the making and promulgation of an ordinance ought to take place in the Court of Chief Pleas, and the Bailiff and seven Jurats must be present. When an Ordinance is required between one Chief Pleas and another, there being only three Chief Pleas in the course of the year, the Bailiff and seven magistrates can pass an Ordinance:

but, in that case, it must be what we call published, that is, it must be stuck up in different parts of the town.

3336. What is the technical term for that?—Affichée et publiée aux lieux ordinaires. An Ordinance passed at a regular Court of Chief Pleas does not require to be published or affichée. But as to one which is not passed at a regular Court of Chief Pleas, it is required—" Sera cette présente Ordonnance publiée et affichée aux lieux ordinaires afin que personne n'en prétende cause d'ignorance."

3337. Is there any other distinction between those two methods of making an Ordinance?—No.

3338. Are they sent to the Privy Council?—No. If the Commissioners will allow me, I can lend them a manuscript book with the Ordinances from, I believe, the beginning of the 16th century.

3339. Are they entered in the Greffier's book?—Yes.

3340. The Bailiff. If an Ordinance is made not in the Court of Chief Pleas it is usually made provisionally, to last till the next Chief Pleas only.

3341. Do you consider that essential?—It has been considered to be the proper course: whether essential or not I cannot pronounce an opinion upon, myself.

3342. What are the dates of holding Chief Pleas?—The Procureur. The first Monday after the 15th of January, the first Monday after Easter week, and the first Monday after the 29th of September.

3344. The Bailiff. I believe that 1521 is the earliest of which we have any record. What occurred before we do not know.

3345. I dare say you are aware that this power existed in Jersey up to 1771?—Yes.

3346. The Procureur. I have here (reading from the case of Tupper v. the Treasurer of the Hospital of St. Peter Port), " Of all the many ordinances which now regulate the Law proceedings, the Police, the Highways, the Harbours, the Vraic, the Importation and Exportation of Provisions, Lotteries, the Mode of Taxation, Settlement, as well as those which keep together and provide for the duties and discipline of that effective force, the Militia of the Island, there is not one but has been passed by the authority of the Royal Court."

3347. There is a passage in Colonel De Havilland's written evidence, which is an extract from the language of one of the old charters, that "such Ordinances are not to militate against any existing law or established custom of the country." Do you agree in that limitation?—I should say against any existing law; I would not go so far as to speak of custom.

3348. By " existing law " do you mean specific enactment?—Yes; written law. The Court are not authorized to change written laws.

3349. Among the written laws the Ordinances themselves would be enumerated?—Yes, in one sense of the word: but the Court have power to annul an Ordinance or substitute another; and they have always exercised that power.

3350. The Bailiff. I do not know that I can do better than give the Commissioners an instance which has occurred lately. It has been proposed to alter the law with respect to the admissibility of witnesses. The Court consider it cannot do that by an Ordinance alone upon its own authority, the objection to the admissibility being contained in Terrien, which is our law.

3351. In speaking of Terrien, do you not give the term written law rather a larger range than the Procureur does?—We look upon Terrien as being enacted. Terrien is held to be written law, so far as it is sanctioned by the Approbation des Loix in Queen Elizabeth's time; that gives validity to things which are Ordinances of French kings. I apprehend the Court has no power to repeal Terrien where it is in force, or any Order in Council, or any other law passed by an authority superior to that of the Court.

3352. Would you recognise a law of the States as superior to the law of the Court?—A law of the States acquires validity only by an Order in Council.

3353. Mr. Carré. When a new law is to be enacted, which cannot be accomplished by the Court alone, but requires the sanction of Her Majesty in Council, it has been the practice to submit it to the States for their approbation first, that is to say, before it goes to the Council.

3354. (To Mr. Carré.) Have the States any legislative authority whatever unless set in motion by the Court?—I conceive not.

3355. I understand you to tell us that, if the States passed a law, for instance, about party walls, prescribing that no houses should be built together without a wall of a certain thickness, they could not send that to the Privy Council without coming to the Court?—That has never been tried; but I conceive not.

3356. What are the functions of the States?—All financial concerns.

3357. Have they, except upon financial questions, no legislative power?—Properly not.

3358. Then the legislative power is in the Court of Chief Pleas?—Yes, to a certain extent.

3359. Exercised by the Bailiff and Jurats?—With the advice of the Crown Officers.

3360. Does the Bailiff vote?—He has the casting vote.

3361. In making an Ordinance?—Yes.

3362. The Bailiff. I apprehend that, if the States were to send up a legislative measure, which did not come from the Court, the question would arise before the Privy Council, whether it came from a competent authority. The question, I apprehend, would never arise in this Island.

3363. Why not?—Supposing the authority of the States to be null, yet, if that which they proposed was adopted by the Privy Council, it would become law by force of the Order of Council.

3364. The case would arise in this way: Supposing the States sent up a Bill to the Privy Council, and it was objected that it was not ripe for the cognizance of the Privy Council till it had gone through the Court?—The question would then arise before the Privy Council, not here.

3365. Of course there can be no doubt about what is the law in this Island?—I am not aware of any.

3366. All local laws, therefore, are made by the Jurats sitting in the Court of Chief Pleas?—By the Royal Court sitting in Chief Pleas.

3367. (To the Procureur.) Do the Procureur de la Reine and Contrôle vote upon every project of law?—They give no votes, but they give their conclusions upon every project of law.

3368. The Bailiff votes if the Court is equally divided, does he not?—Yes.

3369. The Bailiff. I apprehend, whenever the Court sits as a Court, the respective functions of the Bailiff and Jurats are the same.

3370. Mr. Andros. The Bailiff commences by stating his view of the subject, and recommends the Ordinance, if he thinks proper to do so, and then takes the opinions of the Jurats. If there is an equal number of Jurats on each side the Bailiff votes: but it is not meant that he has no voice unless the numbers are equal.

3371. (To the Procureur.) You say there is no appeal from anything done in pursuance of an Ordinance of the Court of Chief Pleas?—No.

3372. The Bailiff. I suppose the Commissioners mean this: If a person is brought before the Court for a breach of an Ordinance and condemned, there is no appeal from the condemnation.

3373. There is no appeal from any criminal sentence, is there?—No.

3374. This is what the Commissioners have collected from the evidence: that the Court themselves consider that, if a measure is not in violation of a written law, in the extended sense in which it has been explained, it becomes instantly law by enactment of the Court in Chief Pleas, provided the Privy Council do not interfere. But where it goes further than that, there you pass it through the States, and from the States to the Privy Council, and then it is not law till the Privy Council confirm it?—That is so. I do not apprehend it is in all cases necessary that it should go through the States.

3375. The States then have a legislative authority?—There is a certain legislative power vested in the States.

3376. Mr. Andros. The Court takes the initiative. They frame the law, and, when they have discussed it, they submit it to the States. If the States approve of it, it is sent to the Privy Council for confirmation. If the States reject it, it falls a dead letter to the ground.

3377. That applies only where the object is to change a written law?—A written law.

3378. Mr. Utermarck, Contrôle de la Reine. I do not think there is anything to prevent the Court of Chief Pleas passing an Ordinance, and submitting that Ordinance to the Privy Council, without its going through the States. They would not do it according to the modern practice; but there have been cases, where Ordinances have been sent immediately to the Privy Council without passing through the States. No Ordinances go to the Privy Council, unless they are considered to be an innovation.

3379. The Procureur. In an answer of the Court to the Privy Council, some years ago, the Court say they do not claim the power of changing any written law.

3380. Mr. Jeremie. That occurs in an answer transmitted by the Royal Court to the Privy Council the 10th of January, 1737, cited by the Appellants in Tupper and Others against the Constable of St. Peter Port. It is as follows,

"My Lords, we never pretended to be invested with the power and authority of making Laws, and it is what neither we nor our predecessors before us, ever assumed; but we beg leave to acquaint your Lordships, that this Court has always, as well by the nature of our constitution, as by virtue of sundry charters from the Crown, and other express Orders of Council, deemed itself authorized and empowered to make regulations, and set down such rules and methods as were necessary for enforcing and putting in due execution the Laws of the Island."

3381. Mr. Henry Tupper (Advocate). There appears to be a discrepancy, between the opinions of the Contrôle and some members of the Court, respecting the necessity of appealing to the States upon any alterations in the law, when the Court have framed an Ordinance which militates against the written Law. I agree with the Contrôle that it is not absolutely necessary to go to the States for that purpose, before the Royal Court can go to the Privy Council. It strikes me that the practice has originated from the Approbation des Loix. I refer especially to the 7th chapter of the 2nd book. "Nous n'avons accoustomé en cette Isle d'avoir gens de trois estats; mais toutes les affaires politiques se font par l'advis du Governeur Baillif et Jurez de la Cour Royalle après avoir par les Connestables connu le vouloir de la généralité du peuple." The Court of Chief Pleas have now strictly the power of passing all Ordinances, or what may be termed Bye Laws: and the "vouloir de la généralité" is sufficiently understood, in such matters of Bye Laws; for the constables are present, and the Governor is present, or has been invited to attend at the Court of Chief Pleas; and consequently the strict letter of the law is carried out by means of the forms which are observed at the Court of Chief Pleas. But, when a fundamental Law or a written Law is required to be changed, the Court never takes upon itself to be satisfied with the mere presence of the Constables in the Court of Chief Pleas, but it assembles the States, in order that the "vouloir de la généralité" may be thoroughly known: and, if the States were to reject the proposition, the Court would not proceed with it to the Privy Council, but it would be considered as cancelled.

3382. In what sense do you use the term Bye Law?—As a familiar illustration of the word Ordinance.

3383. It would appear that a great many laws must be included in "les affaires politiques," which are not variations of written laws?—I understand the expression to apply to all legislative enactments, which do not extend to the repeal of written laws.

3384. What do you take to be the reference to the Court of Chief Pleas in this 7th chapter of the Approbation des Loix?—At the time of the Approbation, the three bodies of the States were not in the habit of being assembled. They were, however, reorganized by the order of 1605. But the Court of Chief Pleas, I understand, never fell into desuetude at all.

3385. Do you understand the Governor, Bailiff, and Jurats mentioned in the 7th chapter to have constituted the Court of Chief Pleas?—Yes, with the constables, who were always assembled with them. When the States were in desuetude, the constables probably had some means by which they were enabled to bring to the cognizance of the Court the "vouloir de la généralité.

3386. Now we understand the opinion of the constables is not taken in the Court of Chief Pleas?—No. They are at liberty to make any observations they may think needful.

3387. By this 7th chapter the Governor, Bailiff, and Jurats are to act in "les affaires politiques," whatever they may be, after having, through the constables, obtained the consent of the generality of the people?—Before the Court is complete, at the present time, the constables are always called. They are always bound to attend, under a penalty: and, if they choose, they may make any observations in favour or disapproval of any proposition which may be submitted to the Court of Chief Pleas. They seldom do it; but they have the full right to do so.

3388. As matter of fact, are the constables present during the deliberations of the Court of Chief Pleas in making an Ordinance?—As matter of fact they are so.

3389. Colonel De Havilland. That is only by virtue of a recent Ordinance.

3390. Mr. Tupper (Advocate). I have no doubt they were always present in the manner referred to in the Approbation des loix. Very probably, the constables, being young men without experience, did not trouble themselves to come to the Chief Pleas at a time when the whole of their parishes might have an opportunity of expressing their opinion.

3391. In all cases the "vouloir de la généralite" would be collected at the Court of Chief Pleas?—Legally it is understood to be so.

3392. Then the difficulty is how came that not to be considered sufficient?—I understand it to have arisen at the time of the reconstitution of the States in 1605, when, all the parishes deliberating regularly at the States of Deliberation upon a proposition, they would have much better means of arriving at the knowledge of the "vouloir de la généralité," than they could possibly have in the Court of Chief Pleas, where the constables are not aware beforehand of the proposition to be discussed, and consequently cannot collect the opinions of their constituents.

3393. The difficulty is to understand how this passage assists us in distinguishing between the two classes of enactments; those which repeal a written law, and those which do not. Any hypothesis which may be obtained from this appears either to confine the enacting power to the Chief Pleas, or to throw it entirely upon the States.

3394. Mr. MacCulloch. There are one or two passages which may throw some light upon the subject. At that day certain Ordinances were evidently made by the Court. In the 10th chapter, 3rd Book, page 11. "Item, Pour la réparation des chemins la Justice en ordonne en Chefs Plaids, selon que la nécessité le requiert." This proves that the Court at that period made regulations or Ordinances for the repair of the roads.

3395. The Bailiff. My own opinion is that this 7th chapter has no relation to the enactment of Ordinances of any kind, "Nous n'avons accoustumés en cette Isle, d'avoir gens de trois estats, mais toutes les affaires politiques se font par l'advis du Gouverneur, Baillif, et Jurez de la Cour Royalle, après avoir par les connestables, connu le vouloir de la Généralité du peuple." That chapter relates to the state of the Island when there was no such body as the States. It refers to the chapter in Terrien, page 26, "Des gens des Trois Etats," and to the meetings of the States in Normandy for certain public purposes. We find, in the early history of the States, there were certain public purposes for which the States met; such, for instance, as to order that money should be levied for the defence of the Island when enemies were expected; purposes of a public administrative nature, which I apprehend to be "les affaires politiques," not the making of laws. This chapter of the Approbation has reference to them, and says, we have no such three bodies of States, but, when any public business is transacted, this is done by the Governor, Bailiff and Jurats, after having heard what the constables have to say as to the wish of the inhabitants. Those are very nearly what was the principal part of the duty of the States, when they were actually established. There is nothing in the context which leads me to think that legislation was here spoken of. I mean by legislation, the making of Ordinances. At the time of the Approbation the Court then was and had been, in Chief Pleas, in the habit of making Ordinances. Without our inquiring, at present, wherein the Chief Pleas consisted, the Approbation itself (the very same instrument which uses these ambiguous expressions) refers clearly to several instances of Ordinances made by the Court in Chief Pleas as matter of then existing fact. There is the same recognition of Ordinances made by the Court of Chief Pleas before the Commissioners of 1607.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

September 24th, 1846.

3396. Do you coincide with Mr. Tupper in thinking that the Governor, Bailiff, and Jurats of the Royal Court means the Court of Chief Pleas?—No. I think, whenever anything was to be done, those parties would assemble to take measures for the doing thereof. The Governor probably would have to summon the Bailiff and the Jurats to assemble to consider the measure which required to be passed.

3397. At the time the Approbation was written, we understand no States existed. Mr. Tupper appears to think this passage applies to the Court of Chief Pleas. We understand you to say you do not agree with him; but you think it applies to a meeting specially convened to consider "les affaires politiques," there being no States at the time in existence?—Either to a special or a general meeting not confined to the Court of Chief Pleas.

3400. How could there be a general meeting if there were no States?—I mean an ordinary meeting. It might be at an ordinary meeting of the Court, or it might be at a meeting of the persons here enumerated specially convened.

3401. Would that be in the character of a Court?—Yes, of a Court specially summoned, not of the Court as a judicial body. I think this does not refer to the Court of Chief Pleas at all; but it refers to those parties as members of the Royal Court.

3402. The Procureur. Perhaps what now takes place in one part of the Bailiwick may throw some light on that sentence. In Alderney, the Ordinances are passed by the Judge and the Jurats in Chief Pleas. At those Chief Pleas (and I believe from time immemorial it has been so) the Douzaine of Alderney is present: and, before they pass the Ordinance, they ask the advice of the Douzaine. It has always appeared to me that that might be the mode in which formerly, by the constables being present and by consulting them, they might know "le vouloir de la généralité du peuple." The constables being in the Court of Chief Pleas is a modern thing; but I understand that at the Court of Chief Pleas in Alderney the Douzaine is always there, and, before they pass an Ordinance, though the Judge and Jurats are not obliged to follow their advice, it has always been the custom to ask their advice.

3403. Mr. Mac Culloch. That is the way in which their States meetings are always held. The Douzaine is present by the constable. He has no vote; but he is always heard in the States on all affaires politiques.

3405. Your attention has been called to the fact that Mr. Le Marchant, in his "Remarques et Animadversions sur l'Approbation des Loix," seems rather to view this meeting as a meeting for purely legislative purposes, and to complain that, by the usurpation of the Royal Court, the States had been ousted of their right to take part in legislative discussions. You were calling our attention to the circumstances under which those remarks were written, as showing that that was an improper interpretation put upon the Approbation des Loix; will you have the goodness to give your opinion upon that subject?—The Approbation is of a date when the States were not in use. The Approbation, therefore, in speaking of what was then in use, speaks of some authority other than that of the States. The remarks of Mr. Le Marchant upon the Approbation were written at a time when the States had been long in existence.

3406. The States were revived in 1605?—Yes; and he wrote somewhere about 1660. It is enough, however, to say that when he wrote the States had been long in existence. He applies the observations in the Approbation, which originally had reference to something else, to the state of things which he found, that is to say, to the powers in his time exercised by the States.

3407. (To the Procureur.) We understood from you that the constables were originally admitted to the Court of Chief Pleas by an Ordinance. Can you give us the date of the Ordinance?—I think it is about 1801 or 1802.

3408. (To Mr. Tupper, Advocate.) You think the constables, at all times, formed a part of the Court of Chief Pleas?—That is my impression.

3409. Have you any ancient Acte of Court to which you can refer as showing their right to be present in ancient times? It might have been an ancient custom fallen into desuetude and revived by an Ordinance?—What the Procureur has just said, as to the Constitution of Alderney, bears me out in that. I think the constables were always present at the Court of Chief Pleas, or should have been so; and Mr. Le Marchant's observations upon Terrien, I think, fully confirm my view. My impression is, that the constables are constitutionally bound to be present at the Court of Chief Pleas, but that it had grown into disuse, as they found themselves very often, from want of talent or experience, unable to compete with the Court, and therefore they ceased coming until the Court passed an Ordinance compelling them to be there.

3410. Can you refer us to any Acte of the Court of Chief Pleas in which the constables are spoken of as a constituent part of the Court?—My object in making the observation which I did some time ago, was not relative to the origin of the power of the Court of Chief Pleas to make Ordinances. It was to account for the practice which has arisen of consulting the States upon Ordinances which are passed, varying from the written law of the Island.

3411. The Bailiff. I may mention that I have a book before me which is the most ancient book, in which the proceedings of the Chief Pleas are entered regularly, and I find no entry of any constables being present.

3412. Mr. Tupper (Advocate). Even since the new Ordinance there is no reference made to the presence of the constables in the Chief Pleas; consequently that does not bear out your view.

3413. Mr. Le Marchant. The constables, by the last order, were desired to appear at the Chief Pleas for the purpose of knowing what Ordinances were passed.

3414. The Bailiff. I should understand that, if they had been constituent members of the Court, in order to give validity to any Acte, they would have been entered originally.

3415. The Procureur. I do not think the constables have ever been named as being present.

3416. The Contrôle. I wish to say one word upon this chapter of Mr. Le Marchant. It appears to me entirely to confirm the view which the Bailiff has taken, that this chapter of the Approbation has nothing to do with the Chief Pleas, but refers to the States. As I understand, Mr. Le Marchant was a very violent partizan, and had resigned the offices he held in consequence of his violent opinions. He appears in this chapter to allude to the way in which the States were composed. In page 55, he says, with respect to the election of Jurats, "De quoy aussi nonobstant ce que dit ici l'Approbation sont depuis demeurées des vestiges notables en l'élection des Jurés et du Prevost du Roy par les personnes des dits trois Estats, qui est une affaire politique, et d'autant de conséquence qu'aucune autre." That has nothing to do with the Chief Pleas whatever. "Mais ces autheurs de l'Approbation, ayant rejetté les deux autres Estats, se sont acquis une dictature perpétuelle, par laquelle ils ménagent à leur poste les privilèges, disposent des deniers publics, et imposent taxes sur les habitants quand bon leur semble." I understand, "ils ménagent à leur poste les privilèges," to refer to the electing what men they please to offices. The inference which Mr. Le Marchant wishes to draw is, that, from the way in which the States are conducted, the Bailiff and Jurats assume to do of their own authority what ought to be done by the people. "Et quant au vouloir ou consentement du peuple par la bouche des connestables, ce n'est plus q'une ombre sans corps de la puissance ancienne des dits estats; la Justice" (that is, La Cour Royale) "emportant à présent les affaires de haute lucte, les connestables n'osants ou ne gagnants rien de tergiverser, tellement que le plus souvent ils acquiescent à des choses, dont la généralité du peuple n'a pas seulement ouy parler. Car aussi lorsque les dits Connestables sont mandés pour adviser à telles affaires politiques, on ne leur fait point communément sçavoir le subject sur quoy on doit délibérer pour prendre et recuellir l'opinion des habitants de leurs paroisses, et venir ensuite la déclarer en Cour; et si, se doutants ou estant d'ailleurs informés du subject pour lequel ils sont appellés à telles assemblées, qui s'appellent encore (mais abusivement) Estats, ils entreprenoyent de faire assembler chascun leurs paroisses respectivement pour cognoistre le vouloir de la généralité du peuple, cela seroit interpreté par les dits Baillif et Jurés, à sédition et émotion populaire; et, néanmoins, sans cela il leur est impossible d'en informer les juges, si on le veut faire, sans commission, consentement, ou mesme sans cognoissance des dits habitants. Les dits Jurés n'ayant pas de coustume de donner temps aux dits connestable, après leur avoir donné une fois à cognoistre ès dits prétendus Estats le subject, dont on doit resoudre, pour assembler les dits habitants et sçavoir leur volonté, afin de venir pour une seconde fois en Cour mieux préparés à dire leur advis. Comment donc, cognoissent-ils le vouloir de la généralité du peuple, selon qu'ils alléguent en ce lieu par une couleur plausible tendant à faire croire que les compilateurs de l'Approbation ont esté soigneux de conserver les privilèges des dits habitants en ce point, qui suivant la chartre aux Normans ne peuvent estre taillés sans leur gré et consentement." That appears clearly to shew that Mr. Le Marchant's complaint was, that the Court assumed the right of carrying everything before the States, and that the constables came there without knowing what was going to be deliberated on.

3417. The Bailiff. I may state that, for many years, it has been the custom for the Bailiff to propose, in the Billet d'Etat, every question which is to be submitted to the States. I think that was by virtue of an Order in Council in the time of William Le Marchant. It appears not to have existed at the time of the publication of Mr. Thomas Le Marchant's work: at that time they were summoned without having any notice of the points to be discussed. With respect to the presence of the Constables in the Court of Chief Pleas, I have one or two further observations to make. In the year 1607 there were Commissioners sent to inquire into the state of things then, and complaints were made; one of them is at page 66 of the book entitled "Documens relatifs à l'Ile de Guernesey." It is prayed in the 13th Item "That the Constables may have their voice at the Chief Pleas, at the taxation of rents and wine." The taxation of rents, the Commissioners have heard spoken of. They will find it was usual at the Chief Pleas to fix the price of wine. "That the Constables may have their voice at the Chief Pleas, at the taxation of rents and wine, and others such public affairs; and that for the time to come, they may understand in what causes they ought to have voice; and that the Constables do not take upon them anything of importanee without the advice of their parishioners." That is the prayer of the people; to which the answer of the Commissioners is: "It is shewed unto us, as well by Charter as also by ancient custom, that the Bailiff and Jurats have had the taxation of the rents and wine:" that being an order of the Chief Pleas; "and likewise the ordering of all public affairs for the most part:" that I take to be the management of Les affaires politiques; "especially such as concern the execution of justice, and therefore we leave the same to be used and ordered by them according to their Charters and ancient customs." Then, as to Constables, it goes on: "And touching the Constables, because by their offices they are subject to the Governor and to the said Bailiff and Jurats, and ought not to take upon them either voice in the elections of officers, or to do any other thing touching the execution of their offices, without commandment or order first sent to them from the Governor or from the Bailiff and Jurats on that behalf. We therefore leave the said Constables to be ordered by them in such sort as to their several callings and authorities respectively in all former times appertained." Here is the order, which we have heard of, by which the Constables are now required to be present. It is at the Chefs Plaids after Christmas, 19th January, 1801. "Monsr. Le Baillif ayant représenté à la Cour qu'il seroit du bien public et tendroit à faciliter la promulgation et exécution des Loix et Ordonnances Politiques de cette Isle si l'un des connétables de chacune paroisse assistoit à la terme des Chefs Plaids de la Cour Royale, la Cour sur ce, ouie la conclusion des Officiers du Roi, a ordonné et ordonne, qu' à l'avenir l'un des connétables de chacune Paroisse se rendra et sera présent à la terme de chacun des dits Chefs Plaids, et qu' après l'évocation faite de ceux qui doivent réponse aux dits Chefs Plaids le Greffier du Roi évoquera les connétables de chaque paroisse, et que, faute à l'un d' eux de chacune des dites paroisses de répondre, les connétables de la dite paroisse seront sujets à, et payeront, £10 Tournois d' amende, sans préjudice au droit d'action que l'un des dits connétables pourroit avoir à l'encontre de l'autre; et seront les dits connétables présents tenus rester jusqu' à la levée des dits Chefs Plaids, afin d' informer leurs collègues des ordonnances qui auront pu y passer sur même peine de £10 Tournois d'amende, payable par chaque délinquant. Et seront les dites amendes applicable à Sa Majesté."

3418. Mr. Tupper (Advocate). If I infer rightly from the Bailiff's statement as to the regulations of the Commissioners, he gives a different interpretation to the word "voice" than I think is the proper one. I understand by "voice" distinctly "vote;" it is translated from the French "voix." It was the right of vote which the Constables prayed for, not the right of expressing their opinion. "That the Constables may have their voice at the Chief Pleas." I think that is borne out by reading the determination of the Commissioners in 1607. In the first place, the petition would infer that the Constables were present at the Chief Pleas even then. "It is shewed us," say the Commissioners, "as well by Charter as also by ancient custom, that the Bailiff and Jurats have had the taxation of the rents and wine, and likewise the ordering of all public affairs for the most part, especially such as concern the execution of justice." That is, the Bailiff and Jurats are there stated to have had the taxing of wine. It would appear, by the word "voice," that it was meant that the Constables should have a participation in that authority; not merely the expression of an opinion, but a participation in the authority. And they go on, "and therefore we leave the same to be used and ordered by them according to their Charters and ancient customs." That is, that they shall have the ordering of such matters. It does not decide that the Constables had not, previously to that, the power of voice; I mean voice in the sense of the right of expressing their opinion; but the Constables were then endeavouring through the public to obtain an extension of their power, which was denied to them.

3419. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) You were making a statement to the Commissioners, showing that the Court of Chief Pleas had exercised the power of making Ordinances?—I was going on to shew that, at the period of the Approbation des Lois, the Court did exercise the power of making Ordinances in Chief Pleas. I was about to refer the Commissioners to the 10th Chapter of the 3rd Book of Terrien, which speaks of Sergens et autres Officiers Extraordinaires. From that it appears that the Sergens in Normandy had something to do with the repairing of the roads. The Approbation says, "Item. Pour la réparation des Chemins la Justice en Ordonne en Chefs Plaids, selon que la nécessité le requiert." That proves that there were Ordinances in existence, made by the Court with regard to the repair of the roads, which would be found in point of fact to exist in the Greffe among the earliest records. In the 4th Book, 19 Chapter of Terrien, which is "Des Boulengers et du poix que le pain blanc doit peser." We find the Approbation has this, "Ces choses sont ordonnées en la Cour des Chefs Plaids selon que le forment vaut en cette Ile, et selon que la nécessité le requiert." It is shown therefore that they made Ordinances in respect to the assize of bread. In the 24th Chapter of the same Book of Terrien, "Des Bordeaux, Dances, Masques et Jeux défendus," the Approbation says "Les dances sont défendues en cette Isle par Ordonnance faite es Chefs Plaids." The whole of the 14th Book, or a considerable portion of it, is said to be regulated in the same way "Pour les eaux et estangs contenus au quatorsiesme livre il y a ordre posé par les Chefs Plaids." There is also another reference which I omitted, the 45th chapter of the 12th Book of Terrien, respecting shooting. The Approbation says "Au lieu du quarante-cinquiesme chapitre pour la Chasse, nous usons de l'Estente du Roy et Ordre des Chefs Plaids." Perhaps I need not take up your time by going through the regulations of the Commissioners in 1607: but you will find that there were several complaints addressed to the Commissioners against particular Ordinances made by the Court en Chefs Plaids.

3420. (To Mr. Tupper.) The Order in Council of the 19th of June, 1844, was referred to by you as showing that it recognized the general power of making Ordinances?—Yes.

3421. The Bailiff. There are some further proceedings of the Commissioners in 1607, which throw some light upon the constitution of the Island, as respects the making of Ordinances, at page 17 of the Book before referred to. They complain that "Sir Thomas Leighton hath heretofore compelled the inhabitants of the Isle to ship themselves, to make war against pirates, to the great danger of their persons, being some of them altogether unmeet for such actions and none bound to the said services. They desire that henceforth the Governor take not that authority upon him to constrain any one to serve out of the Isle or Castle, and, whensoever he shall command any services, that it be for the defence only of the said places against the enemy. In regard also that the Governor hath, heretofore, commanded very chargeable fortifications in the Isle, which prove idle and needless, they desire that, hereafter, no fortifications be enjoined upon the people, by the Governor's own authority, without the advice and consent of the States of the Isle;" this being soon after the States were re-established. The answer is: "We think the request in these two articles mentioned to be reasonable, and therefore do order that the Governor shall not command men to ship themselves to make war against pirates, or command the inhabitants to build any chargeable fortifications in the Isle, without advice thereof first had with the Bailiff and Jurats, or by commandment given from the Lords of His Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council; and, this we rather order, for that we find the Isle to be already so well fortified, in all parts, as that we hope there will never be need of any new fortifications, so that the old be kept in sufficient reparation." Then there is a passage relative to Vreck, which is sea weed, at page 50 of the same Book. "They do humbly pray that, it be ordered by His Majesty's Commissioners that it be lawful for them, for the time to come, to go to gather Vreck upon the flat rock, and other places hard by, without they be in any ways hindered." The answer is: "Because we find that the Vreck is so beneficial and necessary for the whole Island, as that the inhabitants cannot have any manner of grain or corn, without they first bestow and spread the same upon their grounds; and for that we are informed that the Bailiff and Jurats have usually set down such orders, as were, from time to time, most convenient for the inhabitants touching the same, who, in our opinions, do best understand what is fit to be done in those things which concern the common good of the island; we do therefore require that all such orders as they shall set down touching the gathering of the Vreck, either upon the said flat rocks or elsewhere, shall be duly kept and observed." That is, as I understand it, the Court of Chief Pleas have hitherto regulated the taking of Vreck: and our decision is that any orders, the Court of Chief Pleas may hereafter make, may be obeyed. And by looking at the old records you will find continual regulations respecting the Vreck passed at the Court of Chief Pleas.

3422. That shows the power of the Court of Chief Pleas to make such Orders?—Yes. Then again we find at page 63: "Item. They humbly pray that they may have liberty to sell wine, beer, cider, without giving any caution or craving any leave, as they have had in former times." The answer is "The disposition and ordering of these things of ancient and immemorable time hath belonged to the Bailiff and Jurats, and therefore we leave the same by them to be ordered as in all former times hath been accustomed." I have already read the passage which refers to their having a voice in the taxation of rents and wine.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 24th, 1846.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine, examined.

3423. Before quite dismissing this question of the Court of Chief Pleas and the mode of making Ordinances by that Court, the Commissioners are anxious to know, whether, when Ordinances are proposed, the Constable of any parish or any individual has an opportunity of being heard against the Ordinance?—A great many Ordinances of the Court are publicly known before they are proposed in the Court of Chief Pleas; and, in practice, it is not unusual for individuals to employ Counsel against the enactments about to be made. At the Court of Chief Pleas itself, supposing an Ordinance to come there for the first time, that Ordinance is, generally or in fact universally, proposed by the Crown Officers. Upon that, before the opinions of the Court are taken, the Constables make any observations they please; and also, I conceive, they have the right to ask a certain time to put observations before the Court, either by themselves or by Counsel. Suppose an Ordinance to have been passed, it is also legal to present a Requête to the Court against that Ordinance; and any person presenting that Requête has the means of being heard by Counsel.

3424. A Requête against the Ordinance which has been passed?—Either a Requête against the Ordinance which has been passed, or a Requête to prevent an Ordinance. I can cite a modern case of an Ordinance for the keeping of gunpowder, which the Court provisionally enacted till the next Court of Chief Pleas. On the day of Chief Pleas, Mr. Advocate Falla was heard on the part of certain individuals proposing certain modifications in this Ordinance, and desiring that it should be enacted in a different form generally. In consequence of which the Court appointed a day for taking the different points mentioned into consideration. It is also usual, in the case of any important Ordinance, particularly those involving any subsequent change in the law, that is, those which would require confirmation by Her Majesty in Council, for the Court, instead of proceeding in Chief Pleas directly to make an Ordinance, to appoint a committee to examine how the Ordinance shall be passed; and that committee, named at one Chief Pleas, generally make their report at the next Chief Pleas; and that report is ordered to be printed, or at least to be lodged at the Greffe Office. And then the parties have the means of being heard against it before it is finally passed even by the Court.

3425. Would not an Ordinance of that kind go before the States?—In practice now it would. It might do so or not. One or two years ago, it was proposed to consolidate all the Ordinances regarding the harbours in this Island; and then the Court, considering the importance of the subject, ordered a projet of the Ordinance to be printed, and copies of it were sent round to all the different parishes, some months before it was finally passed; by which means any parties then having any objections to urge would have an opportunity of being heard.

3426. The Bailiff. There were two distinct parties, who appeared before the Court, in some shape or other, and stated their objections; all of which were taken into consideration, and many alterations made.

3427. Are the Commissioners right in supposing that, when an Ordinance is considered by the Court of Chief Pleas to be of great importance, it is introduced, in the shape of a projet, to give the parties an opportunity of objecting?—The Ordinances of the harbour and of pilots were a consolidation of all the Ordinances existing upon those points, and they were introduced as projets. But, generally speaking, the form is to name a committee, who prepare a report embodying the projet, which is lodged at the Greffe Office, or printed.

3428. In cases of great importance, is there any means of giving notice of the Ordinance before it is brought on, so as to enable the parties interested to oppose it?—Yes.

3429. And, in cases of less importance, are the constables the persons that have a right to oppose, and who do, in fact, exercise that right?—Yes.

3430. Are there frequent instances of the constables exercising that right?—I cannot say that there are frequent instances.

3431. There was an instance with regard to the width of wheels of carts, was there not?—Yes; parties were heard upon that. In that case I am not aware whether the constables made any observations. Parties were regularly heard before the Court upon that Ordinance, and about fishing, also, at particular places and at particular times of the year.

3432. Mr. Dobrée. I remember, in the case of the Ordinance regulating the number of days and the localities in which persons might draw for small fish here, two constables rose the moment the Ordinance was read, and said it would interfere considerably with their daily avocations; and they said it would be very desirable to alter it. To the best of my recollection the Ordinance was modified in conformity with the suggestions of those individuals.

3433. (To the Contrôle.) Are many of such Ordinances passed in the course of a year?—In some years there are many.

3434. Perhaps there is never any Session of Chief Pleas without there being some?—I think there are several without.

3435. Are the Commissioners right in supposing that the legislative functions of the Court are very considerable?—They are exercised continually. I should not say that they were very considerable. Of late years a great deal has been done in the consolidation of old Ordinances, which were scattered among the records. For instance, in reference to roads, there were more than one hundred Ordinances, which were scattered among the records; and those were gathered into one. The same thing has been done with regard to harbours, to pilots, and several other subjects: and that has occupied the Court of Chief Pleas lately.

3436. The Commissioners heard some suggestion of a law for the purpose of enabling private property to be dedicated to public purposes?—That was first proposed before the Court of Chief Pleas. Upon that a committee was named, who prepared the Ordinance which was submitted to the Court of Chief Pleas afterwards, having been previously lodged at the Greffe that the public might obtain notice of it, and having been previously printed in the Official Gazette of the island. After it had been finally adopted by the Court of Chief Pleas, it was brought before the States, and, having been confirmed by the States, was sent to Her Majesty in Council, where it still remains.

3437. The Procureur told us that there were two law officers, the Procureur and the Contrôle; can you tell us whether their duties are precisely the same?—Precisely. There is no distinction whatever between them, except that the Procureur has a vote in the States and the Contrôle has not; he has the right of speaking in the States, but has no vote. In their capacity as members of the Court they are precisely the same.

3438. Are they always both of them heard in every criminal question?—When they are present they are always both of them heard.

3439. Will you be kind enough to describe the functions they have to perform? The Commissioners understand, from your answers and those of the Procureur, that they form a constituent part of the Criminal Court.—Yes, they do.

3440. Will you state their peculiar functions?—Any offence committed, for which a constable is called, must be reported to one of them, as well as to the Bailiff, by the constable; and, in the event of the constable having apprehended a person charged with such offence, he is bound to give notice to them, and to the Bailiff, within twenty four hours of the person being imprisoned. They then, jointly with the Bailiff, become responsible for the further detention of such person. The constable's responsibility is

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 24th, 1846.

then discharged: and, upon communication with the Bailiff, they decide whether the person shall be kept in prison till the next sitting of the Court, or shall be liberated and warned to attend the Court.

3441. You say, jointly with the Bailiff they become responsible for his detention, and decide whether he shall be kept in prison or warned to attend. Is that done at some private meeting with the Bailiff, or is any public meeting held?—No public meeting whatever. It is done upon private conference with the Bailiff, wherever they can find him.

3442. Is it necessary that both the Crown Officers should be present?—No; and in ordinary cases it is very often done by one. In cases of any great importance they would both be present of course.

3443. That is, the Bailiff and one of the Law Officers are capable of deciding whether a person shall be detained or merely warned to attend?—Certainly.

3444. The Bailiff. In ordinary cases, frequently the Bailiff does not see either of the Crown Officers. He very often gives only his own opinion. It is only when he sees any doubt about it he thinks it necessary to consult with them.

3445. The Bailiff would sometimes act alone; but the Law Officers would not act without consulting the Bailiff?

3446. The Contrôle. They do sometimes act without consulting the Bailiff. If it is a very clear case, they will sometimes save the constable the trouble of waiting upon the Bailiff, by saying that they will report it to the Bailiff themselves.

3447. Would what you say apply to where they direct the party to be summoned, as well as where they direct the party to be imprisoned?—It would in some cases. Supposing a constable were to come to one of the Crown Officers, and say that he had put a man in prison upon a charge which appeared very trifling, and supposing the person charged had been a man residing in the Island a certain time, and a person bearing a good character, the Crown Officer would think himself justified in recommending the constable to liberate him at once, and inform the Bailiff of it.

3448. In a more doubtful case you would consult the Bailiff?—Yes.

3449. Are the Commissioners right in supposing that, legally, the Crown Officer has that discretion?—No: I understand, not legally. I understand that, legally, the constable must report to the Bailiff and to the Crown Officers; I may add that the constable is bound to do so by his oath of office. Before I come to particularize the duties of the Crown Officers in Court, I would state that they are also bound to patronize all causes for guardianships, and all cases where the interests of minors or persons incapacitated from taking charge of their own property are concerned; that all cases entered by an informer, and all suits entered for the infringement of ordinances, must be entered by one of them.

3450. Those would be proceedings for penalties?—Yes.

3451. The Commissioners wish you to confine your answers to the duties of the Law Officers with regard to matters which are in themselves purely criminal—With regard to Ordinances, all Ordinances of the Court inflict penalties for infringements of the clauses contained in them; and all actions entered for penalties must be patronized by one of the Crown Officers, either in his own name or in the name of the informer; that is, "A. B. et les Officiers de la Reine joints." There is also a particular form of action in what are called "Causes mixtes," which are subdivided into "Causes en adjonction," Cases for assault or slander, in which a party claims damages. Those cases must also be patronized by one of the Law Officers for the plaintiff; and the first summons sent is in the name of the party alone. If the action is admitted, or if the defendant makes a default and does not appear upon the first proceedings, in either case, an "adjonction des Officiers de la Reine" is ordered, and the subsequent proceedings are in the name of the plaintiff and the "Officier de la Reine joints." If the defendant appears to the suit and defends it, he is bound to employ the other Crown Officer. The plaintiff and the defendant may also have an additional counsel. I may add that this proceeding is one which is already alluded to in my answers, and which, I believe, is considered by most people as objectionable and requiring some change. In cases of Clameur de Haro, et Nouvelle Dessaisine also the Crown Officers are engaged.

3452. All suits for the infringement of Ordinances must be patronized by the Procureur?—Yes.

3453. Does their being patronized by him imply their being carried on in his name?—No. Summonses are sent by one of the Crown Officers, either in his own name alone, or in his name and the name of the informer jointly.

3454. What is the meaning of "patronized" by the Crown Officer?—That he must grant summonses and must appear in Court to prosecute upon them.

3458. In a case where part of the penalty goes to the informer, would that be a cause mixte?—No.

3459. In a proceeding for penalties, is the defendant obliged to retain the other Crown Officer?—No.

3460. What are the functions of the Crown Officers in the Criminal Court?—When a prisoner is brought before the Court, the constable gives in the names of the witnesses to support the charge. That is before La Cour Ordinaire, composed of the Bailiff, two or more Jurats, the Crown officers, the Greffier, the Sergeant, and the Prevôt. The constable gives the names of the witnesses in support of the charge to the Law officers, and also the nature of the charge.

3461. At what time is this?—In the Court itself, In cases where a person has been apprehended, the Crown officers know the circumstances before; but the practice is for the constable to give a list of the witnesses to the Crown officers.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 24th, 1846.

3462. Is that in all cases?—Yes; the constable warns all the witnesses he thinks necessary for the support of the charge, and a list of any which the prisoner may have given him, to attend at the Court. He then gives a list of the whole on both sides to the Crown officers, with the nature of the charge. The Crown officers then lay before the Court their opinion as to whether the case is of a nature to be tried summarily, or to be sent to trial; and the Court decides whether it shall be taken summarily or not. Supposing it to be taken summarily, the charge is immediately gone into in the Public Court. The Crown officer examines each witness; first, those in support of the charge; and, if the prisoner has no counsel, he puts any questions to the witness that may be suggested by the prisoner, having asked the prisoner whether he has any question which he wishes to be put.

3463. In a summary proceeding, are the witnesses heard by the prisoner?—Yes; and he may employ counsel. Supposing him to employ counsel, the counsel conducts his defence entirely. Supposing he does not employ counsel, the Crown officer, after examining the witnesses in support of the charge, puts any questions the prisoner may wish put to the witnesses; or the prisoner may put them himself; and so the witnesses are gone through. Then the prisoner's witnesses are called.

3464. Does the Crown officer advise the prisoner?—No; after having examined the witnesses in chief, he says to the prisoner, "Now, if there are any questions you wish to put, this is your opportunity to do so; or I will put them for you."

3465. You say the Court decides whether the case shall be taken summarily or not?—Yes.

3466. Who decides whether a person shall be prosecuted or not?—That is the prosecution, if it is a summary case.

3467. The Commissioners understand the Court decide whether it is a case in which they will exercise their summary jurisdiction, or whether it shall be sent to a higher tribunal: but they are desirous of knowing, who has the right of instituting criminal proceedings; is it the Law officers of the Crown or the Court?—The constables bring every case before the Court.

3468. Then the next question is whether it shall be prosecuted or not?—Yes; if the constable states a case, which the Court thinks ought not to be prosecuted, they would say so.

3469. Do the Law officers of the Crown decide whether a case shall be prosecuted or not?—No.

3470. Would the Crown officers have the power, upon having received the Report of the constable, to say, "We do not think it advisable to proceed in this case," and to abstain from proceeding?—Supposing a constable to come with any charge, manifestly ridiculous, I suppose they would take the responsibility upon themselves. Suppose there were any doubt, they would confer with the Bailiff; and he would take it upon his responsibility, or confer with the Court.

3471. The Bailiff. I apprehend the Crown officer would have no right to stop it, supposing an individual made a complaint.

3472. The Contrôle. Supposing a complaint to be made to a constable by any party, it must come before the Court. When I say "complaint," supposing a person were to go to a constable with a civil charge, the constable would not undertake it: but, supposing he goes to the constable with any complaint bearing the nature of a criminal proceeding, he would bring it before the Court.

3473. Supposing the constable does not do so?—Then he is liable to be brought before the Court for not having done his duty: the party complains to the Court itself.

3474. When the Commissioners were present yesterday in Court, a person made a complaint, and said, he had complained to the constable. Upon his making a complaint to the Court, the Court said he must go back to the constable. What is such a person's remedy against a constable neglecting to perform his duty?—His remedy is to complain to the Court of the constable's having refused to entertain his case.

3475. Has the constable any discretion whether he will entertain the case or not?—He must bring every case before the Court which partakes of the nature of a criminal charge. If he does not, the Court will order the constable to do so. In the case mentioned of yesterday, the order of the Court was that the constable should bring the case before the Court. Supposing the person complaining of the constable fails in proving to the Court that the case does partake of the nature of a criminal charge, of course the Court will judge accordingly.

3476. That does not get rid of the question, What is the remedy of the party.—He must complain to the Court.

3477. How does he bring his complaint before the Court?—By bringing it before the Court at any time he pleases.

3478. It appeared, yesterday, that the party complaining to the Court was referred back to the constable.—He was heard before the Court; and the constable was present; had the constable not been present, the Court would have directed the charge to be brought before them.

3479. The Bailiff. The charge yesterday was the original charge against the offending parties, and not a complaint against the constable.

3480. Supposing a person makes a complaint to a constable, and the constable refuses to proceed upon the complaint, the party then makes a complaint to the Court, stating those facts, would he be referred back to the constable again?

3481. The Contrôle. The Court would then request the Crown Officers to write to the constable, stating that such a complaint had been made; and, if they were of opinion there had been any gross violation of his duty on the part of the constable, they would order the constable to appear before them. If it were matter of carelessness, or matter of doubt, they would request the Crown Officers to write to the constable, stating that such and such a person had complained to the Court, and requiring him to bring the case forward.

September 24th, 1846.

3482. Is there any other mode of bringing a case before the Court except through a constable?—No; not in the first instance.

3483. Have the Crown Officers the power to institute proceedings upon the complaint of an individual?—No; supposing a person to come to the Crown officer, and to say, "I complain of A. B.; I have been to the constable, and he refuses to interfere." Upon that, the Crown Officers would write an order to the constable telling him to bring the party before the Court. Supposing the party came directly to the Court to complain of the constable not having taken up his case, the Court would then either send the Prevôt, or order the Crown Officers to write a note to the constable directing him to take immediate steps to bring the matter before the Court.

3484. Is there any other mode of bringing a criminal charge before the Court in Guernsey but through the constable?—No.

3485. Two questions arise in case of the default of a constable; one is his own criminality in not bringing the complaint forward, the other is the right of the party complaining. Supposing the constable is obstinate, has the party the right of getting his case before the Court in any other way?—Then the Court would order another constable to bring it forward.

3486. There is not known to your Law any criminal process not passing through the constable?—No.

3487. There is no mode of setting a criminal case in motion, but through the constable?—No. But the Commissioners must understand that the constables are bound by their oath to obey the orders given them by the Court, the Bailiff, and the Crown officers.

3488. The Commissioners understand there are two constables, and four assistants.—Yes, in the town parish, independently of special constables; and there are two constables in each country parish.

3489. Are the constable's assistants capable of making a charge also?—Yes.

3490. The Bailiff. Every constable of every parish has power to act throughout the Island.

3491. The Contrôle. The power of the assistants also extends throughout the Island.

3492. When a party is brought before the Court, who decides whether he shall be prosecuted or not?—According to the nature of the charge, the Court decide whether it is of a criminal nature or not; if it is of a criminal nature, he is always prosecuted.

3493. He is always prosecuted if it is necessary to prosecute him: but who decides whether it is necessary or not?—The Court decide that. If the Court think the charge, as presented to them by the constable, is not of a nature to warrant any criminal proceeding, they discharge the case at once. If it is of such a nature, they go into it in one of the two forms, either summarily, or by a regular trial. Also in summary cases, very often, a discretion arises whether it is properly within the cognizance of the Court of Police, or whether it ought to be a cause mixte, such as cases of assault.

3494. By the Court of Police, you mean the Cour Ordinaire exercising summary jurisdiction?—Yes; an option is very often given to a party complaining of an assault. He is told that, if his complaint is heard in the Police Court, he will not have any damages; if, on the contrary, he chooses to bring his case en adjonction, by the proceeding I mentioned just now, if it is an object with him to obtain damages, he may bring it in that form before the Court.

3495. Are the Commissioners right in saying that the Procureur and Contrôle cannot institute a criminal proceeding but by order of the Court?—Exactly so.

3496. Has the Procureur or the Contrôle power to institute criminal proceedings without the sanction of the Court?—No.

3497. They must have the order of the Court to make the acte d'accusation?—Exactly so; and, in summary cases, the Court must have decided that it is a case for their own cognizance in that form.

3498. Who is the counsel for the crown in those cases?—The two Crown Officers.

3499. Who draws the acte d'accusation?—The acte d'accusation is framed by the Court in point of law. In point of fact, it is framed by the Crown Officers and the Court jointly. Legally speaking, the Crown Officers only become parties to a cause after the acte d'accusation is framed. In summary cases, however, there is no acte d'accusation at all. There is a difference in that point of view between summary cases and cases for trial.

3500. The Commissioners understand that the acte d'accusation is framed by the Court and the Crown Officers?—Yes.

3501. Who decides if the Crown Officers and the Court differ?—The Court legally frame it; but, in practice, they have the Crown officers with them. It is legally the act of the Court; the name of the Crown officer is not contained in the acte d'accusation. It is at the end of that acte these words run: "Il est ordonné que les Officiers de la Reine informeront contre lui:" and it is only from that moment the prosecution is in the hands of the Crown Officers.

3502. Is there any intermediate officer, in Guernsey, filling the office of public prosecutor, standing between the person who makes the charge and the Court which has to decide it?—No, not in that stage of the proceedings.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 24th, 1846.

3503. The Bailiff. The Acte of Court, upon which a person is committed, must be taken, speaking as an English Lawyer, to combine the two acts of the committal by the magistrate, and the finding of the bill by the Grand Jury.

3504. The Contrôle. My own notion is that, supposing the Crown officers to insist upon a prosecution, I should conceive the Court would, in all cases, grant it.

3505. Would, or must?—I should say must. I should suppose, if the Crown Officers stated to the Court that, as representing the interests of the Crown, they thought it their duty to insist upon the prosecution being brought forward, the Court would, in all cases, allow them to do so.

3506. Is there any mode by which the Crown Officers could compel the Court to do so?—No; there would be no compulsion; it would not be as a matter of right.

3507. All you mean is, that you consider it would be a very violent exercise of power in the Court to refuse?—Yes; that is what I mean.

3508. The spirit of your jurisprudence appears to be that the Crown officers should not appear as an adverse party to the prisoner, but rather as Amici Curiæ?—Yes. When the prisoner is committed, the Court becomes independent of the Crown Officers entirely; and they each have totally different functions to perform from that moment. It is only as far as the committal that they are united. From that point the whole responsibility of the prosecution rests with the Crown Officers.

3509. The Bailiff. Exactly as in England, where a true bill has been found by a jury.

The Contrôle. From that moment the whole responsibility of the prosecution rests with the two Crown Officers.

3510. In the case of libel, would the question, whether it shall be brought forward or not, depend on putting the libel in the hands of the constable?—With regard to that particular case, it might be brought forward by the Crown Officers themselves without the constable.

3511. Suppose a libel on this Court of Justice, or a libel upon the Militia?—There are cases in which those libels have been brought officially before the Court by the Crown Officers.

3512. You mean that a libel upon public bodies would be officially brought before the Court by the Crown Officers?—Yes: the party accused would then be warned by the constable in the ordinary course.

3513. Would there be any discretion in the Court in that case as to proceeding or not?—Yes; the Court would have just the same discretion in all cases. The Crown Officers would bring the matter officially before the Court; the Court would then decide whether it should be prosecuted or not.

3514. In that case, according to the theory you have pointed out, when the Crown Officers brought the case officially before the Court, they would be performing the duties of advisers of the Court, whether what they themselves requested should be granted?—Yes; and it would be optional with the Court to refuse their request.

3515. The Court would be the Bailiff, or the Lieutenant Bailiff, and, at least, two Jurats?—Two, or more, Jurats: not necessarily more than two.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq. examined.

RobertMacCulloch, Esq.

September 24th, 1846.

3516. We have been told by the Procureur de la Reine that there are altogether six advocates in the Court when the Court is full; but that there are not that number now practising. By whom are the advocates of the Court appointed?—By the Court.

3517. By the body of the Court, or by the Bailiff alone?—By the body of the Court.

3518. Is there any particular examination necessary; or what is the form of appointment?—There is no examination necessary.

3519. Gentlemen do, of course, undergo a course of legal study before being admitted as advocates?—They do.

3520. Is that usually pursued in France, or in England, or in this island?—Generally both in Guernsey and France.

3521. Do you mean by attending some of the lectures given on law, in the French universities?—Yes. In my case, I was about fourteen years of age when I went as a clerk to an advocate here, and remained four or five years. After that, I spent about a twelvemonth in France, at Caen, attended the lectures there, and frequented the public libraries, where there were a quantity of books on the ancient Norman Law, the general principles of which I studied. On my return, I attended the office of the Procureur de la Reine, about six or eight months. I believe that is about the course of study pursued by most of my colleagues.

3522. Is it obligatory upon an advocate to plead, or can he refuse to undertake a criminal cause?—I consider, with respect to criminal cases, he is bound to undertake every case. In civil cases, there is a limitation in his oath. In practice, it is considered that an advocate is bound to undertake all criminal cases.

3523. The Greffier is one of the officers of the Court, is he not?—Yes.

3524. Besides the Greffier, who are the other officers of the Court?—The Prevôt is one.

3525. Does the Prevôt exercise his office by deputy, or not?—At present the Prevôt does scarcely anything himself: he has two deputies. From very early times the Prevôt appears to have had a deputy, to have done part of the work himself, and allow part of the work to be done by deputy. His functions are very extensive indeed.

GUERNSEY.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq.

September 24th, 1846.

3526. He has both civil functions, and criminal?—Yes; many of them have fallen into desuetude.

3527. Is there any other officer of the Court?—There is a sergeant.

3528. Is his duty that of serving processes?—Yes; of serving processes principally.

3529. That is to say, summonses to attend the Court?—Yes; he is also considered to be the Huissier of the Court.

3530. By whom is the Greffier appointed?—By the Crown, in the same way as the Crown lawyers, by Royal commission.

3531. Is the Prevôt also appointed by the Crown?—He is elected by the States, in the same manner as the Jurats of the Royal Court.

3532. By whom is the sergeant appointed?—By the Crown: in practice, it is by the Lieutenant Governor by special commission from the Crown. There is also a Geolier, who is also appointed by the Crown.

3533. The Crown exercising its functions probably through the Governor?—Yes.

3534. What is the name of the gentleman who is now Prevôt?—Mr. Nicholas Lefebvre.

3535. Is he a gentleman who is a good deal advanced in years?—He is. Perhaps I should also state that there is also an officer called the officier des hautes œuvres, who is appointed by the Receiver, and sworn in before the Court.

3536. He is the executioner?—Yes. In order to complete the list of officers, there are also the Bordiers. They hold land and are consequently bound to conduct all prisoners from the gaol to the Court, and from the Court to execution; for the performance of which duty they are entitled to certain dinners.

3537. Is there an officer called the Portier of Cornet Castle?—He is the Geolier of the present day. He was called the Portier till 1811, while the gaol was kept in Castle Cornet. Since the prison has been in town, he has been called the Geolier.

3538. Does he live in the gaol?—Yes.

3539. Do you consider him exclusively a civil officer, as opposed to a military officer?—Yes. There are certain provisions in the Mutiny Act with respect to the keeping of soldiers in the gaol. I believe there have been some questions raised upon that subject.

3540. Is he a servant of the Governor, or a servant of the Court?—That point has been lately discussed before the Privy Council. I have not the order before me; and I forget the precise terms of it.

3541. Is that contained in the last case between the Royal Court and the Governor?—Yes.

Adjourned till to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Friday, September 25, 1846.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 25th, 1846.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine, further examined.

3542. Have you any observations to address to the Commissioners?—I wish to say, with regard to the questions put to me yesterday about the power of the Law Officers to enter proceedings, that our system, in this respect, is derived from certain French Ordonnances, particularly the Ordonnance of Louis XIV., dated August, 1670,* and is also in strict conformity with the modern French law, by which every criminal accusation comes before the Cour d'Instruction Criminelle, in which Court the Crown officers are also assessors, and which Court, both under the ancient and the modern system, decides whether the Instruction shall proceed or not, and in what form. In the Royal Courts of France, there is a section of the Royal Court which has the duties of the mises en accusation. It is called La Chambre des mises en accusation: and, in the towns where there are minor tribunals, the Tribunaux de Première Instance have also a section for the Cour d'Instruction Criminelle.

3543. Do any members of those Courts sit on the trial afterwards?—No. There is a Jury in France, with two or three members of the Royal Court.

3544. Are those members identical with the members who form the Chambre des mises en accusation?—I believe not.† I believe they are selected every year. I also would wish to state, that, in consequence of our system, I conceive the Court primarily and principally responsible for the mises en accusation.

3545. That is the sending a person to trial?—Yes; and the form in which he is sent also, and of course the propriety of his being sent or not. The Crown Officers are merely present to protect the interests of the Crown, and to advise the Court; and the effect of the Court refusing to put a person en accusation against the opinion of the Crown lawyers would, of course, leave it with the Crown Officers, if necessary, to complain to higher authority.

3546. What authority would that be?—Her Majesty in Council. If this responsibility were transferred from the Court to the Crown Officers, the effect would be to render them the judges and the responsible persons for directing a mise en accusation or not. I conceive, our system is also in conformity, to a certain extent, with the practice in the Court of Queen's Bench in granting informations on the motion of the counsel for an individual.

* Ordonnance de Louis XIV., Roi de France et de Navarre, pour les matières Criminelles.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

3547. Can you tell the Commissioners the process by which a French Ordonnance, that of Louis the 14th, for instance, or the Code Napoleon, comes to be law in Guernsey?—I do not say they are law at all. I was citing that Ordonnance to prove that the same system existing here exists in France also.

3548. You were saying also that it was followed elsewhere in a system of laws springing from the same root as yours?—Yes.

3550. These are all Ordonnances long after the time of the Separation?—By Queen Elizabeth, in 1583, parts of Terrien are approved, and among them this chapter—"Nous usons des vingt-neufiesme, trantiesme, trante-uniesme, et trante-deuiesme chapitres."

3551. The Contrôle. It is also very strongly confirmed in Mr. Le Marchant's Commentary.

3552. (To the Contrôle.) In the reference you have made to the Ordonnances of Louis the 14th, you do not mean to say that your proceedings are exactly the same as are there defined?—No; nor based upon them; it is only that the practice is similar. I would also wish to state another point, with regard to the manner in which crimes are brought before the Court. I stated, yesterday, that they were always brought, in the first instance, by the constable. I wish it to be stated that, in many cases, the constables are set to work, if I may so express myself, by the Crown Officers. Supposing a Crown Officer hears of a crime being committed, he would consider it his duty to send to the constable, and direct the constable to take the necessary steps to bring the case before the Court. In the same manner, suppose a person to come and mention to the Court that a crime had taken place: the Court would give directions to the Crown Officer to desire the constable to inquire into it.

3553. The Court would not act upon the constable immediately, but through the Crown Officers?—Yes; they would usually, through the Crown Officers, direct the constable. In case of the constable being at hand, they would send for the constable at once.

3554. Of course, disobedience by the constable would be immediately punished by the Court?—Yes.

3555. You do not understand that, if the Crown officers direct the constable to take up the matter, any discretion remains in the constable?—No; certainly not.

---

Peter Jeremie, Esq. (Advocate), examined.

Peter Jeremie, Esq., Advocate.

3556. Will you be kind enough to tell us, in reference to the second question, whether the Court has jurisdiction over military offences committed by the Militia?—It has; and even over the soldiery in the garrison, when the acts are committed against the inhabitants.

3557. The question was rather directed to offences purely military, breaches of some military regulations?—It has.

3558. You think a private in the militia, who had disobeyed the lawful orders of his superior in rank, would be punishable by the Criminal Tribunal here?—They are sometimes brought up. There are sometimes cases of that kind brought up, not to say frequently, and as a matter of course. There is no other tribunal in this country to try criminal offences by the Militia but this Court.

3559. Neglecting to come on parade, and disobedience to an officer; would such offences as those be tried by the Royal Court?—Any case, by which a person subjects himself to fine or imprisonment, would be tried by the Royal Court of Guernsey. The best proof is that there is a Militia Ordinance of the 27th of April, 1840, rather extensive in that way, where both fines and other punishments are provided, and which regulates the jurisdiction of the Court upon that point.

3560. The Commissioners see that Warburton, in his "Treatise on the History, Laws and Customs of the Island of Guernsey," states, at page 35, that "the Governor or his Lieutenant may be present at all times when the Court sits, and has authority to command and advise the Bailiff and Jurats to observe the law in the administration of justice without any unnecessary delay thereof." Does this give him the right to be present also in the Cour Ordinaire?—I suppose he may come if he likes; but, as far as being present, that is a question which has been debated at length. I have never seen any Governor present myself yet in the Cour Ordinaire for ordinary purposes; nor do I know that there is any law to prevent his coming.

3561. When the Cour Ordinaire is sitting au secret, is there any law upon that subject?—The fact is, that the proceedings au secret are interlocutory or preliminary proceedings of the Court au Criminel. First of all, when a man is brought up before the Court before he is fully committed for trial, the proceedings are au secret; and that is conformable to the French Ordonnance. Whether the Governor has a right to be present in such proceedings is a question. I should say not, decidedly.

GUERNSEY.

Peter Jeremie, Esq., Advocate.

September 25th, 1846.

3562. The Contrôle. That question has been solemnly argued before the Court. I am perhaps making use of a wrong term in saying argued. The Governor claimed the right; the Court heard the Crown officers upon it; and then, afterwards, unanimously came to a decision that the Governor had not the right.

3563. Has that been before the Privy Council?—No; it was in October, last year only.

3564. The Procureur. The reason for coming to that conclusion was, that the very object of secret proceedings is that, should there not be sufficient ground found for proceeding against the person accused, the least possible number of persons should be acquainted with the odium which, momentarily, existed against him. That is plainly the object, in looking at the very ordinance of Louis XIV. of 1670, before referred to, for requiring that the primary acts should be as secret as possible.

3565. (To Mr. Jeremie.) None of the answers which the Commissioners have obtained mention that the Ancien Coustumier is law here, except so far as it is contained in Terrien. —We do not recognize the Ancien Coustumier as law. Our law, as far as it is recognized, is Terrien, approved by Queen Elizabeth, in the "Approbation des Loix:" and, in that book of Terrien, to every chapter the lawyers, for their own convenience, generally append the remark of the Approbation des Loix.

3566. With respect to Le Marchant's Remarques et animadversions sur l'approbation des Loix, what rank do they hold as an authority?—They hold the authority which a wise and a good man always has after he has written with a knowledge of what he had undertaken. They have the weight which an English Judge might give to Lord Mansfield's decisions. For instance, the fact is, he is often quoted as an authority by the Court; but what weight he would have is left to the view which each individual member of the Court may take of it.

3567. In a good many instances he disapproves of the Approbation, does not he?—He differs from the Approbation; and he differs from the Court: and, I suppose, he differs with most of the authorities he comes in contact with. But even those differences of opinion, though they show that he was quite an independent gentleman, have had the effect of bringing many decisions of the Court to be corrected ultimately; for instance, he differs upon the extent of the right of eldership very materially.

3568. From what does he differ?—He differs from the views taken by the Court as to the custom here upon the right of eldership. I do not know that any mention is made in Terrien of the twelfth; and yet that is the custom.

3569. Is there any instance of a case in which, Mr. Le Marchant's book differing distinctly and avowedly from the Approbation, his opinion has been adopted, and that of the Approbation discarded?—No; but there are many cases, where his opinion has differed from the Approbation, in which his opinion was discarded and the Approbation followed. I know a notable instance myself, which was one of the first cases almost I pleaded here, against the Queen's Procureur. It was the case of the Vale. It was that very right of an elder son, who has the right to certain buildings. Mr. Le Marchant says the elder son should not have so much: and he said that the decisions of the Court and the law were very improperly understood. But the Court said: the law had spoken, and, though Mr. Le Marchant was a very wise man, the law must be followed till it was abrogated.

3570. Is that the view generally taken by the Bar?

The Contrôle. Not as to the authority which Mr. Jeremie attaches to Mr. Le Marchant.

3571. When he is absolutely at issue with the Approbation, has there been any instance in which the Approbation has been discarded and his opinion adopted?—No: Mr. Jeremie said that the same weight would be given to Mr. Le Marchant's book that an English Judge would give to Lord Mansfield's decisions. I quite dissent from that. Mr. Le Marchant's book is valuable as containing what the practice was in his day. I do not consider it a legal authority at all.

3572. Mr. Jeremie. I beg leave to persist in the opinion I advanced. I say it would have as much weight, as an English Judge ruling his Court. That is to say, he would have the weight of wisdom, not of law or authority. One Judge often overrules the opinion of another Judge; and, so far as that goes, Mr. Le Marchant is of some weight.

3573. Has he the same weight that you would give to the opinion of an English Judge here?—He has the authority which an English Judge would have before an English Court. His opinion may be differed from; it does not make the law. So, Mr. Le Marchant would be quoted as an authority here, to be differed from or to be followed, as each Magistrate might give weight or not to his opinion.

3574. The Procureur. Mr. Le Marchant's book has only been printed a few years.

3575. Mr. Jeremie. This passage from the preface will express the authority and weight which is to be attached to Mr. Le Marchant. It is the Court that speaks. "En mettant sous le yeux du public les Remarques et Animadversions du Rev. Thomas Le Marchant, le public est prévenu que ce n'est pas le dessein de la Cour de confirmer ou approuver toutes les opinions de cet écrivain, son unique objet étant de fournir aux habitants l'occasion de s'instruire sur l'origine de nos coûtumes locales et sur les changements qu'elles ont éprouvés à diverses époques." This work, like many other good works, has remained in a dormitory for two hundred years. It was afterwards confided to the Court to see it published; and the Court placed it under the superintendence of a committee, consisting of John Guille, the late Bailiff, then Jurat, and Peter Le Cocq, also his brother Jurat.

3576. The Commissioners understand that an ordonnance passed in the Court of Chief Pleas, which has not necessarily to go through the States, is law without confirmation by the Privy Council?—That is to say, the Ordonnances of Chief Pleas are law when they have once passed the Chief Pleas, without going through the Privy Council. That is a very difficult point. It is according to the subject matter of the law. If what is there ordained comes under the passage which was read to the Commissioners yesterday about the Court not having the power to make laws, and that neither they nor their predecessors ever undertook it, and that they are confined to making regulations and setting down rules and methods for enforcing and putting in execution the laws of the Island and the better enforcing the regulations of the Police, then, without the slightest doubt, the Ordonnances of the Court of Chief Pleas are laws. But I will give the Commissioners a proof that all orders from the Chief Pleas are not by themselves laws, and that, when they touch upon a legislative enactment, they have not that power. In this Island, by virtue of Terrien (I forget what chapter, but the heading is "Of Prescription"), the prescription for personal debts was formerly thirty years. The Court found great difficulty, in many instances, in adjudicating properly upon demands which were brought up, on account of the length of time; and, therefore, they thought it was right that ten years should be sufficient; and they passed an Ordonnance in 1836, that, henceforward, ten years should be the time to which the Statute of Limitations for simple contract debts should run. Now, that was an Order passed in Chief Pleas, and a very proper ordonnance; but that Ordonnance, of itself, could never abrogate Terrien; and, on the very first complaint, or rather the first discussion, which would have taken place in the case of an individual who came forward to plead the Ordinance of ten years against a simple contract debt, that Ordinance would have been called in question and its validity disputed. But the Court got that Ordinance confirmed by the Privy Council; and it is now absolutely law in full operation, confirmed, as it has been, by the Privy Council.

3577. Did not the confirmation take place after it had passed through the States?—Yes; it was passed by the Court; it was submitted by Mr. Baillif Guille to the States, and afterwards confirmed by the Privy Council.

3578. The Commissioners understand that the States themselves, without the intervention of the Court of Chief Pleas, cannot initiate a law changing the laws laid down in Terrien and the Approbation: that would probably comprehend all the Criminal Law.—I should think that the States, as well as the Court, could claim the intervention of the Privy Council for any law.

3579. Originating the law themselves?—Yes.

3579*a*. You mean that they could send a law up to the Privy Council?—Yes. They do it for all money Acts.

3580. We understood yesterday that it was confined to those?—That is a very doubtful question. I will illustrate my view of this by an example which has taken place. There was a fundamental change took place in the law of inheritance, respecting wills, four years ago. The inhabitants desired certain changes. The question arose: What authority will you go to, to get those changes? "As a matter of course," they said, "it must go to the Court."

3581. Whom do you mean by "they?"—The petitioners who prayed for those changes. They said it must go through the Court first of all to have their opinion taken. They would consult the States, as a matter of course; and from thence it must go to the Privy Council as the dernier resort. The sanction of the Privy Council was required: but that the States should be consulted was a matter which they thought must take place; and that it should go to the Court also they considered was, if not absolutely required by law, certainly the best means of preserving their interest, and that the matter might be thoroughly sifted. Therefore, they addressed their petition to the Court of Chief Pleas, and prayed the Court, in a body, at the conclusion of that petition, saying, We pray you to take the sanction of Her Majesty in Council to give this the force of law.

3582. Was this a petition to the Court of Chief Pleas?—Yes. It was a petition to the Court of Chief Pleas to change the Law of wills and inheritance. At the conclusion, after having assigned their reasons, they say: "Pour les raisons ci-dessus rapportées, vos petitionaires supplient votre Cour Royale de prendre telles mesures qu'elle jugera à propos auprès du pouvoir legislatif de Sa Majesté et Son très honorable Conseil Privé pour obtenir les changemens suivans, lesquels sont conformes à la morale et à la justice, qui semeront leur bienfaisante influence parmi les masses de la société, qui feront disparaître ces odieuses dispositions qui privent les veuves et orphelins des successions de leurs parens, qui abrogeront, en ligne collatérale, les injustes préférences du sexe masculin sur le sexe féminin en parité de degré, qui préviendront les abus pratiqués par les lignagers interessés, dans les ventes publiques, pour s'emparer à vil prix du bien de leurs parens, et, en dernière analyse, qui rendront au propriétaire d'un immeuble un des droits les plus sacrés de la propriété, celui d'en disposer comme bon lui semble, quand il ne laissera pas de descendans."

3583. There is no mention of the States at all there?—Precisely so. As a matter of course the individuals considered that the Court would take the sense of the States, as they afterwards did.

3584. When an Ordonnance or law has received the approbation of the Privy Council, of course that approbation is transmitted here from the Privy Council. Is it then registered?—Immediately; and the law dates from its registry. That is another very difficult point also. The registry is supposed to be the promulgation; and, as laws are not supposed to be known before they are promulgated, it is the registry which causes them to be known; and from that day they have the force of law.

3585. Where are they registered?—At the Greffe of the Cour Royale.

GUERNSEY.

Peter Jeremie, Esq., Advocate.

September 25th, 1846.

3586. Are they read in public?—Yes.

3587. At what meeting? Is it a meeting of the Cour Royale?—Yes: the Greffier reads them; they are publicly proclaimed; and, from that moment, they become law.

3588. The Procureur. The Queen's Officers draw their conclusions to have them registered.

3589. Mr. Jeremie. No Court can be held without the Crown officers. It is at the full body of the Court or in the presence of at least seven Jurats. But, if there are not seven in the Island, the Court has declared that all the members present in the Island suffice.

3590. Is it considered compulsory with the Court to register? Have they any discretion on this point, when an Act comes from the Privy Council?—I should say not. But, when Acts of Parliament which have not been palatable either to the inhabitants or to the Court have come down, they have sometimes deferred the registry till the further pleasure or wisdom of the Legislature was known.

3591. By the "Legislature" now you mean the Privy Council?—Yes. But, the moment the pleasure of Her Majesty in Council has been irrevocably proclaimed, there has been no difficulty in the registry; and they have been registered accordingly.

3592. As to Acts of Parliament naming this Island, I think we understand that Herm and Jethou are considered to be meant whenever Guernsey is named?—Yes. They are considered to be parishes of the Island. Herm and Jethou are never named, but Alderney and Serk are named, because they have a jurisdiction.

3593. Is there not an Order in Council of 1806, which directs that Acts of Parliament distinctly naming the Island shall be law here without registration?—Yes. That has often been a great matter of discussion. The English Government directs that the Acts shall be registered, not that the register is required for the power or validity of the Acts: but the inference is that you may take notice and govern yourselves accordingly.

3594. That declaration is contained in the Order of the Privy Council which transmits the Act of Parliament?—Yes.

3595. The order referred to is in 1806?—I believe in 1805 and in 1806 several Orders came; but I do not know precisely the one to which you allude.

3596. Mr. MacCulloch (Advocate). It is a letter. A discussion took place, at that time, respecting the registry of an Act of Parliament which was considered to be an invasion of the privileges of the Island; and the Court in consequence suspended the registration of the Act. In the course of the discussion between the Court and the Privy Council, a letter came down to this effect, that, whenever an Act of Parliament is passed in which the Island shall be named, the Clerk of the Council shall transmit the same to the Governor, Bailiff, and so on, with directions to register. And, since that period, all Orders in Council, transmitting an Act of Parliament, state that it is transmitted to the said Island and ordered to be registered, not as being essential to the Act but, that the inhabitants of the Island may take notice and govern themselves accordingly. There is a considerable difference between an Order in Council which does not transmit an Act of Parliament, and an Order in Council transmitting an Act. I know of no instance in which the registry of an Order in Council, not transmitting an Act but a simple Order originating with the Privy Council, has been ever suspended by the Court; but, in the case of Acts of Parliament, several delicate questions have arisen. One arises from the circumstance which I think is worthy of notice. The general principle is admitted to be that no Act binds the Island, unless it is expressly named therein.

3597. Would you say specifically named, or named by implication? Supposing the Act says "All dominions of the British Crown, not being England, Scotland, or Ireland"?—I consider that to be a mooted point. My opinion is, that the Island would be bound: but I do not think the text writers go that length; nor do I recollect the thing being adjudicated upon.

3598. Supposing the Act to say "All the dominions of Her Majesty not being England, Scotland, or Ireland" what foundation could exist for the opinion that it would not bind the Island of Guernsey?—I do not know, except that the argument may be based upon its not coming under the word "specifically," which is the word used in the text writers. According to the mode at present adopted in conformity with the letter of 1806, every Act of Parliament is held by the British Legislature to be in force as soon as passed, and as only transmitted for the information of the Islands. It often happens that a particular enactment is of such a nature as might be advantageously put in force in Guernsey, but in that enactment the Islands are not referred to in any way, it refers simply to England. I will instance the Act of 9th George the Fourth, chapter 32, which relates to the Law of Evidence. If I recollect right, that Act applies specifically to England and Wales alone. There was some representation made to Government with respect to Quakers not being witnesses in criminal cases. In consequence of that, the Act of Parliament was sent down accompanied by an Order in Council, several years after it had been passed, which Order runs in the usual way. This Act is transmitted that the inhabitants of the Island may know they are bound thereby. The question then arises, whether they are bound or not. The Court have generally registered those Acts under protest. They register it, but reserve to themselves the right of making representations against it.

3599. Was this actually registered?—Yes, with a protest.

3600. Is the protest against the validity of that immediate law, or against the general liability to register?—Against both, as well as I can remember it.

3601. The Contrôle. Mr. Mac Culloch states that he does not know any instance in which an Order in Council not transmitting an Act of Parliament has ever been delayed in its registration. There is one instance in the year 1776. Two Orders were sent down to the Court. Differences had existed between the Bailiff and Jurats. On the 13th of April 1776, the Lieutenant Governor presented to the Court two Orders in Council of the 3rd of April 1776. The Court ordered those Orders to be lodged at the Greffe for a week; and, on the 20th of April, they came to the decision to delay the registry of those Orders, in order to make representations to the Crown. On the 12th of July, 1776, a letter was written by the Lords of the Council to the Court, admonishing the Court for their conduct, and ordering them to register the same immediately, which they did. The following are the Acts of Court which contain the presentation of the Orders and the determination of the Court.

The same were read as follow:

Le 20me April, 1776, devant William Le Marchant, Ecuyer, Baillif; Présens, Jean Guille, Jean De La Mere, Charles Andros, Thomas Dobrée, Richard De Beauvoir, Nicolas Reserson, Pierre De Jersey, Elizée Tupper et Jean Carey, Ecuyers, Jurés.

L'honorable Paulus Æmilius Irving, Lieutenant Gouverneur de cette Isle, présént.

La Cour, s'étant aujourd'hui assemblée, en conséquence de sa remise par son acte en date du 13me du courant, pour délibérer et donner leur opinion, au sujet de l'ordre de Sa Majesté en Conseil en date du 3me du courant, touchant les différens entre M. le Baillif et les dits M.M. les Jurés de cette Cour, a été unanimement d'opinion, en prenant le dit ordre en considération, d'en différer l'enregistrement, vu les deux premiers articles provisoires qui y sont contenus, jusques à avoir très humblement remontré à Sa Majesté combien ces deux articles sont contraires aux droits de cette jurisdiction, et aux chartres, libertés, et privilèges accordés aux habitans de cette Isle par les augustes Prédécesseurs de Sa Majesté, et comment Sa Majesté a été mal informée à ce sujet.

JOSNE GOSSELIN, Greffier du Roi."

3602. The Contrôle. The following is the letter from the Council to the Court. "After our Commendations. Whereas, in compliance with the humble petition of the States of the Island of Guernsey, His Majesty hath been graciously pleased to confirm the re-election of John Guille St. George, John De La Mare, Charles Andros, Thomas Dobrée, Richard De Beauvoir, Nicholas Dobrée, Nicholas Reserson, Peter De Jersey, Elisha Tupper, and John Carey, Esquires, to be Jurats of the Royal Court of the said Island; and whereas the said John Guille St. George, John De La Mare, Charles Andros, Thomas Dobrée, Richard De Beauvoir, Nicholas Reserson, Peter De Jersey, Elisha Tupper, and John Carey, Esquires, did prefer their humble petition to His Majesty, dated the 26th of April last, containing their reasons for having suspended the registering and carrying into execution his Majesty's two Orders in Council of the 3rd of the said month of April, the one made upon the several disputes subsisting between the Bailiff and Jurats of the said Royal Court, and the other directing that the suspension of Peter De Havilland from his office as an Advocate of the Royal Court should be immediately taken off; His Majesty, having taken the subject matter of the said Petition into his serious consideration, and looking upon the refusal of the said Jurats to register and carry into immediate execution the aforementioned Order in Council of the 3rd of April last to be, not only highly improper and unwarrantable, but also a great contempt of His Royal authority: We do therefore, in His Majesty's name and by His express command, hereby signify to you His Majesty's high displeasure at the said contempt; and do, in His Majesty's name, require and command you, forthwith to register and carry into due and exact execution His Majesty's Order in Council herewith transmitted, requiring immediate compliance with His Majesty's former Order, directing the suspension of Peter De Havilland to be taken off and likewise containing His Majesty's directions to his Lieutenant Governor of the Island of Guernsey for the taking the depositions of witnesses upon oath upon the several questions contained in the Order herewith transmitted, and signifying His Majesty's pleasure in regard to the manner in which the Bailiff and Jurats are to proceed in the respective discharge of their duty until the said depositions can be transmitted, and His Majesty's further pleasure, upon considering the same, shall be made known. And, lastly, we do, in His Majesty's name and by his express command, admonish and enjoin you, the Bailiff and Jurats of the Royal Court, that all your proceedings be governed with temper and moderation suitable to the dignity of your offices; and that you do take care that no interruption or delay may, in future, arise in the administration of justice within the Island of Guernsey. And, to the end that this signification of His Majesty's pleasure in the premises may remain upon record in the Royal Court of Guernsey, we do hereby further require and command that, immediately upon receipt of these presents, you do cause the same to be entered in the public registry of the said Royal Court. And so we bid you farewell."

3603. The Bailiff. I will take this opportunity of continuing one step further the remark made by Mr. MacCulloch with respect to the 9th George the IV., chapter 32. Here is the Act of Parliament. The difficulty is with respect to Acts of Parliament which were not intended by Parliament to apply to these Islands, but have been afterwards sent here. The first difficulty is where an Act, which, in its inception, is not made applicable by Parliament to these Islands, is transmitted with an Order in Council which does not purport so to do, but which only says, We send these things to you without ourselves giving them any validity which they had not before.

3604. (To the Bailiff.) The case you contemplate is one in which the Privy Council, without itself exercising any legislative power, except that of the direction to register, sends to you an Act not originally intended for the Island at all?—Yes; and where the Order in Council expressly says, We send it, not as being necessary to its validity but in order that the people may know that they are bound thereby. It does not pretend to bind them, except by an implication, which appears to be at variance with the Order in Council itself. That form appears to me to be consistent with the views of the Privy Council, with respect to an Act in which these Islands are mentioned, but to be of very doubtful operation, if of any, with respect to an Act which in its inception did not refer to the Island. In the 9th George IV., chapter 32, the enacting part of the first clause directs that every Quaker and Moravian, in place of taking the oath which had been previously required, should be permitted to make his solemn affirmation. That is in very general terms; but it was not meant to apply to this Island. A further difficulty is exemplified by the second section, and is one of very frequent occurrence. "Be it enacted, that on any prosecution by Indictment or Information, either at Common Law, or by virtue of any Statute, against any person for forging any Deed," &c., "the party shall be admissible in evidence." This is inapplicable to our proceedings, because we have no such prosecution, by either Indictment or Information, at Common Law or by virtue of any Statute. This Act of Parliament has been sent to us containing both difficulties; first, the general one put by Mr. MacCulloch, and secondly, the special one which I have pointed out. And, with respect to the second, my own strong opinion is that this section, though the Law has been sent here, can have no authority whatever, having no material upon which to operate.

3605. Perhaps, technically, the difficulty would hardly arise upon the second section. You have no case of the kind; and therefore that section would not apply.—That is exactly the view I take of it.

3607. You are perhaps aware that there has been a difficulty of that kind in Jersey, as to the Custom House Acts?—Yes. Those are the kind of proceedings which I look to. I am looking to Acts which it would be very desirable should be enforced here, but as to which it is very difficult to say what parts of those Acts are in force and what not, and how they are to be worked.

3608. The course there is that they adopt what we call in England the cy pres doctrine. They consider that the Bailiff and two Jurats represent a Justice of the Peace—I consider it very likely that the Cour Ordinaire would represent here a Justice of the Peace. That gets rid of a single case, but does not get rid of the principle. I would give another instance of an Act which has been registered here. The Act for the abolition of the Test and Corporation Acts. That Act provides that persons shall be admissible to corporate offices on making a certain declaration instead of taking the sacramental test. That Act was sent here for registration and registered.

3609. With the usual clause in the order?—Yes. That Act applies in England and Wales. But it applies to Municipal offices only. Here there are none; we have nothing in the nature of a Municipal Corporation.

3610. You have Municipal offices, but no officers of a Municipal Corporation?—No. And it only applies to those officers who, before the Act, were obliged to take the sacramental test. No sacramental test was ever required in this Island. So that that Act is merely idle. I consider it has no effect whatever. We have no office of the kind to which that declaration is made applicable. I give that as an instance of an Act of Parliament which, though registered here, appears to have no operation, because there is nothing for it to operate upon. I believe that the Act for the regulation of the Municipal Corporations in England and Wales was also sent here and registered, having no operation whatever. Then another thing happens sometimes, that Acts of Parliament, that have been passed many years ago come over with new Orders in Council. I am not aware that any mischievous effect has resulted from it: but, within these twelve months, a bundle of Acts of Parliament relating to some matters passed in several Sessions was sent to us at once; and they were registered. That, it appears to me, is calculated to raise a great number of questions, which I think it would be very difficult to solve. Besides which, the practice appears to be open to this objection: that an Act long dormant, and not originally intended to apply to this Island by the Parliament which passed the Act, and not intended to be applied to these Islands by the Government in power at the time it was passsed, is afterwards sent here to become law without any legislative discretion being exercised with respect to it.

3611. Why do you assume that?—I assume that from the form in which it is sent. It is merely transmitted to us to be registered, not because it has appeared at the time to the Privy Council to be a proper law to introduce, but in the same form as any other Act.

3612. It is the former case, with the additional fact of being an ancient Act?—Yes; which has been brought before the Privy Council in some way that we know nothing of, and which may be brought forward possibly for sinister purposes, for private or improper objects.

3613. What are the particular Acts which were so sent to you?—A variety of Acts relating to Church matters. I believe they were Acts which were wanted here, because some district churches were to be created, or something of that kind.

3614. Mr. MacCulloch. The Island is named in all those Acts. They are Church Building Acts, and Amendments of Church Building Acts.

3615. (To the Bailiff.) Supposing an Act, whether naming the Island or not, were transmitted and registered, and subsequently a repeal of that Act took place, and that repeal was not transmitted, what would be the Law here?

3616. Mr. Le Retilley. There was a case decided, I think, in which an Act had been passed and registered here. The King's officers sued for a fine. In the meantime there was an Act which repealed that Act; and that repealing Act was pleaded and the Crown officers were non-suited.

3617. The repeal of the former Act was held to be good?—Yes.

3618. The Procureur. I think there is the case of the Silk Act, which was sent fifty or sixty years after its passing.

3619. Mr. Le Retilley. Acts have been sent here, and subsequent Acts have been passed amending those Acts, which have not been sent here.

3620. Mr. Jeremie. I wish to make a single remark respecting the fact of an Order in Council or an Act of Parliament sent here and the question of giving that Law effect from the date of its passing, or from the date of its promulgation or registry here. I think the strongest point of view in which that can be considered is this: that, if the Law is to date from the day upon which it is passed in England, when it is totally unknown here, and people are to be bound by that Act before its promulgation, it is against the very first principle, laid down in Bacon's Universal Justice, respecting the promulgation of Laws, that they are supposed to be null before they are promulgated: and that certainly is the greatest and best feature of Law. Bacon says, "Si incertam vocem edit lex, quis se parabit ad parendum. Ut moneat igitur oportet priùs quam feriat." I will give the Commissioners an example of this very case. Take the Law, for instance, which was passed respecting Marriages, and the recent Laws of Wills. The latter was passed by Order in Council, July 13th, 1840.

3621. Do you refer to a local Law of Wills?—Yes. The Order in Council passed on the 13th of July, 1840. From that day it was Law: but it was registered here on the 3rd of Augst following. The question is from what day must that Law take effect. I would decidedly say that the Law can only take effect from the day of its promulgation. For, till it was sent here, nobody knew anything of it: and, as the Bailiff has just been telling you, sometimes you have a bundle of Acts sent which have been passed five or six years previously. Those are utterly unknown here: and what can become of the acquired rights which have taken place between individuals from the date of the passing of those Acts to the date of their registration and promulgation here.

3622. In that particular instance, is there no regulation as to the day on which it is to come into operation?

3624. Mr. Jeremie. If that be specially provided for, it does not come under the rule. But I say, in general cases, it must be the same day on which the Law is promulgated. What else is to become of the acquired rights which take place under the very Acts by parties who did not know them, when those Acts come here? In France (and though that is not our Law, yet a knowledge of foreign jurisprudence is often the best guide in judging of a case, and in this Court we frequently bring up these guides for want of others) the Law is very clear. Though they are so fond there of uniformity of legislation, yet a Law does not come into operation on the same day throughout the kingdom. In Paris, if the Law passes on the 1st of July, it is Law on the 2nd; but at Marseilles, which is some hundred leagues distant, it only comes into operation six days afterwards; so that the good people of Paris are bound by one Law, and the good people of Marseilles are bound by another. That appears to us, who are very fond of uniformity, singular. Yet it is very just. Therefore, going on that principle, we say that the Law, unless it is specially provided otherwise, can only be known here through its registration.

3625. Mr. MacCulloch. Supposing a person to be tried and convicted upon the testimony of two Quakers, would his conviction be a good one?

3626. The Bailiff. The question has arisen upon section 2 of this Act of 9th George IV., chapter 32. I got rid of it in the way I have mentioned: but a considerable difficulty was expressed upon the subject.

3627. To Mr. Lefebvre (Greffiér). Are the Commissioners to understand that there is no complete collection of Ordinances in print?—No. There are a few isolated Ordinances printed; but there is no general collection.

3628. Is there any printed collection of the Orders in Council which have been registered?—No.

3629. Therefore any person having occasion to refer to those Laws must apply to you for information upon them?—They must.

3630. The Contrôle. It has been usual to print all Ordinances passed by the Court in a newspaper called the French Gazette.

3631. The Bailiff. A paper in which there is an official column.

3632. Is there any annual book printed every year, as a collection of Ordinances passed during the year?—No.

3633. Would not that be an advantage?—I should think it would be a very great advantage. The consolidation of the Ordinances has been a matter which has occupied the Court a considerable time of late.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq., Advocate.

September 25th, 1846.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq. (Advocate), examined.

3634. The Commissioners have been told, in all the answers, that both French and English Law books are continually referred to by way of illustration?—They are.

3635. Is it for anything more than for purposes of illustration?—Only for those purposes.

3636. Is not the illustration carried a good way occasionally?—It is very often the case.

3637. Sometimes French and English Law books are at direct variance upon some principle, are not they?—It is very often the case.

3638. Will you state generally which of the two is followed in cases of that sort?—I should say the French.

3639. In the case of an attempt to commit crime with an inception of the act, that is a point upon which the English and French Laws differ. Which would be followed in such a case?—I should say the French Law would be followed.

3640. You would adopt here, therefore, the more severe rule?—That is my opinion.

3641. A very learned Advocate at Jersey answered very frankly that he would take that which best suited his client: but you think the Court would probably adopt the French view?—Yes. I should certainly myself use whichever was most favourable to my client.

3642. We are told that the precedents of the Court are also referred to; what are the means of access to the precedents of the Court?—Application to the Greffier.

3643. How do you know where to look? Are they indexed?—No. You must have an index of your own. The members of the Bar keep notes of their own: but there is no index at the Greffe office, except that at the end of each book you may find a table to give you the names; but I do not call that a general index.

3644. The members of the Bar, you say, are in the habit of keeping notes?—Yes.

3645. Each gentleman's notes, probably, would be limited to his own standing at the Bar?—Yes. Of course every young lawyer would manage to get a copy of the notes of some lawyers of more standing.

3646. You speak of manuscripts?—Yes.

3647. To Mr. Lefebvre (Greffier). Are the records of what takes place kept uniformly?—Yes.

3648. Are there any means of an ill-disposed person getting at the records and abstracting them?—They are safely kept in the custody of the Greffier. They never leave his custody, except to be produced in Court.

3649. Could any member of the Court take the records from your possession to his private house?—Certainly not, except by special leave on the part of the Court. The Greffier would not consider himself entitled to allow any records to be taken from the Greffe office without special permission of the Court. They are used constantly as evidence before the Court, but not permitted to go to any private house.

3650. Where they are used as evidence before the Court, they are supposed to be in your hands?—Yes: occasionally they have been taken over to England to be used in the Privy Council; which is done by a special order of the Court.

3651. The Bailiff. They are used in the Court House. I consider myself responsible for them while I have them before me.

3652. Mr. Lefebvre (Greffier). Strictly speaking, they are supposed to be in the custody of the Greffier in such a case; and I should suppose that he would be the responsible party.

3653. The Bailiff. The Commissioners have been told there have been certain consolidations of Ordinances. I hold in my hand a Projet d' Ordonnance relating to the Harbours, which has been alluded to more than once. This Projet, in its present form, was submitted at one Chief Pleas. The Commissioners will find that the preliminary article contains full three pages of repeals of former Ordinances, from the year 1702 to 1842. The remainder of it is a digest and improvement of the then existing Law. This Projet d'Ordonnance, having been printed in the present form with a broad margin, was made public, in order that any objections that might be made should be considered. There were two bodies of men that suggested certain alterations; the Chamber of Commerce, and an Insurance Company. All their suggestions were heard and attended to. Considerable alterations were made in consequence of their suggestions; and ultimately the Ordinance passed with the amendments so made. The Ordinance, as now existing, is an amended edition of this which I hold in my hand.

3654. Was this one of the Ordinances which would not have required the intervention of the States?—Yes. The Ordinance is now in force, having been passed at the Chief Pleas.

3655. Is the sanction of the Lieutenant Governor considered necessary for these local Acts?—No. He is summoned to the meetings.

3656. Has he any power of veto?—No. He is summoned to the Court of Chief Pleas. There is a modification to my answer which I must make. I should state, for instance, with respect to the very Ordinance which is before the Commissioners, there are certain clauses which affect the public rights of the Lieutenant Governor. Before the measure was produced to the Court of Chief Pleas, I communicated those portions of the projet to the Lieutenant Governor. I apprehend, we could not have made any alteration, with respect to matters affecting his rights or powers, without his consent. I understand, also, that the Militia Ordinances are always made with the consent of the Lieutenant Governor, and purport to be so.

3657. You think you could not have dealt with one particular class of Ordinances without the consent of the Lieutenant Governor. In what way would that question arise? Supposing an Ordonnance to contain a regulation upon the subject of the Queen's gunpowder, with a penalty for breach of it; would it be competent for the party who resisted the enforcement of the penalty to object that the consent of the Lieutenant Governor had never been given?—No; I think not.

3658. In what way is his consent essential to its validity?—I do not know that it is, with respect to its validity. But I apprehend that the Lieutenant Governor would have the right of representing to the Privy Council that his powers had been infringed by the Court of Chief Pleas.

3659. In what way does his position, as to that, differ from his position as to any other law?—I think it would affect the judgment of the Privy Council. In the one case, it would be only a question of fact, whether the Lieutenant Governor had been consulted; in the other, whether his objections were reasonable.

3660. You think the fact of your not having obtained his consent would weigh with the Privy Council, irrespectively of the tendency of the Act itself?—I think so.

3661. This Ordinance does not require the consent of the Privy Council?—No. There is also an Ordinance with respect to the powder kept on shore, which I believe was submitted to the Lieutenant Governor. The Ordinance was suggested by the Lieutenant Governor; and the projet, when framed, was, I believe, submitted to him.

3662. (To Mr. Carré.) Is it the case that no Ordinance can be made regulating the Militia without the consent of the Lieutenant Governor?—I believe, in all Militia Ordinances, the preamble states that His Excellency has been consulted upon the subject, and that they are made at his request, or with his acquiescence.

3663. The Procureur. The Ordinance of 1803 and the Ordinance of 1840 state the request of the Lieutenant Governor that they should be passed.

3664. Mr. De Havilland. Practically speaking, I think he is always consulted, 3665. Are the Commissioners right in supposing that, except in those cases which have been mentioned, the Lieutenant Governor possesses no right of veto upon the ordinances of the Court?

Mr. Carré. I think not.

3666. (To Mr. Falla.) Will you be kind enough to state what the parishes of the Island are?—St Peter Port, St. Sampson, The Vale, Câtel, St. Saviour's, St. Pierre Du Bois, Torteval, Le Forêt, St. Martin's, and St. Andrews.

3667. Does each of those parishes possess its own peculiar police officers?—Yes; each of the country parishes has two constables.

3668. By country parishes do you mean all but St. Peter Port?—Yes. St. Peter Port has two constables, and four assistant constables.

3669. We are told that, in each parish, there are certain officers called Douzeniers; are they police officers?—No.

3670. What are their functions?—They are named by the ratepayers from persons who have been Constables. Their duty is to attend to the repair of the roads, to rate each parishioner, and to vote in the election of the Jurats of the Royal Court.

3671. Are they elected by every body who pays the rate?—Yes; every male who pays rates.

3672. Have they any duties at all connected with the keeping of the peace?—They have not.

3673. Is the number of Douzeniers limited in each parish?—Yes.

3674. What is their number in each parish?—Twenty in St. Peter Port; what we call la Douzaine centrale.

3675. Is there a Douzaine for each parish?—Formerly there was but one Douzaine. Douzaine means the body consisting of Douzeniers. In the town parish we have la Douzaine centrale, and four Douzaines du Canton. Twenty in the central Douzaine, and twelve in each of the four Douzaines du Canton, making sixty eight in all for St. Peter Port. In the other parishes there are twelve in each, except the Vale, where they have sixteen. The Vale is divided into Clos du Val et L'Epine. There are twelve for the Clos du Val, and four for L'Epine. Formerly the sea divided that parish in two.

GUERNSEY.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq., Advocate.

September 25th, 1846.

3676. Do the constables also vote in the election of Jurats?—Yes; the constables, not the Assistant constables.

3677. The two constables in each parish and the members of the Douzaine?—Yes; I should also add that the constables are the treasurers of their parishes. The constables are bound to serve at least one year, but not more than three without undergoing a new election.

3678. The Douzeniers are elected by the ratepayers, you say; on what is the rate placed?—On real and personal property.

3679. The Bailiff. It is a rate on the person in respect of his property.

3680. (To Mr. Falla.) Has every person having property a right to be rated, or is it necessary to possess a certain amount of property?—My opinion is, that it is necessary, if called upon, to shew that the person rated is possessed of a certain amount of property.

3681. What amount of property?—In some parishes as low as five quarters, equivalent to 100*l*.

3682. Mr. Le Retilley. Within the last few years, there has been a uniform practice to rate no one who has less than seven quarters. That regulation has been adopted with regard to the Country Hospital, to which all the parishes are liable to be rated. They made an agreement among themselves that that should be the rate.

3683. No person having less than seven quarters is entitled to vote for a Douzenier?—No.

3684. The Bailiff. Seven quarters representing a capital of about 140*l*.

3685. (To Mr. Le Retilley.) I understand you that the practice is established by a mere general convention, but not a distinct law?—It is an understanding come to among the ratepayers themselves: the general Ordinance of the Court is that all ratepayers shall have the right to vote at the election of parochial officers. Among themselves they have occasionally raised the rate from five to seven quarters. At present, in the town parish, ten quarters is the qualification.

3686. Do you mean that no body is on the books at all, unless he possesses that?—None; no one is rated to the parish requirements, unless he is worth at least 140*l*. in the country parishes, and 200*l*. in the town.

3687. Mr. De Havilland. Perhaps, as I was constable when those arrangements were made, I may say that there is a Hospital here for the nine parishes, which may be called an Union, to which all the poor are entitled to resort, which is in the nature of an Union in England.

3688. The Hospital is the place in which the poor of the nine parishes are supported?—Yes; the poor and the infirm of every description. The premises were originally a gift; and the parishes paid in different proportions, according to their wealth at the time: but lately it was agreed that each parish should assess itself at seven quarters.

3689. They agreed that each person having seven quarters should be obliged to contribute to the support of the poor in the Hospital?—Yes; and none under that. The ratepayers elect the Douzeniers and Constables; and those Douzeniers by law in the country parishes are qualified by at least ten quarters of assessment. The town Douzeniers are required to be qualified by thirty quarters: and those qualified officers then become the electors of the Jurats and of the Prévôt; so that no elector of these officers is rated under ten quarters.

3690. The reason of the difference of the qualification in the electors arises probably from the town not being a party to the agreement for the support of the Hospital?—Yes; they have their own Hospital for their own parish.

3691. (To Mr. Falla.) Is there any mode for a person to get his name inserted in the rate, supposing he has been left out?—Certainly. If, on applying to the Douzaine, they refuse, the person has a right to apply to the Royal Court and shew that he has the required amount of property.

3692. The Royal Court will allow him to prove that he has the necessary qualification. On his establishing that, will they insert him on the rate?—Yes. It would be very difficult for me to say whether such a thing has happened.

3693. You do not recollect an instance?—No; but the principle has been acted on. There was a person elected to serve as Douzenier; and the Douzaine disputed his right, because he had not the required qualification. The case came before the Court; and it was proved to the Court that he was qualified.

3694. In what shape did it come before the Court? What was the nature of the proceeding?—On a suit against the Constable, I understand. I was not at the bar at that time.

Mr. Procureur. A person of the name of Le Roy was elected Douzenier: he was opposed by another candidate of the name of Lenfestey on the ground of his not being qualified.

3695. Was the objection that he did not appear by the books to be qualified, or that the books wrongly represented him to be qualified?—That he did not appear by the books to be qualified. The parties were sent before a Magistrate, as a Commis of the Court, to examine the amount of his property.

3696. By a Magistrate you mean a Jurat?—Yes. He proved that he possessed the requisite qualification; and he was sworn in.

3697. He was entitled to impeach the books collaterally?—Yes. He proved that he was worth ten quarters. I understand, in that particular case, before he was chosen, he had given notice to the officers to rate him at the ten quarters.

3698. Was Mr. Lenfestey a candidate claiming the office of Douzenier himself?—I believe so.

3699. Mr. Mac Culloch. Mr. Le Roy had the majority of votes; but Lenfestey said, Although I have not the majority, I am legally elected; the others have thrown away their votes by voting for an unqualified candidate.

3700. The Procureur. There was also, I believe, another case at La Forêt.

The Contrôle. It was the case of Allez. On his appearing to take the oath of Douzenier, about four years ago, certain ratepayers protested against his being admitted to the office, on the ground that he did not possess the requisite qualification, although rated upon the books. Upon that the Court ordered the party to be sent before a Magistrate to examine whether he possessed the necessary qualification. He proved that he did possess the requisite qualification; and he was sworn in.

3701. (To Mr. Falla.) Supposing a person wished to object to some one else, as being improperly placed upon the rate, is there any legal mode of doing that? Suppose ratepayers in parishes A, B and C are inserted in the rate, as possessing the proper number of quarters, but that in fact they do not possess it, and have no right to be there?—I am not aware of any proceeding in such a case, except in the case of a contested election.

3702. Perhaps the same answer would apply to the objection that a party was rated too high?—I do not know of any proceeding in any case similar to that, except, of course, on the principle of a person disputing a party being Constable or Douzenier.

3703. Might a third party say, You have rated such a party at the requisite number of quarters to make him a Douzenier; I dispute his qualification? Could any third party take an objection of that kind?—I think such an objection might be taken; but I do not know of any case.

3704. Mr. Le Retilley. An occurrence of that kind would be hardly known. Everybody would seek to screen himself from being rated higher than necessary.

3706. (To Mr. Falla.) What is the qualification for a Constable?—There is none except being on the rate.

3707. That is to say, having seven quarters in the country parishes, and ten quarters in the town parish?—Yes.

3708. Is the Constable an elected officer?—Yes.

3709. By whom is the Constable elected?—By the ratepayers.

3710. Is the rate imposed on the full amount of property?—Yes.

3711. It is not a rate on a nominal amount of property, but on the actual one?—Yes.

3712. So that a person having fifty quarters would be rated at fifty quarters, and if he had a hundred quarters he would be rated at a hundred?—Yes.

3713. Mr. De Havilland. As far as the Douzaine is enabled to discover the full amount.

3714. (To Mr. Falla). Have they any inquisitorial power?—I do not believe there is any means of compelling a party to declare what he is worth. But, if he refuses to be rated as high as he is set down on the books, the Douzenier can bring him before the Court, and the Court will call upon him to declare whether he is worth that sum or not. The Court will put to him the question, Will you swear that you are not worth that: and he will swear what he is not, or that he is. But I do not believe the Court could make him declare that he is worth.

3715. They can ask him whether he is worth so much or not?—Yes; the question is put to him on his oath.

3716. The Procureur. They put the question, How much are you worth; and what he declares they rate him at.

3717. Mr. Falla. I must add to that, that it is not left to the Court to administer the oath. The Constable or any other parish officer suing can say, I am ready to prove that this person is worth so much. When a rate payer is actioned for his rate, if he comes before the Court, and says, I am not worth that, the officer suing may say, I am ready to show he is worth that. It is always left to the officer suing to prove that the rate payer is worth that.

3718. The officer is allowed to give proof that the rate is correct?—Yes. And then the party is sent before the Commis of the Court.

3719. Can the party himself demand to be put upon his oath?—No.

3720. Can the Court, if they think fit, put him to his oath?—I consider that they have no right to do so, unless the officer leaves it to the oath of the party sued.

3721. Mr. De Courcy. It has been enforced by the Court.

3722. Mr. Falla. If a Constable brings a party before the Court, he has two courses; either he may take the proof upon himself, and show that the party is worth so much; or he may say, I am content to leave it to the Court to put him upon his oath. Then the Court puts it to the person charged; and, if the person charged refuses to be sworn, the Court assumes the amount correct, and puts him upon the rate at that amount.

3723. If he is sworn they take his oath?—Yes. But, if the party himself states it is not possible for him to declare the value of his property, then he has the option of being sent before the Commis, before whom he is bound to give a statement of his property.

3724. Is that secret?—No.

3725. The Constable has the right to vote for a Jurat, has he not?—Yes, while in office.

3726. Is the Constable a member of the States?—He is a member of the Electing States, since he has a right to vote for the election of a magistrate.

3727. We have been told that particular laws are passed by the States: is he a mem-

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq., Advocate.

September 25th, 1846.

ber of the States who pass those laws?—No: he has a right of voting in his ov Douzaine upon any measure proposed in the States and sent to that Douzaine.

3728. Is it the course that, when a law is proposed which is to go through the States, it is sent by the States to each Douzaine, to take the opinion of the Douzaine upon the proposition?—Yes.

3729. And there the Constable votes?—Yes, in his own Douzaine.

3730. Mr. Carré. Properly speaking, there are not two States; it is the same body in a different mode of action. The States of Election are the great body of the States, united in one for the purpose of electing a magistrate. The States of Deliberation are composed of the Bailiff, the Jurats, the Clergy, and the Queen's Procureur, together with two deputies from the Central Douzaine, and one from each of the Central Douzaines of the town parish, and one from each of the other parishes.

3731. Has the Bailiff a vote?—Yes; he votes first.

3732. How many clergy are there?—There are eight. The parishes La Forêt and Torteval are united, and the Vale and St. Sampson's.

3733. The Bailiff. There is only one body to be denominated the States. One frequently hears the States of Deliberation and the States of Election spoken of. The States consist of the Bailiff, the Jurats, the Clergy, the Queen's Procureur, and the Douzaniers and Constables of every parish. Every member of the States has an individual voice in the election of a Jurat. In matters of deliberation, the Douzaniers have not an individual voice; but each parish has one collective vote. According to the former practice, I believe, in very ancient times, the Douzaines were in the habit of attending and instructing their Constable at the meeting to vote either this way or that. But that fell out of use, and, instead of coming to the States, they deliberated, each Douzaine in their own parish; and the Constable, as their representative, came to the States with their vote. The Billet d'Etat used to be addressed to the constables. "Messieurs les Connétables, Vous êtes avertis qu'il se tiendra une assemblée des Etats au lieu ordinaire, Mercredi 27 Mars, 1844, à onze heures du matin, pour délibérer sur les objects suivans. Vous êtes donc réquis de communiquer ce Billet à votre Douzaine, pour qu'elle se consulte et vous donne son opinion là-dessus que vous rapporterez à la dite assemblée le dit jour et heure. Vous ferez la même communication à votre Recteur, afin qu'il se trouve à la dite assemblée pour y donner aussi son opinion." So that the Constable had to give notice to the douzaine and also to the rector within the parish; and the constable then came bringing with him the result of the deliberation of the Douzaine. The difference, therefore, between the States of Election and the States of Deliberation is, that in one every member has a vote, and in the other the parishes have each only one collective vote. Then the alteration which has been made in the Constitution in 1844 was this: that, instead of the Constable being ex officio the organ of the Douzaine, the Douzaine elected one of their number as a deputy, to be their representative and to vote according to his own judgment, so that the voice of the Douzaine is confided to the judgment of the deputy. Another alteration, introduced at the same time, was that further representation was given to the town. Formerly there was only one Douzaine in the town, a Douzaine of twenty. The town was subdivided into four districts, each of which had, besides the general Douzaine of the town, a Douzaine of twelve. There is one point of view in which the two bodies of the States may be considered as one. It frequently happens that a Committee of the States of Deliberation is appointed; a Committee of their own body. I believe it is considered that every member of the States, in the largest sense of the word, is competent, as a member of the States, to be put on that Committee. This is very convenient, because, a deputy elected only pro hâc vice being nominated on a Committee, although he ceases to be a deputy and so loses his voice, nevertheless, as Douzanier, he continues a member of the States, and capable of serving on the Committee. As far as the States are concerned, therefore, it is not merely an historical question.

The following Paper, containing the Constitution of the States of Guernsey confirmed by Order in Council, was delivered in.

CONSTITUTION des ETATS de GUERNSEY, confirmée par ORDRE de SA MAJESTÉE en CONSEIL, en date du 13 Décembre, 1844.

1. Aucune taxe générale ne sera levée qu'après avoir été votée par les Etats de Délibération, à la majorité de deux tiers des membres présens. Sous cette condition, ils pourront lever, dans le courant de chaque année, des taxes générales jusqu'au montant, tout ensemble, d'un penny per quartier. Toute taxe qui dépassera ce montant demandera d'être confirmée par la majorité d'une assemblée des Etats d'Election, et doit recevoir la sanction de Sa Majesté en Conseil signifiée par le moyen d'un de ses Principaux Secrétaries d'Etat, Anglicé, "and must receive the consent of Her Majesty in Council, signified through one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State."

2. Les taxes générales seront réparties d'une manière uniforme, d'après les principes posés dans l'ordonnance de la Cour Royale du 30 Avril, 1821, sur tous les biens meubles des habitants contribuables, de quelque nature, ou en quelque pays, qu'ils puissent être; et sur tous les héritages en cette Ile et dans les îles d'Herm et de Jethou, soit que les propriétaires de ces héritages aient, ou n'aient pas, d'établissement dans ces dites îles.

3. Les dits biens, tant meubles qu'héritages, seront responsables de la dette actuelle des Etats, toute fois et quantes que sa liquidation serait requise.

4. Toutes taxes votées par les Etats seront côtisées par la Douzaine de chaque paroisse, et perçues par les connétables, de la même manière que les taxes paroissiales.

5. Lorsqu'il sera question de lever une taxe générale, les connétables de chaque paroisse fourniront au Trésorier des Etats une liste des contribuables dans leur paroisse avec le montant de leurs biens, réduits en quartiers, suivant à la manière de lever les taxes paroissiales, qui devra être uniforme pour toute l'Ile ; et d'après le nombre total de quartiers le dit Trésorier indiquera à chaque Douzaine paroissiale le montant qu'elle aura à lever dans sa paroisse.

6. Comme il n'est que juste que la ville et paroisse de St. Pierre-Port, qui doit supporter la plus grande portion des contributions publiques, et qui a dans son sein plus de la moitié de la population de l'Ile entière, ait de suite une augmentation de voix dans les assemblées des Etats, elle aura cinq voix d'ajoutation dans les Etats de Délibération et quarante huit voix d'ajoutation dans les Etats d'Election.

7. A cet effet, la paroisse de St. Pierre Port sera divisée, au dire de ses propres autorités, en quatre cantons égaux, autant que possible, par rapport au nombre des contribuables et au montant de leurs contributions. Chaque canton aura une Douzaine qui enverra un Député, choisi de parmi ses membres, aux assemblées des Etats de Délibération, et la Douzaine paroissiale en enverra deux. Et seront les dits Douzeniers de canton, avec les Douzeniers et Connétables de la Douzaine paroissiale, membres des Etats d'Election.

8. Chaque Douzaine de canton sera composée de douze membres, les qualifications et les termes de service desquels seront les mêmes à tous égards que ceux des Douzeniers de paroisse. Ils seront élus par une assemblée des contribuables du canton. Les premières assemblées pour cet effet seront convoquées et présidées par les connétables de la paroisse, et toute assemblée subséquente sera convoquée et présidée par le Doyen de la Douzaine du canton. Et seront les personnes élues présentées à la Cour Royale par le Doyen pour être sermentées avant de pouvoir entrer en charge.

9. La charge de Douzenier de canton n'exemptera pas des charges paroissiales les individus qui y seront élus. Si un Douzenier de canton devient Douzenier de paroisse, s'il cesse à habiter le canton, ou s'il s'absente de l'Ile pour un an et jour, il sera de suite remplacé par un autre individu.

10. Chaque Douzaine de canton aura la surveillance des chemins publics dans la canton en dehors des barrières, et sera présidée par le plus ancien de ses membres, auquel le Président des Etats adressera ses billets de convocation.

11. Ces changemens n'affecteront en rien la constitution ni les fonctions de la Douzaine de la ville et paroisse de St. Pierre Port, sauf en ce qui regarde la surveillance des chemins en dehors des barrières. Elle restera composée, comme elle est actuellement, de deux connétables et de vingt membres ; et toute élection pour remplacement se fera, comme par le passé, par le contribuables de la paroisse en assemblée générale.

12. La division de la paroisse de St. Pierre Port en cantons ne dérogera en rien à l'unité de ses habitans contribuables, dans les assemblées de paroisse, pour ce qui regarde les taxes paroissiales, les élections de connétables et des autres officiers paroissiaux, et les autres affaires de paroisse, lesquelles seront, comme par le passé reglées par les dites assemblées.

15. Les membres des Etats de Délibération jouiront tous dans leurs assemblées des mêmes privilèges et prérogatives. Le Président, en vertue de son office, aura la police de l'assemblée et en réglera les procédures. Ils seront libres de discuter tous les objets soumis à leur délibération ; et pourront tous, également, proposer amendemens ou modifications aux articles contenus au Billet d'Etat, aussi bien que sursis ou ajournemens de l'assemblée. Tout amendement ou modification sera rédigé par écrit, et, s'il est secondé, il sera soumis par le Président à l'assemblée, pour qu'elle en dispose définitivement ; pourvu toute fois qu'il ne dépasse pas l'objet de la proposition d'origine. Mais dans tous les cas où une mesure proposée aux Etats ne serait pas admise, rejettée ou modifiée, par les deux tiers des membres présens, elle pourra être soumise une seconde fois, dans un mois au plus tard, par le Président, s'il le voit bon, aux dits Etats, et sera alors décidée à la majorité des voix des membres présens.

16. Le Président des Etats, sur la requête par écrit de la majorité d'un des trois corps des Etats (un Connétable de paroisse, ou un Doyen de Douzaine de canton, signant au nom de sa Douzaine comptant pour un membre) ou de dix membres pris indifféremment dans les Etats de Délibération, sera tenu, après avoir conferé avec Monsieur le Lieutenant Gouverneur quant au jour de l'assemblée, de convoquer les Etats, dans un temps raisonnable à l'effet de la dite requête ; bien entendu cependant que le sujet y soit exprimé en termes clairs et précis.

ETATS D'ELECTION.

17. Les Etats d'Election seront composés comme suit :—

|---|---|
| Monsieur le Bailiff et Messieurs les Jurés de la Cour Royale | 13 |
| Messieurs les Recteurs des paroisses | 8 |
| Monsieur le Procureur de la Reine | 1 |
| Messieurs les Connétables et Douzeniers de la paroisse de St. Pierre Port | 22 |
| Messieurs les Douzeniers des cantons de la dite paroisse | 48 |
| Messieurs les Connétables et Douzeniers des paroisses de la campagne | 130 |
| Membres | 222 |

18. Les Billets de convocation des Etats de Délibération et d'Election, seront à l'avenir adressés aux membres des Etats généralement ; et en fournira M. le Greffier, huit jours pour le moins avant l'assemblée, une copie à chacun des membres de la Cour et du Clergé, au Procureur de la Reine, et autant de copies aux Connétables de chaque paroisse et Doyens de Douzaine de canton, comme il y aura de membres dans leurs douzaines respectives, et une en sus pour être gardée avec les registres de chaque Douzaine.

3734. How long are the Constables elected for?—The Constables are bound to serve one year, but cannot serve more than three years without a new election.

GUERNSEY.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq., Advocate.

September 25th, 1846.

3735. On entering his office, is he sworn in as Constable?—After he is elected, he is summoned to appear before the Court, that is, two Magistrates and the Bailiff, and is there bound to take the oath of office. The oath is taken before the Cour Ordinaire; but, if there is any objection on the part of the rate-payers, then the case is referred to a Court composed of the Bailiff and seven Magistrates at least?

3736. Does the constable take an oath?—Yes: the following is the oath.

The same was read as follows:

SERMENT DE CONNÉTABLE.

Vous jurez sur les Saintes Evangiles, et promettez par la foi que vous devez à Dieu, que bien et fidellement vous exercerez l'office et charge de connétable en la paroisse de , en laquelle vous avez été choisi, et maintenant êtes en ce lieu approuvé et reçu, selon les devoirs de la dite charge en général, et particulièrement selon les points qui ensuivent.

2e. Vous serez toute votre vie fidèle et loyal sujet à notre Légitime Souveraine, Dame Victoria, par la Grâce de Dieu, du Royaume uni de la Grande Bretagne et Irelande Reine, et à ses nobles Hoirs et Successeurs, la Majesté de laquelle reconnoissez, immediatement sous Dieu, Suprême Chef et Gouverneur sur toutes Personnes et en tous ses Royaumes et Dominions en toutes Causes Ecclésiastiques et Civiles.

3e. Vous maintiendrez de tout votre pouvoir le bien, la paix et la tranquillité de cette Ile en général et de votre paroisse en particulier.

4e. Quand aux devoirs particuliers de votre charge: vous porterez honneur respect et obéissance due aux Magistrats de cette Ile, particulierment a Monsieur le Gouverneur, Monsieur le Baillif, Monsieur le Lieutenant Baillif, et Messieurs les Jurés, les honorant vous mêmes et les faisant honorer aux autres par votre exemple, chacun suivant son rang et qualité, et en exécutant, et faisant exécuter, les jugemens et ordonannces politiques des Magistrats et Etats de cette Ile, autant que le devoir de votre charge le requerrera, pour le service de Sa Majesté et la manutention du bien et tranquillité publique de cet Etat.

5e. Vous garderez, et autant qu'en vous est, y ferez garder et maintenir, les loix, libertés, franchises et priviléges de ces Isles, et pour l'effet tacherez d'avoir bonne connoissance des premises autant qu'il sera requis et nécessaire pour la bonne et fidelle administration de votre dite charge.

6e. Quand à votre devoir particulier en qualité de membre des Etats, entre lesquels vous êtes reçu et admis: vous serez diligent à y assister toutes fois et quantes que serez semondé, y donnerez votre propre conseil et avis, et rapporterez celui de votre paroisse, le tout en toute fidélité et rondeur de conscience, ayant principalement égard à la Gloire de Dieu, service de votre Prince, et bien et utilité publique de cet Etat; gardant secrettes les choses qui y seront traitées jusques à ce que par consent général soit permis de les révéler; vous conformant paisiblement à ce qui sera conclu et arrêté par la pluralité des voix.

7e. Pour ce qui regarde votre Paroisse, vous tâcherez de découvrir et amener en Justice les malfaiteurs et délinquants coutre les susdites loix et ordonnances. Vous avancerez la gloire de Dieu le bien et la paix publique, et ménagerez fidellement les deniers publics pour en rendre bons et justes comptes toutes fois et quantes qu'en serez requis.

Dieu sauve la Reine.

3737. Is that an oath of ancient date?—The oath, in its present form, is of the date of 1605.

3738. Has there been any change made in it since that time?—No. In 1800 the Royal style, dropping the title of King of France, was adopted; but there has been no other alteration.

3739. The Bailiff. With respect to the oath, I should say there was an oath, probably nearly the same as this, in force before the year 1605. In 1605 the States were revived; and new duties were therefore imposed upon the Constable. The States were revived in consequence of an Order in Council, which in three lines ordered the revival, but entered into no particulars. I suppose the particulars were worked out in the Court of that day. We have it on the Records of the Court, that, when the States met for the first time, a certain oath, which is there recorded, was then administered to the Constables. That is the oath which has just been read: and no alteration, except a formal one, was made in that oath, until the time when the constitution of the States was altered in 1844. The Commissioners will see, by looking at the oath, that the duty imposed upon the Constable as a member of the States had reference to the then existing constitution, and to the duties which he then had to perform. The Constable no longer having those duties to perform, the Court thought it would be right to alter the oath, and make it correspond with the duties he had to perform. The Court also at the same time made certain other alterations by leaving out parts, against which it was thought objections might be made on religious grounds, which I am not aware that it is necessary for me to go into. The Court made an Ordinance that the oath as altered should be taken: and, a Constable having objected to take it on account of the title of "Defender of the faith," and the phrase "L'avancement de la gloire de Dieu," the first being new and the other in the former oath, was brought before the Court. Proceedings were taken against him; and he was sentenced to take the oath under a penalty of 20*l.* Upon that he presented a petition to the Privy Council. There was also a petition against the oath at the same time from certain dissenting ministers. The Order of the Privy Council is that the Act of Court should be set aside, the Lords of Council thinking that the Court had no power to alter the ancient form of oath. Whereupon the Court repealed all the Ordinances which it had made with respect to this oath. So that the old oath of 1605 now remains the only oath.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq., Advocate.

September 25th, 1846.

3740. Are you aware whether the power of altering the form of an official oath was ever exercised by the Court?

3741. The Procureur. Yes. Assistant Constables werea ppointed in 1736 by an Ordinance of the Royal Court. There was a subsequent ordinance in 1799, altering the duties of assistant Constables. In one of those ordinances an oath is imposed upon the assistant Constables.

3742. That would be a new oath, not an alteration of an old one?—Yes. Sometime after this, the rate-payers at large presented a petition to the Privy Council claiming to have the right to elect the assistant Constables. By the Ordinances that right was given to the Douzaines, I think. The prayer of that petition of the rate-payers is "to be allowed to maintain their right to elect." Counsel were heard; and the petition was dismissed. The Ordinance of the Court was there upheld against the petition of the parish, part of the Ordinance being that oath.

3743. The Ordinance creating the oath for a new office was passd in 1799?—Yes.

3744. The petition raised a question as to the right to elect?—Yes.

3745. That would refer to the Ordinance of 1736, would not it?—The petitioners ask; "that the assistant Constables shall, in future, be named by the heads of families, in the same manner as the Constables and other Parish officers are at present elected. That, after two years from the date of the first election of an assistant by the heads of families, the constables shall only be chosen from among the assistants, or among those who shall have already served as assistants." Their Lordships, on the 29th of May, 1826, "declared they saw no reason to advise his Majesty to make any alteration in the existing Law."

3746. The Contrôle. The order of the Court of Michaelmas Chief Pleas in 1799 was for the purpose of giving the assistant constables additional power and defining that power; and also creating the oath. The mode of election would have been fixed by the Ordinance in the year 1736. They pleaded against the legality of the Ordinance of 1736, and also against that of 1799: and their prayer states: "They would certainly have wished to obtain, in the first instance, the approbation of the States; but, rather than enter into a discussion which more nearly concerned the States than themselves, they now humbly pray that your Majesty will in your royal wisdom be graciously pleased to allow them to be heard by their counsel before the Lords of your Majesty's most honourable Privy Council, and to maintain the parishioners of St. Peter Port, paying rate, in their right of naming their own parochial officers; and further to grant your royal sanction to both or either of the regulations approved of by the parish deliberation of the said second of September, so that they may in future be acknowledged as law in the Island of Guernsey." That was their prayer.

3747. They did not take any objection to the oath in their prayer?—No, not specifically. The petition was referred to the Court; and the Court sent an answer. The decision is: "The Lords of the Committee this day resumed the consideration of the original petition of the Committee of the inhabitants: and, having also considered the said petition of the High Constable's and Douzainier's, together with papers accompanying the said petition and other documents, and having heard counsel, on both sides, thereupon; Their Lordships agree humbly to report, as their opinion, to your Majesty, that it will not be advisable for your Majesty to comply with the prayer of the petition of the inhabitants of the said town and parish of St. Peter Port for electing their own parochial officers."

3748. (To Mr. Falla.) In St. Peter Port parish there are certain officers who are assistant Constables?—Yes.

3749. How many are there?—Four.

3750. Those assistant Constables are selected by the Douzaine, and not by the parish at large?—They are selected by the Douzaine.

3751. Is there any qualification for the office of assistant Constable?—No.

3752. Not even that they should be rated?—No.

3753. Do they form a portion of the Douzaine?—No.

3754. Are the four assistant Constables and the two parish constables the whole Police of the parish of St. Peter Port?—That is all the Police by the constitution of this Island.

3755. And in the country parishes two constables?—Yes.

3756. There are certain officers called Special Constables, are there not?—In case of need their names are brought before the Court: they are summoned before the Court and sworn in.

3757. Are the Special Constables appointed by the Constables?—They are presented by the Constables and the Douzainiers to the Royal Court, as I understand.

3758. Are they bound to serve?—No.

3759. The Constables and Douzainiers present the Special Constables to the Court; and they take an oath of office?—Yes, an oath to do their duty.

3760. At what time did the appointment of special Constables commence?—I think about the year 1832 they were first appointed.

3761. Was there an Ordinance of the Court for the purpose?—No: an Act of Court was made recording their appointment.

3762. Mr. Tupper. I was in office as Constable of St. Peter Port in 1837; and they were appointed at that time.

3763. Mr. Jeremie. They were elected on account of a great number of robberies that took place. They came forward and offered their services; and the Lieutenant Bailiff paid them a handsome compliment, and told them that their coming forward in that way was the best proof of their willingness to do away with those robberies.

3664. Mr. Dobrée. I believe, invariably, all those individuals who have served the office of Special Constable are persons who have already served their turn in the duty of assistant Constable.

3765. All the individuals who are Special Constables have before been assistant Constables?—Yes.

3766. (To the Bailiff.) Would the Court have the power of appointing any other person Special Constable?—Any person who was willing.

3767. How does the power of the Court in the first instance to appoint a Special Constable arise?

3768. Mr. Le Retilley. On the application of the Constable. When he sees the necessity he applies to the Court for additional aid.

3769. How does the limitation arise as to their having been assistant Constables before?—Their previous service is considered to be a proof of the value their services will be of in future.

3770. Mr. Carré. The Constable would not present any person but one who had been formerly chosen by the Douzaine.

3771. (To Mr. Falla.) Can you tell the Commissioners how many Special Constables there are in St. Peter Port?—About twelve.

3772. Do they exist in any other parishes?—No.

3773. Are they paid?—No.

3774. Are any of the other peace officers you have mentioned paid?—No.

3775. For how long are the Special Constables appointed?—The first time they were appointed, I believe, the time was specified.

3776. (To Mr. Carré.) Do you know whether Special Constables are appointed for a limited time?—No. Some have been appointed jusqu' à autre ordre, till a further order was given. Others have been appointed to the next Chief Pleas. I believe none of those now in office has been appointed for a limited time.

3777. The Contrôle. Those now in office were all appointed jusqu' à autre ordre.

3778. Mr. Falla. They can resign their office whenever they think proper.

3779. The Bailiff. They would apply to the Court to discharge them.

3780. Is the Court bound to discharge them upon their application?—I believe it is so.

3781. Mr. Dobrée. I recollect, when the last Special Constables were sworn in, one of the gentlemen of the Bar was deputed to ask the question for them, whether they would be entitled to their discharge, if circumstances rendered it desirable for them to apply for that purpose. The Court said: Yes; they would be discharged upon their own application.

3782. (To Mr. Falla.) What is the power of the Special Constable?—He has the same power as the assistant Constable.

3783. Have the assistant Constables, as officers of police, the same power as the Constable has?—Yes, as officers of police.

3784. Would a Special Constable or assistant Constable have the power of presenting an offender to the Court?—Yes.

3785. Mr. MacCulloch. With respect to the Police: the harbour masters are sworn also as Special Constables for the harbour and its neighbourhood. And also the keeper of the market for the market; and the sexton is sworn in as Special Constable for the parochial cemetery. These act only within their precincts.

3786. How many harbour masters are there?—There is one at St. Sampson's, and one for the town. Occasionally the Court has sworn a Special Constable to act in the small Island of Herm. At one time there were mines and quarries there, which rendered it necessary for them to do so. The harbour masters receive salaries from the States out of the revenues of the harbour. The market Constable is also paid for collecting certain dues.

3787. How is the market Constable paid? Is it by a fixed salary or by a commission?

3788. Mr. Carré. By a fixed salary.

3789. Mr. MacCulloch. In order to be quite accurate, I should say that it is the deputy harbour master who is sworn Constable of the town harbour.

3790. Mr. Carré. I think it may be as well to observe that the first Special Constables that were named were on account of the necessities of the moment; and they were then appointed for a fixed time. When that time expired they had been found so useful, as an assistant to the Police during the period for which they had been sworn, that they were again presented to the Court by the Constable and sworn jusqu' à autre ordre.

3791. The Constables and assistant Constables act throughout the Island, do not they?—Yes.

3792. Would they act in Herm and Jethou?—If necessary.

3793. So that the assistant Constables would not be confined to St. Peter's Port, but might act in St. Sampson's and St. Martin's?—Yes; every Constable is sworn for the whole Island; and he may act for the whole Island.

3794. Mr. MacCulloch. It is merely a matter of courtesy among themselves that they do not do it.

Charles Lefebvre, Esq.

September 26th, 1846.

Saturday, September 26, 1846.

Charles Lefebvre, Esq., Greffier, examined.

3795. Will you produce to the Commissioners the earliest copy of the Extent referred to in the Précepte d'Assize which you have?—This (producing it) is the earliest copy which we have. No original exists. Sometime ago I was in London: I examined the Office in the Tower, and the Library in Serjeant's Inn in search of the original, but could not find it. This was compiled from various extracts in the possession of individuals in the Island.

3726. What is the date of it?—This appears to have been compiled in the year 1840.

Mr. De Havilland. The earliest copy of the Précepte D'Assize which we have is an Acte of Court, which, of course, like other Actes of Court, must have been entered in the book which is no longer in existence; for all the books anterior to 1527 belonging to the records here have been lost or destroyed.

3708. Or carried off by the monks?—We suppose they may have been so. There have been some traditions that they carried off or burnt some of them; at all events, the earliest record which we have is in 1527. The conclusion which has been always arrived at is that the Précepte D'Assize was an Acte of Court, entered in the book in the usual manner as other Actes of Court, and that, upon some occasion, which from the care with which it is made out was evidently an important one, this copy was made. The last part of it I consider to be merely a declaration, on the part of those who signed it, that the above Acte was true: and that was done in the year 1441. The Acte being entered in the book, of course it need not go beyond that. That was all they wanted: but, when that was required in 1441, then came the latter part added by the people who had signed it. The original we have always considered to have been completed in 1331. It may have been begun before.

The Précepte d'Assize was put in, and is as follows.

Item. Les habitans et demourans en la dicte Isle, Eux et lours prédécessours, onnt en vsage et d'ancienne accoustumance de faire et eslire de eulx mesmes douze hōmes des plus notables et discrets, sages, loyaulx et riches de la dite Isle, lesquels sont jurés et sermentés yllenques par le Baillif de notre dit S$^{r}$ le Roy, qui pour lors exerce le dit office, sauoir est, que bien et loyallement eux recorderont et jugeront selon leurs consciences tous et chūns les cas et causes queulxconques qui par deuant le dit Baillif et eulx en drois seront determinées, lesquels dessus dicts sont appellez Jurez de la Court notre dit S$^{r}$ le Roy, et sont moyen Juges entre nostre dit S$^{r}$ le Roy et ses hommes habitans en la dite Isle, et ont iceulx la cognoissance, juridiction, précognition et jugemens en la compagnie du dit Baillif de toutes matières de causes ciuilles et criminelles eschéantes en la dite Isle toutesfois et quantes, si cōme il est desclary euidentement en l'Estente de nostre dit S$^{r}$ le Roy (excepté toutes fois que, selon l'ancienne accoustumance de la dite Isle, la pugnition de trois certains cas, s'ils écheyent yllenques, sont reservéz par excellence à la Couronne tant soullement, c'est à sauoir, de cas de trayson, le second est de faulx monyours, et le tiers est de mettre et apposer les mains injuriousem$^{t}$ en la personne du dit Baillif, ou d'aucun des dits Jurez en faisans et exerseans lo$^{r}$ office, desquels cas coynoyssance doit estre cognue yllenques, et la pugnition à la dite Coronne cōme sus est dict): et est à sauoir que yceulx douze Jurez, selon l'établissem$^{t}$ de la Coustume de Normandie, sont mis et ordonnez au non et au lieu de quatre Cheualiers, et servent et doivent servir nostre dict S$^{r}$ le Roy et sa Couronne yllenques à leurs propres Coûtages et dépens, sans prendre ne avoir gauges ny pension pecunyelle de notre dit S$^{r}$ le Roy ne sa dicte Commune (excepté tant seullement qu Eulx doibuent auoir es despens de nōtre dit S$^{r}$ le Roy par chūn an trois disgners à trois pleez capitaulx, sauoir est, à Noel, à Pasques, et à la S$^{t}$ Michiel, et semblablement lour disgner toutes fois et quantes qu'eulx font et espurent les taulx des amendes de la Court de notre dit S$^{r}$ le Roy, et auxi semblablement, quans aucun félon abjure et forjure le pays eulx doivent avoir lour disgner, si cōme yl est contenu et exprimé en la dicte Estente de nōtre dict S$^{r}$ le Roy); et sy tost que aulcun d'iceulx Jurez va de vie à trépassement, l'en y ordonne et met ung autre en son lieu, en la fourme et manière comme dessus est dict, et ne peut et aussy ne doit estre aulcun des dits Jurez mis ou déposé hors d'iceluy Office sa vie durante, sy n'est tant seullem$^{t}$ pour deux cas; l'un, s'il est à estre mis et pourveu en l'Office du Bailliff yllenques par l'Ordonnance et constitution de notre dit S^r^ le Roy; et l'autre cas sy est de estre reprins et diffamé de son serment: et doiuent auoir yceulx Jurez la plaine cognoissance des coustumes libertez et ancyens vsages de la dite Isle; et toutes fois et quantes que nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy enuoye ou transmet Justice d'assiser yllenques, les dits douze Jurez seront et doivent estre Juges ensemble en la Compagnie des dits Justices de toutes manières de Causes par devant les dites Justices yllenques pretendues et demonstrées, excepté tant seullement des Jugements que yceulx Jurez auront fait paravant, et qui sont replegiez à l'Assize; es queux cas l'en doibt prendre et avoir autres hommes des plus notables et suffisans de la dite Isle qui, en icelle partie et es cas dessus dits, avec les dits Justices jugeront, à scavoir, si yceulx Jurez auront jugy loyallem^t^ et raisonnablem^t^, selon les anciens usages et coustumes de la dite Isle, lesquels Justices en temps aulcun soulloient venir en la dite Isle de trois ans en trois ans, et yllenques et pour lors auoyent la cognoissance de toutes manières de cas replagiez à l'assise, en la forme et manière comme devant est dit, et pour que, selon les Coustumes libertés et anciens usages accoustumés en la dite Isle, iceux-manière d'aplegements, de queulx condition queulx fussent ou peussent être, doiuent point estre determinez hors de la dite Isle, sinon par l'assent de parties litigeuses.

Item. Notre dit Sire le Roy commet et ordonne à tels comme il lui plaist la garde, gouvernance et tuÿon de sa dite Isle, et de ses chasteaux et forteresses yllenques; et incontinent et sy tost que eux ont remontré et fait exposer leur Comissions de la dite garde par deuant les dits Bailliff et Jurez, eux sont sermentés et jurez sur sainctes Evangilles par les dits Baillif et Jurez en la fourme et manière quy ensuit, cest à sauoir que, entant cõme en eulx est et que à lour office touche et apartient, eux soustendront, maintendront et garderont bonnement et loyallement les dit chateaux et forteresses en l'obéisance de notre dit S^r^ le Roy, et les dites Communes et habitans de la dite Isle en lour bonne et vraye ligeance, et semblablement en lours libertez vsages et anciennes coustumes; et sy aucunenm^t^ par ignorance ou autrement eulx ou aulcun d'eulx faissoient ou erroient au contraire, que par yceulx auant dits Bailliff et Jurez seroyent radrechiés et reparés, toutes fois et quantes qu' eulx en seroyent premunis et guarnis. Et aussy fait et ordonne notre dit S^r^ le Roy ses autres officiers, ceulx cõme il luy plaist, en ses dits chasteaux et forteresses, lesquels sont jurez et sermentez en la forme et manière comme dessus est declary. Et en outre constitue et ordonne nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy ses autres Officiers de sa Cour Royalle yllenques, c'est à savoir, son Clercq, son Receueur, son Procureur et son Bedel, lesquels prennent et apperceuent annullem^t^ pensions de nostre dit S^r^ le Roy pour lours offices, et semblablement fait et ordonne ses Bordyers et Sergeants, lesquels onnt pour lours offices certaines terres fieffées et anciennem^t^ ordonnées, lesquels officiers sunt sermentés, comme dessus par les avant dit Baillif et Jurez, chũn selon ce que à son Office compete et apartient, et cõme il est de necessité qu' eux soient gens suffisans et dignes de records.

Item. Les habitans et demourans en la dite Isle ordonnement et esluyssent de eux mesme un Sergeant, appelé le Prevost du Roy, qui fait les arrests et impeschements, et les delivrances en la dite Isle, et tient veues et baille saisines d'héritage par les regards et commandm^ts^ des dit Baillif et Jurez, et est, souvent fois et plusiours, partie en la Cour de notre dit S^r^ le Roy pour les causes des defaillans et absens, et fait plusiours autres choses aparten^t^ à son dit Office, et doit estre hõme raisonable et suffisant, et prent et appercet annuellem^t^ fieu et pension de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy à cause de son Office, si cõme il appert et est declary plus playnement en la dite Estente de nr̃e dict S^r^ le Roy.

Item. Les dits habitans et demourans en la dite Isle font et ordeinent de eulx mesmes, et de vng de tenants de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy yllenques, ung officier, appellé le Granger du Roy, lequel Granger leve et assemble et respond es mynistres de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy en la dite Isle des forments et avoynes deues à nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy sur ses hommes et tenants yllenques, pour lequel Granger dessus dit les dits hommes et tenants de nostre dit S^r^ le Roy doivent et sont tenus respondre et faire bons pour luy, en cas qu'il n'auroit de quoy respondre du tort fait en son Office.

Item. Les dits habitans et demourans en la dite Isle hõmes liges de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy ne sont tenus et auxi ne doiuent estre constraincts ou compellés par aulcun brief de Roy ny autirment pour cause quiconques de yssir ne aller hors de la dict Ysle, sy n'est par assent des parties. La cause pourquoy sy est par une composition de certaine somme de monoye c'est à sauoir la sõme de sexante neuf liures trois soulx et onze deniers tournois, que les dits habitans et demourans en la dite Isle payent illenques par chũn an, annuelle rente es ministres et officiers de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy, à troys termes par egalles portions. Et fut cette présente composition faite par nr̃e Souverain S^r^ le Roy de Angleterre, Duc de Normandie, qui pour le temps estoit, à ses hõmes et habitans de la dicte Isle, qui pour lors et adoncques remontrerent à nr̃e dit S^r^ le Roy et à son noble et droiturel Conseil, comment la dicte Ysle de Guernezey estoit une Ysle tout par soy enclose de mer de toutes parts loyng des parties de son Royaulme et proes et environnée des terres de lours anemys et adv̄saires, et ovequez ce que les Justices d'assises yllenques transmis et enuoyés par nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy peuvent enquerir et faire pugnition yllenques, en la manière que deuant est dict, des trespas et transgressions faits, et p̃petrés yllenques, jouste et selon les usages de la dite Isle. Et noyent-moins, si nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy vouloit auoir de ses gents habitans et demourants en la dite Isle, soient mariniers vers l'anemy par la mer ou aultres, yl les peut et doit auoir toutes fois et quantes par poyans leurs gages raisonables, non obstant la dite composition de la rente auant dite, laquelle rente est appellée ferme ou ayde de Roy.

Item. Les dits habitans et tenans de nostre dit S^r^ le Roy yllenques doiuent et sunt tenus passer et porter en l'Isle de Jersé le Capitaine d'yllenques, ou son Lieuten^t^, ou aulcun autre Messager de par Nostre dit S^r^ le Roy en un batel ou Nauire de semonce, toutes fois et quantes, à lours propres coustages et depens, excepté que ceulx quy feront yceluy labour doiuent auoir pour chūn viage chinks soulx tournois, vallant deulx gros d'Angleterre, ou lours disgners pour lour trauail, selon ce qu'il a été usé et accoustumé en la dicte Isle dancien temps. Et pour ce que nostre dit S^r^ le Roy, Duc de Normandie, comme dessus est dit, de laquelle Duché la dite Isle de Guernezey est parcelle et dépendance, yl voulut conceda et octroya de sa Royalle Ma^je^ et benigne Grace à ses dits hom̄es et tenans de sa dite Isle, que Eulx usassent, rejoyssent et playnement et paysiblement des libertés usages et anciennes coûtumes dont eulx et lours p'edessessours avoyent jadys et anciennem^t^ usé, par la maniere que deuant est dit, yssir ny aller hors de la dite Ysle par appellation ny aultremt, en maniere quelconque, excepté pour prendre et auoir lours gages de nōtre dit S^r^ le Roy com̄e dessus est dit, pour cause que ancyennement les appellations et applegements de la dite Duché de Normandie estoient et soulloient estre determinés entierem^t^ à l'Esquer à Rouen; sy ne voulut point souffrir Nostre dit S^r^ le Roy, Duc de Normandie, comme dessus est dit, nostre Souverain et liege Seigneur, que jamés ses dits hommes subjects et lieges fussent et deussent estre constraincts et compellez par aulcun bref de Roy, ne aultrem^t^, yssir ne aller hors de la dite ysle, mès accorda et conseda yceluy noble Roy, que tous les cas dessus dits fussent et deussent estre cogneus mis à fin et determinés en la dite Isle par deuant les Justices de Nostre dit Souverain S^r^ le Roy yllecques transmis et mandés avec les douze Jurez de la dicte Isle, quy cognoissent et sayuent les accoustumances et anciens vsages de la dicte Isle.

Item. Est accoustumé et vsé d'ancien temps en la dicte Isle, que les dits Baillif et Jurez visitent et survoyent les chasteaux et fortresses de nostre dit S^r^ le Roy yllenques, toutes fois et quantes que necessité et besoing en est, et que le cas le requert jouste, et selon lours bonnes discretions, afin et pour cause que yceulx chasteaux et forteresses soyent et doyent estre bien et suffisament reparés, garnis, fournis et estoffés tant de souldeyers, canons, pouldres de canon, que d'aultres hernois et abillements de guerre à ce propres et necessaires, et tout pour cause de les tenir et garder en la bonne obéissance et subjection de nostre dit S^r^ le Roy; et si ainsin estoit que les dit chasteaux et fortresses ne fussent bien et raisonablment estoffés et garnis, comme dessus est dit, emprés les dites visitation et surveue, yceulx mesme Baillif et Jurez ont accoustumé de charger et faire commandem^t^ exprès de par nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy es capitaines, gardes, et Gouvernors des dites places yllenques, sur lour ligence et einsin com̄e eulx en vouldront respondre devant nostre dit S^r^ le Roy, que à toute haste et possible diligence ylx mettent et fassent mettre promptem^t^ et sans delay les dessus dictes places et fortresses en bonne deue et suffisante reparaōn de toutes manieres d'estoffes et garnisons à ce requises propres et necessaries, comme dessus est declary. Consideré toutesfois que le chastel Cornet quy est la principalle garde et fortresse de la dicte Isle de Guernezey est separé hors d'avecques la dite Isle et enclos environné de mer tout attour, et si ainsin estoit que les anemis et adversaires de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy veinssent assailler et mettre siège deuant le dit chastel, il ne pouroit estre secouru de ceulx de la dite Isle pour cause de la mer, quy est entre deux. Et la principale cause fut pour ce que aultre fois, deuant ces houres, le dit chatel de Cornet, par la deffaute du captaine quy pour le temps estoit et des abillements et aultres estoffes de guerre à ce propres, requises et necessaires pour resister et obvier contre les ennemis et adversaires de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy, par force et de fait fut prins et mys es mains et en la dommacōn des dits anemis et adversaires; et par enprès dedans bref et puy de temps fut conquis et remis en la bonne et vroye obeissance de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy, par la prouesse et bonne diligence des dessus dits liges et habitans de la dite Isle de Guernezey, et partant et pour ycelle cause a voulu concedey et granté nostre dit S^r^ le Roy que tous dies dempuis, et toutes fois et quantes, comme dessus est dit et desclary, les dits chasteaux et fortresses soyent et doyent estre de fait visitees et surveues par les avant dits Bailiff et Jurez, com̄e dessus est dit, laquelle chose a èté, tous dies, et encore est, mayntenue et contynue en celle fourme.

Item. Est accoustumé et usé d'ancien temps en la dicte Isle, que len ne peut appeller ne apleger à l'assise de trois cas. Le premier est de fait jugé et escript et seelé soubs le seel de la juridicōn Royalle de la dite Isle. Le second est, de rentes et redevances deues à Saincte Eglise. Et le tiers est de partage d'héritage d'entre frères et soeurs. Et la cause et principalle raison, que si einsin estoit que ycelles dictés trois causes eussent lieu et efficace d'avoir lours cours par manière et forme d'appellation à l'assise et que len le vousist souffrir, jameys hōme lige de nôtre dit S^r^ le Roy en la dite Isle ne pouroit avoer execution ne definiction de cause par voie de droit, si ainsin estoit que parties vousissent debatre à l'encontre, si sur ce nestoit pourveu de remède plus convenable, pour ce que selon les dits anciens vsages du pays les dites assises souloient anciennem^t^ venir en la dite Isle de trois ans en trois ans, com̄e dessus dit et declary.

De laquelle Grace especialle de nôtre dit Souverain S^r^ le Roy, et des libertés, usages, et anciennes coustumes de la dite Isle de Gnernezey, ainsin grantées concedées et vsées en la forme et manière comme dessus dit, les hom̄es liges subgés et habitans en la dite Isle onnt usé et resjoy tous dies plainement et paisiblement d'empuis le conquest d'Angleterre, eux et lours predecessours, et onnt esté toujours dempuis ratefiées et confermées par tous les nobles Rois dudit Roialme d'Angleterre qui dempuis ont esté jusques au jourdui, et gardées et maintenues paisiblem^t^ en tous temps sans contradiction ou impeschement quelconques.

Lesquelles choses et chacunes d'icelles einsin et en la forme et manière com̄e dessus sont exposées et declaries, Nous avant dit Bailiff et Jurez de la dite Isle de Guernezey, ovesques l'approbation des signes manueulx des Nottaires publiques et Tabellions dessus dicts, et semblablement les raports des loyalles enquestes dessus dictes; certifions et tesmoignons estre vroies par ces présentes. En tesmoins desquelles choses et chacune d'icelles le Seel de la Baillie de la dite Isle de Guernezey, ovesques l'appension des Seaulx des auant dits Bailif et Jurez de la dite Isle et les passemens des dits Nottaires et Tabellions dessus dicts à ces présentes Lettres, est mis et appendu en signe et temognance de verité et de loyaulté. Fait et donné en la dite Ysle de Guernezey, cõme dessus est dict, le deroin jour du mois de Séptembre l'an de Grâce mil quatre-cents quarante-ung, présents à ce Sire Jeahen Revel and Sire Laurens Guyott Prestres, Guille de Beauver, Colin au Petit. et Jehens Perin, avec plusieurs aultres tesmoings dignes de foy appelles et requises es choses dessus dictes.

L'an de Grâce mil quatre cents quatre vingt neuf, le xxx[e] jour du mois de Septembre, Collacion a este foette à l'original par nous, Nicholas Effard, Lieutenant de Johan Blondel, Bailiff de notre Souverain Seignour le Roy d'Angleterre en la dite Isle de Guernezey, présents à ce, Pierre le Marchant, John Martin, Nicolas de Garis, Thomas de Saumarez, James du Port, Simon Ethur, et Michiel de Rozel, Jurez de la Court nostre dit Souverain Seigneur le Roy en la dite Isle, et auons trouué ces présentes accordantes au dit original, sans rien adder en manière quy varie ne change entendment, porquoy nous avons seelé cettes présentes du seel de l'office de la Ballye de la dite Isle, l'an et le jour dessus dicts. Copie tirée et collationnée de la copie de l'original seelée du seau du Bailliage de cette Isle de Guernezey par nous sousignés, Lieutenant Bailly et Jurez de la Cour Royalle de la sudite Isle, ce xxiij[e] Jour du mois de Septembre, l'an mille six-cents quatre-vingts et treize, l'an cinque du Regne de nos Souverains Guillaume et Marie par la Grace de Dieu Roy et Reine d'Angleterre, d'Escosse, France et Irelande, Défenseurs de la foy, &c. En temoignage et verité de quoy le seau du Balliage de la dite Isle à ces présentes est mis et appendu.

3799. This appears to be a certificate by the Royal Court of the date of the 30th of Sept. 1441, setting forth certain inquests held in the several parishes of the Island, which find all and every the liberties usages and ancient customs of the Isle of Guernsey held and kept fully and peaceably in all their times and that of their predecessors, stating them to correspond with those approved before the Justices in 5th of Edward III., 1331, and set forth in an Instrument called the Extent.—Yes. The origin of the Précepte d'Assize, as I have always viewed, is this. From the time of Henry III., Edward I., and II., and even in the beginning of the reign of Edward III., Commissioners were sent here. They came every three years when they could; sometimes perhaps not so often. Not knowing the customs and usages of the Island, their decisions were always at fault, and a great number of complaints were made, which were at last gathered together, and Sir Henry Spigurnell and the individuals named in the Précepte d'Assize, were sent, in the 17th of Edward II., to examine into those decisions. They declared them to be of none effect, and that the inhabitants of the Island continued in the enjoyment of their liberties and privileges as fully as before those processes and decisions had taken place. But, as their judgment did not declare what those liberties and privileges were, but only that the inhabitants possessed the right of enjoying them, annulling the old proceedings which had been in opposition to them, that was the origin of the Précepte d'Assize. The Court then set to work to have them laid down and approved by Sir Henry Spigurnell and his associates, and to have them after approved by those different commissions in Eyre named in the instrument just produced. We do not know that they have ever been approved by any higher authority; but we have reason to believe that they became known in England either by this or by some other instrument, because we find them recited individually.

3800. Does the extent date itself?—Yes, it dates itself as being in the reign of Edward III.; " Faicte l'an du Regne du Roy Edward le tiers depuis le conquest cinquieme."

3801. You would not refer to the Extent, would you, for anything touching the rights and privileges of the island?—No; the Extent refers to nothing but the revenues and property of the Crown.

3802. (To. Mr. Lefebvre.) Will you give the Commissioners an instance of the form in which the records of criminal proceedings are at present entered, both à l'ordinaire and à l'extraordinaire?—The following is the entry of a case à l'ordinaire; it is the case of Mary Winter, charged with robbery in October, 1845. The first entry is the acte of accusation, and the order to the Crown Officers to prosecute.

The same is read as follows.

Marie Winter, fille de Richard, de la ville et paroisse de St. Pierre Port, ayant été produite devant la Cour par le ministère de Mr. Josué Ahier, un des connétables de la ville et paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, étant accusée d'avoir, soit seule ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, le 25[me] Septembre, 1845, ou environ, pris volé et emporté hors d'un appartement dans une maison, apartenant aux héretiers de feu Mr. Pierre Vaudin, et située dans la rue des Cornets en la dite paroisse, le dit appartement occupé par Rachel Du Four, Veuve du Sieur James Hayward et sa famille, un chale de soie noire appartenant à Sophie Hayward, et lequel dit chale a été trouvé dans la possession de la dite Winter. Item d'avoir, le 22[me] Septembre, 1845 ou environ, soit seule ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, pris volé et emporté hors d'une maison occupée par le Sieur William Pearce, et située a Vauvert en la dite paroisse, deux verres à boire, Anglicè, "tumblers," appartenant au dit Pearce, qui étaient exposés dans le portail de la dite maison pour être vendu, et lesquels dits verres à boire, Anglicé "tumblers," ont été trouvés dans la possession de la dite Winter; la Cour, après avoir pris par écrit l'interrogatoire de la dite Winter et entendu des témoins dignes de foi, a ordonné qu'elle sera constituée prisonnière dans la prison publiques pour que les officiers de la Reine informent contre elle.

3803. Mr. Lefebvre. The second stage of the proceedings is the plea of the accused, and the choice of a counsel to defend her.

The same is read as follows.

Les officiers de la Reine prouveront les fins de l'action qu'ils ont contre Marie Winter, fille de Richard, de la ville et paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, prisonnière dans la prison publique, à se voir adjugée à telle peine punition ou châtiment corporel que la Cour trouvera condigne, pour avoir, la dite Winter, soit seule ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, le 25e Septembre, 1845, ou environ, pris volé et emporté hors d'un appartement dans une maison appartenante aux héritiers de feu Mr. Mr. Pierre Vaudin, et située dans la Rue des Cornets en la dite paroisse, le dit appartenante occupé par Rachael Duport veuve du Sieur James Hayward et sa famille, un chale de soie noir appartenant à Sophie Hayward, et le quel dit chale a été trouvé dans la possession de la dite Winter: Item, d'avoir le 22e Septembre, 1845 ou environ, soit seule ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, pris, volé et emporté hors d'une maison occupée par le Sieur William Pearce et située à Vauvert en la dite paroisse deux verres à boire, Anglicè "tumblers," appartenante au dit Pearce, qui étaitent exposés dans le portail de la dite maison pour être vendus, et lesquels dits verres à boire, Anglicè "tumblers," out été trouvés dans la possession de la dite Winter, le tout à l'infraction des loix, trouble de l'ordre public, et leur payer leurs dépens. Après que la dite Winter a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime, et a fait choix de l'avocat Falla pour son conseil."

3804. Mr. Lefebvre. The following is the entry of the trial.

The same was read as follows.

"Sur l'action des officiers de la Reine contre Marie Winter, fille de Richard, de la ville et paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, prisonnière dans la prison publique a soutenir leur preuve en la cause qu'ils ont contre la dite Marie Winter, à se voir adjugée à telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel, que la Cour trouvera condigne, pour avoir, la dite Marie Winter, soit seule ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, le 25e Septembre, 1845, ou environ, pris volé et emporté hors d'un appartement dans une maison appartenante aux héritiers de feu M. Pierre Vaudin et située dans la rue des Cornets en la dite paroisse, le dit appartement occupé par Rachel Du Four, veuve du Sieur James Hayward et sa famille, un chale de soie noir appartenant à Sophie Hayward et lequel dit chale a été trouvé dans la possession de la dite Winter. Item, d'avoir le 22e Septembre, 1845, ou environ, soit seule ou avec autre son complice, ou autres ses complices, pris volé et emporté hors d'une maison, occupée par le Sieur William Pearce et située à Vauvert en la dite paroisse, deux verres à boire, Anglicè "tumblers," appartenant au dit Pearce, qui étaient exposés dans le portail de la dite maison pour être vendus, et les quels dits verres à boire, Anglicè "tumblers," ont été trouvés dans la possession de la dite Winter, le tout à l'infraction des loix, trouble de l'ordre public, et leur payer leurs dépens, aux fins d'acte du 18e Octobre, 1845. Est la dite Winter condamnée à un mois d'imprisonment dans la prison publique, au secret au pain et à l'eau, à trois ans de bannissement hors de ce Baillage, et aux frais, après avoir entendu les témoins des dits officiers de la Reine."

3805. Mr. Lefebvre. The next I have is a case à l'extraordinaire. The case of James White, alias Michael Ryan, accused of having feloniously killed a sheep. As in the former case, he is first committed for trial, and the Crown Officers ordered to prosecute.

The entry was read as follows.

"James White, alias Michael Ryan, fils de William, de la paroisse de Eastbourne, dans le Comté de Sussex, en Angleterre, ayant été ce jour produit devant la Cour par le ministère de Monsr. Jean Roussel, un des assistans de connétable de la ville et paroisse de St. Pierre Port, étant accusé d'avoir, soit seul ou avec autre son complices ou autres ses complices, le 16me d'Octobre, 1838, ou environ, aux Amballes, en la dite paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, félonieusement tué, pris, volé & emporté une brebis appartenante au Sieur Pierre Waterman, qui était dans un courtil situé aux Amballes, en la dite paroisse de St. Pierre Port, occupé par le dit Pierre Waterman: Item, d'avoir, le dit White, alias Ryan, ou complices, le dit jour 16me Octobre, 1838, ou environ, blessé une autre brebis appartenante au dit Waterman, qui était dans le dit courtil, situé aux Amballes occupé par le dit Waterman. La Cour, après avoir pris par écrit l'interrogatoire du dit White, et entendu des témoins dignes de foi, a ordonné qu'il sera constitué prisonnier dans la prison publique, pour que les Officiers de la Reine informent contre lui."

3806. Mr Lefebvre. The following is the entry of the plea and the choice of counsel.

The same was read as follows.

"Les Officiers de la Reine prouveront les fins de l'action qu'ils ont contre James White, alias Michael Ryan, fils de William, de la paroisse de Eastbourne, dans la Comté de Sussex en Angleterre, prisonnier dans la prison publique, à se voir adjugé aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix, pour avoir, le dit White, alias Ryan, soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, le 16me d'Octobre, 1838, ou environ, aux Amballes en la paroisse de St. Pierre Port, félonieusement tué pris, volé et emporté une brebis appartenante au Sieur Pierre Waterman, qui était dans un courtil situé aux Amballes, en la dite paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, occupé par le dit Pierre Waterman. Item, d'avoir, de plus, le dit White, alias Ryan, ou complices, le dit jour 16me Octobre 1838, ou environ, blessé une autre brebis, appartenante au dit Waterman, qui était dans le dit courtil situé aux Amballes, occupé par le dit Waterman, et leur payer leur dépens, après que le dit White, alias Ryan, a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime et a fait choix de l'avocat Falla pour son conseil.

3807. Mr. Lefebvre. The following is the entry of the trial.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

September 28th, 1846.

Monday, September 28, 1846.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine, further examined.

3810. The Commissioners were inquiring the other day into the power of the Crown Officers to act without the intervention of the Court in certain cases. They understand that, in the case of a supposed libel against a former Governor, the question was argued, but finally the Court ruled that the Crown Officer could do it?—That was before my time. I was not Crown Officer at that time. By my note I find that, on the 1st Oct., 1819, Mr. Henry Brouard, for a libel against the Governor, was actioned, and was obliged to give bail of 100*l.*, that he would answer the criminal action that would be entered against him.

3812. Did any argument arise upon it?—I should think not. It might have been argued in this way. After the accusation was entered, when the action came before the Court and Mr. Brouard had chosen his counsel, his counsel might argue that this was an improper way of putting the accusation, as it was properly a cause en adjonction which ought to have been entered in the name of General Bayly et les officiers du Roi joints.

3813. Mr. MacCulloch. I believe the Commissioners will find that it was argued, and that the Court admitted the action.

3814. The Procureur. I find, on the 11th December, this entry. "La cause des officiers du Roi contre Sieur Henri Brouard, éditeur et imprimeur de la Gazette dite, 'The Star or Guernsey Weekly Advertiser,' à se voir adjuger à telle peine punition ou amende que la Cour trouvera condigne, pour avoir, le dit Brouard, soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, méchamment injurié libellé et diffamé son Excellence, Monsieur le Major Général Bayly, Lieutenant Gouverneur de cette Ile, par l'insertion du libelle suivant dans sa dite Gazette, à la date du 21e Septembre, 1819," &c. "A été remise après les chefs Plaids de Noël prochain, pour plaider au fonds et entendre la conclusion des officiers du Roi, après que la Cour a jugé que la cause est bien entrée et a réjetté la fin de non recevoir proposé par le dit Brouard."

3815. The decision that the cause was properly entered, was a decision upon the point whether it should be en adjonction or not?—Yes.

3816. Mr. MacCulloch. In the case of the Crown Lawyers and De Courcy against Mauger, the point decided was that, if the case be put as a criminal case, it should be by Order of the Court for the Crown officers to inform; and, if put as a cause en adjonction, it ought to conclude à obtenir réparation, &c., and not à se voir adjuger à telle peine, &c.

3817. (The Acte of Court in De Courcy's case was put in and is as follows:) "L'action de Maurice de Courcy, Ecr., Capitaine à demie solde du 97e Regiment d'Infanterie, et officiers du Roi joints contre Sieur Nicholas Mauger, imprimeur du Fanal, Gazette de Guernsey, Journal politique et littéraire, à se voir ajuger à telle peine ou amende que la Cour trouvera condigne, pour avoir, le dit Mauger, soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou autresses complices, méchamment injurié libellé et diffamé le dit Maurice De Courcy par l'insertion et publication de deux libelles, l'un dans la dite Gazette à la date du 27e November, 1824, dont la teneur suit,"—then follow the libels, "les dits libelles étant en contravention aux loix et tendant à ternir le caractère du dit Maurice De Courcy, et à interrompre la paix et tranquilité publique, et leur payer leur dépens, a été rejettée, étant irregulière, et sont le dit Maurice De Courcy et les dits officiers du Roi joints aux fraix."

3818. Mr. MacCulloch. The following is the form of an action en adjonction. "A. B. [plaintiff] et officiers de la Reine joints actionnent C. D. à ouir sa plainte et déclaration, d' avoir été, le dit A. B., grièvement libellé ou calomnié, ou battu, ou maltraité" (as the case may be) "par le dit C. D., le dit C. D. ayant," [done so and so], "et le voir en obtenir réparation condigne avec dépens." This shows that the pleadings in Mr. De Courcy's case were irregular in commencing in the form of a cause en adjonction, and concluding in the ordinary form of a criminal prosecution.

3819. (To the Bailiff.) Do the States in their elective form do any thing except elect?—No; except in the case of imposing a tax exceeding one penny per quarter, as regulated by the law approved by the Order in Council of the 13th December, 1844.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

September 28th, 1846.

3820. (To the Procureur.) What is the length of service of a Douzenier?—A Douzenier is elected for life; but, in the case of every charge publique which is compulsory, a person is entitled to his discharge at the age of sixty.

3821. Under what circumstances must the constable have a prise de corps? We understand that, in the first instance, he arrests on suspicion: within what time is he obliged to bring the party before the Court?—In the first instance, the constable secures the person of the accused. He is obliged to report to the Bailiff and to the Crown lawyers with all convenient speed. That has been understood by some to mean within twenty four hours, and by others within twice twenty four hours. He is obliged to report what he has done, and take their directions.

3822. In the meanwhile, has the constable the accused in his actual custody?—Yes.

3823*a*. Is he confined in the lock-up house?—That is not what we call it. It is a constable's room in the gaol. It is, in fact, the same as a lock-up house in England.

3824. That, of course, would not come into action when the officer begins by seizing the accused?—No; of course not.

3825. Do you think the rule, that a constable ought not to keep a person in arrest more than twenty four or forty eight hours, is generally observed?—I should imagine that, in all serious accusations, it is observed, as far as I know. But, in the event of a constable taking up a man drunk, he is sometimes put in the lock-up house, and when he becomes sober he is let out.

3826. Is that strictly legal?—I can only answer that by saying that, in the case of a man who has not committed any serious crime, but is put in for drunkenness, for example, it has been done, I believe, from time immemorial.

3827. Do you recollect the case of a lad of the name of Long?—Yes.

3828. How long was he kept in confinement?—I think he must have been kept about six days.

3829. That would exceed the time of getting sober?—I think that on the Thursday he was taken by the constable, and let out six days afterwards; that is the impression on my mind.

3830. Is there any action here corresponding to our action for false imprisonment?—For any wrong which is committed in that way, the remedy is a cause en adjonction:

3831. Do you think Long had a remedy in that case by a cause en adjonction against the constable who shut him up?—Yes; there was a cause entered.

3832. A cause en adjonction?—Yes.

3833. Could there have been any purely criminal proceedings against the constable?—I should apprehend that, in that case, if there was a question purely criminal, in which the man imprisoned was admitted as a witness, there are doubts whether he could enter a cause en adjonction for damages.

3834. In the case of a constable doing an act of the kind which has been supposed, could there be a purely criminal proceeding against him?—I should suppose there might be a purely criminal proceeding; but, in that case, there would be no cause en adjonction.

3835. There could not be both?—No. Perhaps I may illustrate it better by stating what is often done. A person is assaulted; the person who has been assaulted may have the matter brought before the Court and disposed of summarily; but, in that case, he receives no part of the fine; or he may enter a cause en adjonction, in which case he may have damages awarded to him.

3836. Is your law such that a constable is liable to a criminal prosecution or an action for keeping a man six days in prison?—Yes; a person who had suffered wrong might have his remedy either by bringing a criminal action, or a cause en adjonction.

3837. Are there any means of bringing such a case before the Court?—If it comes to the knowledge of the Crown lawyers or to the Court that cruelty or oppression has been used, notice would be taken of it. Perhaps I may make myself better understood by supposing a case. A constable, without any cause, puts a person in prison and allows him to remain there eight or ten days. He complains of it; and it comes to the ears of the Crown lawyers: I should consider it their duty to bring the business before the Court. If it came to the ears of the Court that there had been oppression or ill conduct, I think the Court would direct the Crown lawyers to give orders to the constables to have the matter brought before them.

3838. The Bailiff. I apprehend, when there has been any misconduct on the part of the constable, the only authorities that can interfere are those who can act judicially. There is no officer authorized to act ministerially in such a case.

3839. (To the Procureur.) Do you recollect whether, in Long's case, any notice was taken?—I think not, with the exception of the cause en adjonction.

3840. Probably, if a cause en adjonction were instituted, the Court would think itself relieved from the duty of inquiring into it further?—Yes.

3841. Did you act in Long's case?—Yes; and Mr. Utermark who was then an advocate acted with me. I think Long was nonsuited.

3842. Do you recollect the point on which he was nonsuited?—The witnesses were heard; and it was upon the evidence.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

September 28th, 1846.

3843. (To M. Le Retilley.) Do you recollect that case?—I have a faint recollection of the case. I believe the facts to be these. Long was lying down in the street during the snow; it was in fact an act of humanity to take him up. When he was taken up, he assaulted the constable and the persons who assisted him, violently. The constable said he had the greatest difficulty in securing him.

3845. Mr. Andros. The constable, after having taken this person into custody, informed the Procureur. The Procureur, when he was first brought before the Court, could not recollect it; but he afterwards admitted it. He met the Procureur in the street and informed him of his having taken Long into custody, and his having heard that he had a gun in his possession, and had committed an assault upon some person. In such a case, the Procureur would tell him "bring him up the next police day." It happened that the constable on the Wednesday was ill; he had been attended by a surgeon for several days. He wrote to the gaoler to say he was too ill to bring this man before the Court, and that he might let him out. Long was very glad to get out in that way, and was let out. He then brought an action against the constable for having improperly put him into prison, and having kept him there improperly; not for not having brought him before the magistrate. The Court thought he had nothing to complain of. He brought his action en adjonction for damages, not to vindicate the law. The Court thought that he had no action for damages; and, under all the circumstances, the constable having acted bonâ fide, without any malice, and very far from a desire to press hardly upon the man, they would not give him any damages.

3846. Your view is, that, though the constable had technically acted illegally, the Court would not allow the action en adjonction, because they thought there was no mischief done?—Yes; and he had given notice to the Procureur. There was some doubt about the fact; but it afterwards appeared to be so. Technically, no doubt, the constable would be wrong: but, the man having brought his action for damages and for a fine to the Queen, the Court thought there was no ground for damages.

3847. The Procureur. Mr. Andros has mentioned, that the constable gave me notice. I do not deny it. I believe this was what passed. He said, he had the man in a cart; that the man had behaved very ill. I happened to pass through the streets; and he told me what he had done, I dare say that is quite correct.

3848. When you speak of the constable keeping the man in his custody twenty four or forty eight hours, does that mean without notice to the Crown Officers?—Yes. Twenty four hours is the time, according to my view.

3849. Are the Commissioners to understand your previous evidence, as to the general practice, to be that, at the end of the twenty four hours, notice is to be given to the Crown Officers, or to the Crown Officers and Court?—Notice must be given to the Bailiff and to the Crown Officers, that a man has been taken up and lodged in the lock-up house under such a charge.

3850. To both the Bailiff and the Crown Officers?—Yes; that is the strict rule.

3851. Supposing you had had formal notice that there was a charge of drunkenness and assault, would the man have been kept in prison till the next Court?—In a case of aggravated assault, I certainly would have told the constable to mention it to the Bailiff; and, if the thing had been a very serious matter, I should have thought myself authorised, subject of course to the Bailiff's opinion, to say that my opinion was that he ought to be brought up the next day the Court met.

3852. For mere drunkenness you hardly would do that, perhaps?—For mere drunkenness the constable puts him in, and, when he is sober, lets him out.

3853. Would you have advised his detention for a week upon any offence so trivial that the constable upon his own authority would be justified in letting him out afterwards?—I think, in that particular case, strictly speaking, the constable ought to have mentioned it to the Crown Officers and to the Bailiff before he let him out.

3854. How could the Bailiff or the Crown Lawyers, after he was once in the hands of justice with a view of being brought up upon a charge, whether trivial or heavy, have authorised the dismissing him altogether?

3855. The Bailiff. He is warned to appear the next Court day, Instead of an arrest it becomes a summons. In a great many cases persons are taken up by a constable. They give notice to the Crown Officers and the Bailiff; and it is in the discretion of those functionaries whether they shall be detained in custody till Thursday or not; and that depends upon many circumstances. It depends upon the nature of the offence, the length of time before the next Thursday, and the probability of the man's escaping.

3856. It would be turning the confinement into a summons to appear?—Yes.

3857. With or without bail?—We take no bail in such a case. I should say the three ingredients would be the nature of the offence, the length of time he would be in custody to the next Thursday, and the probability of his appearing or not.

3858. Of course there could be no absolute liberation of the man in any such case?—No.

3859. You do not recognise the arbitrary discretion of the constable either to keep or to dismiss?—I do not negative it; nor do I assert it.

3860. The Commissioners wish rather to know what the particular limits of the discretion are?—In every case which is reported to me, if it is a trivial case, I say to the constable, "Let the party out and summon him to attend."

3861. As to the law upon the subject, the Commissioners understand you to reserve your opinion?—Yes.

3862. (To the Procureur.) You think, do you not, that the constable has no discretion to let a person out of prison after he has once been taken up by him on a criminal charge?—For drunkenness it has always been considered that a constable had the right.

3863. You take drunkenness as a special case, where a constable has a right to imprison a man till he is sober and then let him out. In the case of a charge for any offence, do you think the constable has any such discretionary power?—No.

3864. The Contrôle. The only discretion the constable has is, if there is any disorder, he may put a man in gaol for a few hours or for the night. That is the only discretion he has.

3865. The Bailiff. That is the only case to which my observation and my doubt applied.

3866. The Contrôle. The only correction I would make in the statement made, as to the facts in Long's case, is this. It appeared that this man had struck one blow.

3867. How long before he was taken up?—Immediately before. It was upon that, the coustable was sent for.

3869. "Joseph Long a été adjugé à la folle adjonction et aux fraix en la cause que le dit Long et Officiers de la Reine joints ont contre Mr. George Payne, ci-devant assistant de connétable de la ville et paroisse de St. Pierre Port, à ouir leur plainte et déclaration d'avoir été, le dit Long, grandement maltraité par le dit Payne, au dit nom, le six Mars, 1845, ou environ, le dit Mr. Payne, au dit nom, ayant saisi le dit Long et l'ayant conduit en prison, où il fut enfermé jusqu'au douzième du dit mois et an, et ce sans raisons suffisantes, pendant tout lequel tems le dit Long fut gardé dans un appartement sans feu, à la grande souffrance du dit Long et sans aucune provocation de sa part. Et les voir en obtenir réparation condigne avec dépens aux fins d'Acte du 17e Mai, 1845, après avoir entendu les témoins de part et d'autre." I recollect, on pleading for the plaintiff, I cited the different orders in Council and ordinances of the Court, defining what the powers of the constable were. They were an ordinance of the 4th of October, 1776, an ordinance of September, 1799, and an order in Council of the 24th of May, 1826.

3870. Of how many Jurats did the Court consist?—Of ten Jurats. They were unanimously in favour of a nonsuit, or giving a verdict for the defendant. The main questions were these: First, whether he was properly put into prison at the first; the second point was, whether the formalities required by law had been fulfilled by Mr. Payne, the constable.

3871. Formalities in reference to what?—To the detention. On the first point, the Court ruled that, the man having committed an assault, and being in a state of drunkenness, the constable was justified in putting him in prison. The second point was with regard to the formalities. One or two witnesses proved having seen Mr. Payne speaking to the Procureur on the subject in the street on the very day; and the Court then considered that his having mentioned it to the Procureur relieved Mr. Payne from responsibility. With regard to the case itself, the ground taken by the Court was that, from the facts before them, had the man been kept in prison till the following Thursday and then brought up, according to what had been proved, there would have been sufficient offence proved to subject him to further punishment.

3872. Mr. Andros. And that Mr. Payne did not use cruelty, as was stated in the action. The Court were quite satisfied it was quite otherwise.

3873. Though he had been right in taking him up, yet, if he had ill treated him in doing so, that would have been a ground of action?

3874. Mr. Carré. Yes.

3875. (To the Procureur.) The Commissioners understand that a letter was written to some one directing the liberation of Long.—Yes; the constable wrote to the gaoler stating his illness, and that he could not attend.

3876. Is it the duty of the gaoler to obey the constable?—Yes; the gaoler was acting as the subordinate of the constable, the man being in the lock-up house.

3877. Mr. Dobrée. The gaoler and the man who has the key of the lock-up house are, in fact, one and the same person.

3878. (To the Procureur.) Generally speaking, are the constables persons occupied in other employments?—Yes: the constables of each parish are generally very respectable persons.

3879. Of what rank should you say?—Gentlemen and merchants. The assistant constables are tradesmen generally. The constable presides at the Douzaine.

3880. Is not there some risk of its happening sometimes that their own personal avocations may embarrass their acting in some particular case by giving them an interest in it one way or the other?—I think, generally speaking, we have had every reason to be satisfied with a great number of assistant constables. In some cases we have certainly had every possible reason to be satisfied.

3881. Mr. Mellish is a gentleman engaged in the shipping trade, is not he?—He is.

3882. Do you recollect the case of an indictment for the murder of a Danish boy?—Yes; Fleckner.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

September 28th, 1846.

3883. Mr. Mellish there was the consignee of the ship in which the event occurred; was not he?—I think he was the consignee, or acting in some way on behalf of the owners.

3884. The parties charged on that occasion got away; did not they?

3885. The Contrôle. I was counsel for the captain, who was acquitted. There was a complaint originally made to an assistant constable of the name of Sevire. Sevire brought up all the parties to the Court first, without putting any of them in custody. The Court was proceeding upon some civil case; and, while the Court were engaged, the parties got talking together; and Sevire, who had been a master of a vessel himself, and knew something of what goes on on board vessels, was, I suppose, satisfied with the explanations the captain gave him, and the promises of the captain; and the matter never came before the Court at all.

3886. Do you attribute that to Sevire having thought, in his discretion, that he need not detain the accused?—Yes, in consequence of the promises which the captain made him, and also the perfect willingness of the boy to return on board with his master.

3887. Mr. McCulloch. I was acting as one of the Crown Officers in the absence of the Procureur; and I recollect the circumstance to be very much as the Contrôle has stated it. I remember Mr. Sevire stating that he had been deceived. On the first occasion, he was satisfied that the boy had not been beaten more severely than masters of vessels were in the habit of beating their apprentices. That was the statement he made; and, in consequence, he took upon himself to tell the boy he had better go on board again.

3888. Mr. Dobrée. The whole transaction passed in the paved court in front of this building; and the boy was perfectly willing to return with the captain.

3889. According to the explanation which has been given, Sevire released the prisoner in consequence of being satisfied there had not been anything serious, and that there was no future danger. Do you think that was a discretion legally lodged in the constable?

3890. Mr. McCulloch. I understand, in point of fact, that the captain had not been warned to attend, but that a gentleman of the name of Le Couteur, who lived in the neighbourhood, had given information to the constable, and the constable had brought up the boy to the Court house for the purpose of lodging a complaint, rather to take the advice of the Court as to what he was to do, than to lodge a direct charge against the captain. The captain himself was not warned to attend. I recollect that the constable, on going on board again to take the boy back, put the captain on his guard to use the boy better.

3891. Supposing a constable were once in the position of having a complaint to bring before the Court, how far is he understood by your law to be warranted in abandoning it?

3892. Mr. De Havilland. As I was six years a constable, perhaps I can give the Commissioners my view of that point. I never considered that I had any discretion after I had reported the case to the Law Officers and to the Bailiff.

3893. Up to that time, suppose A. B. comes to you and says there has been a grievous assault upon me by such a person; take him: what discretion do you think you would have?—I was once called up in the night, between nine and ten o'clock, to go to a public house, about a mile or a mile and a quarter beyond my house, having been informed a man had committed a grievous assault upon his wife, and behaved himself in a most violent manner towards all those who were present. I went there; and I found the wife had taken refuge in her father's or brother's house, about a furlong beyond her own house. She begged of me I would put him in prison: and her family who were there, two or three brothers or brothers in law, joined with her, and begged I would not leave him loose, for that her life was in danger. I took him to prison. I do not recollect exactly the day; but I think it must have been on Monday, or, perhaps, on Sunday night. I took him to prison, and reported accordingly; and I represented how the whole family had begged he might be detained, 3894. Represented to whom?—To the Law Officers or to the Bailiff. I was directed to leave him there, and bring him on the Thursday morning to the Police Court. On the Wednesday evening, the wife came to me and begged I would release him. I represented that not only herself but her relations had wished him to be confined, and that I could not take upon myself to release him. Still she continued to beg me to do so; but I persisted in refusing to let him loose. She replied she was afraid, if he was brought before the Court, she should suffer for it afterwards. I produced him before the Court, the next morning, and stated all that had happened, and how the wife had implored for his release. The Court decided that I might have taken upon myself to release him at the prayer of his wife.

3895. That would not be a question legitimately before the Court at all; would it?—I mentioned it to the Court.

3896. You mean that the Court intimated an opinion of that kind?

3897. The Bailiff. There was no Acte of Court of that kind.

3898. Mr. De Havilland. The Court intimated an opinion that I might have taken upon myself to release him at the prayer of his wife, at whose prayer in fact I had put him in prison; but I have never released any person after he was in prison, and I had reported the circumstance to the Law Officers.

3899. (To the Procureur.) May we take it that, in all complaints, the constable exercises, in the first stage, a discretion as to whether it is a case that he shall bring forward?—I should say that, in all cases of crimes properly so called, the constable has no right to exercise any discretion.

3900. How would you limit the word "crime?"—Cases of robbery and every thing of that kind.

3901. From theft downwards?—Yes. In the event of a person complaining to the constable that he had been beaten by another, and afterwards telling the constable he wished to withdraw his complaint, I think the constable has been considered, at least I have thought so, to have authority to withdraw the complaint.

3902. Mr. Carré. That discretion would not be wholly the discretion of the constable; but it would also depend upon the desire of the party complaining.

3903. The Contrôle. In many cases, the constable consults the Crown officers and the Bailiff with regard to whether he may do so. The common course is, if a charge is made to the constable, and he has any doubt as to the nature of the charge, or the parties express a desire of withdrawing it, he, generally speaking, obtains the leave of the Bailiff and Crown officers to do so.

3904. Is not that rather in the nature of advice than a sanction?—Yes.

3906. Would the proceeding for a box on the ear, not in a public street, be exclusively a cause en adjonction?—I think there are many cases where it would be so.

3907. Mr. Contrôle. In the case of any charge made to the constable, unless the constable is satisfied that the charge is unfounded, if the party persists in pressing it, I should say the constable is bound to bring it forward. Supposing, for instance, a party charges another with having given him a box on the ear; the constable finds out from the other party there are two respectable persons who were present, and who say there was no box on the ear given, or that it was after serious provocation, or that there had been some petty quarrel between them; the constable might exercise a certain discretion. But, if the charge is made, and the constable sees no particular circumstances connected with the charge, if the party persists, he is bound to bring it forward.

3908. You think he has to a certain extent the power of judging of the facts?—He has the power of inquiring into the truth of them.

3909. And of acting upon his view of the truth?—Yes. If the constable finds that the charge is not founded in truth, I should think he might refuse to take the party up. Then the party may come to the Court and complain of the refusal of the constable to assist him.

3910. The Procureur. On reflection, I think the view which the Contrôle takes may be correct. A party brought before the Court, in certain instances, might plead that it was not a matter to be brought before the Court by the constable, as it was a case to be tried en adjonction.

3911. The Contrôle. Supposing the case of a box on the ear: A. B. comes to the constable and says, C. D. has given me a box on the ear, and I wish that person to be brought before the Court. In my opinion, a certain discretion lies upon the constable to inquire into the truth of the charge. If he finds no box on the ear has been given, or that it has been given after serious provocation, I consider he would exercise his discretion as to bringing the matter before the Court or not. Unfortunately the whole of this subject is but ill defined.

3912. Do not you think it would be advisable to have it strictly defined?—Certainly; and I believe all constables would be very anxious to have it defined.

3913. Would that remark also apply to a great many other questions connected with the duties of constable?—It would.

3914. In either of the cases which you have supposed, the party aggrieved might say, probably, I am not satisfied with the constable's decision as to the fact?—Yes; and then the Court would hear the whole case.

3915. Mr Dobrée. There would be another course, if the constable considered the case too frivolous to take notice of, which would be simply going to another constable, a thing which is constantly done.

3916. Mr. De Havilland. There is a point of discretion which sometimes causes difficulty, whether the constable shall take up the person or only warn him to appear at the next Court. In the case I have mentioned, had not the friends of the party so earnestly desired me to put the party in prison, I do not think I should have done so, I should only have warned him. In a case of that kind I have exercised my own discretion.

3917. You do not think it is matter of course that, upon every charge whatever, the constable is bound to arrest the party charged?—No. I think he has a discretion to exercise. There is also the circumstance here that, being a small Island, the parties could not escape out of reach, as they might in a place of larger extent.

3918. The Procureur. I think, in every case, where there has been what our law calls a voie de fait, on a complaint made to the constable, he is bound to bring it before the Court.

3919. What do you intend by a voie de fait?—An assault is a voie de fait. An actual commission of an offence.

3920. A blow given or any act of violence really committed?—Yes.

3921. Mr. Jeremie. If I cut a man's trees, that is a voie de fait.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

September 28th, 1846.

3922. Is that a criminal voie de fait?—Yes. If I went to cut the Procureur's trees, he would bring me up for a criminal offence; and, if it was done in the night, I should be subjected to imprisonment during a certain number of days, au secret au pain et à l'eau.

Mr. John Farrel examined.

Mr. John Farrel.

3923. Do you recollect the case of a man of the name of Flinn, for whom a reward was offered?—Yes.

3924. Did you try to get at him?—Yes.

3925. Did you know the man, as you thought?—I did.

3926. Whom did you apply to?—I inquired for the constable; and I was shown where Mr. Payne lived.

3927. Did you request him to arrest the person?—I said to Payne, I saw a man that I thought ran away from Dublin with some treasure of the Corporation. I said, there is a reward offered for him.

3928. What was Mr. Payne's answer?—Mr. Payne told me: I will arrest him, if you will give me half the reward if you get it.

3929. What did you say upon that?—I told him he should be paid for his trouble. So then he kept me in his house for about half an hour till he dressed himself; and he said he would come along with me till I pointed the man out to him. I said, "when I point him out to you, you arrest him." He said, "yes."

3930. Did you point him out?—Yes.

3931. The man whom you believed to be the person?—Yes. We walked along behind the man; I thought, every moment, he would arrest him.

3932. What was done?—When I saw him go too far, I said, "Mr. Payne, are not you going to arrest this man?" "No," he said, "I will not." Says I, "if you do not, I will." Says he, "that is more than you dare do; if you lay a hand upon him, I must protect him from you." Says I, "that is not the law in England or in Ireland." He said, "that is the case here." We walked on till we found out where the man lived; said he, "I think I have known him this three months in the Island." He told me then to come down from barracks at two o'clock that day, and that he would get an order from the Court to have him arrested. I did do so; but he did not get him taken. The next morning he told me to be down at the Royal Court at ten o'clock, I think.

3933. How long ago is this?—Last spring, I think.

3934. In 1845 or 1846?—I think it was the last spring. When I came down, that morning, he brought me into a private room, where there were about six or seven gentlemen.

3935. Do you recollect who sat in the chair?—No; I do not recollect, because I was in a great hurry at the time, and I did not take much notice. I stated to the gentlemen that I knew the man for a long time, both himself and his father; that he was a very respectable brewer, in Bishop Street, in Dublin; and I told them, if there was a man in existence, that was the man.

3936. What was the reward offered?—There was a report after he went out of Ireland that it was 500*l*. Afterwards it was reduced to 100*l*.

3937. What was Flinn charged with?—He was City Treasurer of Dublin; and it was reported, when he went away, that he had taken away 14,000*l*. from the corporation.

3938. Did you tell the Court you were certain he was the man?—Yes. I said, if there was a man in existence, that was the man.

3939. What passed next?—There was not a gentleman present that had heard of the circumstances. I said, "any one that has been in the habit of reading the public papers must have heard of it." They had heard nothing about it; there was some obstacle thrown in the way, so that I did not bother myself any more about it. They cautioned me, and said, I might lose my situation; that the man might bring damages against me.

3940. What has become of Flinn?—The next day he made an escape from a far part of the Island in a small boat and left.

3941. There it ended, I suppose?—It ended there. I was in a great hurry at the time; and I could not look after it. Mr. Payne told me that the man could not make his escape out of the Island; that there would be a letter sent to each of the Police of the Island. After leaving the Royal Court, I went to Mr. Payne's house for me to give him directions where to write. I was to give him the direction. When I went to his place, he was not there at all.

---

Mr. George Payne examined:

Mr. George Payne.

3942. Have you heard what has been stated?—Yes.

3943. What are you, besides being Constable?—I am a confectioner.

3944. Are you a native of Guernsey?—No; I am a native of Canterbury.

3945. Are you Constable, or Assistant Constable?—I was Assistant Constable; I am not at present.

3946. Has Flinn gone from the island?—Yes; to the best of my belief, he has.

3947. Mr. Farrel says, when he first asked you to arrest him, you said you must have half the reward?—There is a little error there. He came to me in a great hurry, and told me there was a reward; and he said, of course, as I was the acting party, I should go shares with him.

3948. He proposed your going shares with him?—Yes.

3949. Did you assent to that?—I did not ask him for it. He came in a great hurry to me; and those words came out at once. It was part of the observation he made to me at first. Of course, I felt it my duty to go out with him.

3950. You had to dress, had not you?—Yes.

3951. His account of the matter is, that he desired you to arrest the man when he pointed him out, and you said you would.—I said I should go out with him. It is quite clear I should not promise to arrest the man, unless I knew the circumstances.

3952. Did he tell you that he knew him?—He said, he would not swear to him. He told the Court so; and that was the reason the Court would not take any steps.

3953. Did you hear him tell the Court so?—Yes.

3954. Did he point out somebody as the man?—I went with him to the Catholic Chapel; and there we remained about a quarter of an hour, till the service was over; and he then pointed out to me a gentleman in company with a lady whom I had seen in the Island three or four months.

3955. Do you know whether that was Flinn?—No more than that.

3956. Is that the man who has now disappeared?—That is the man who left the Island at the time he states.

3957. How long had you known this gentleman?—About three or four months I think: it might have been more; I do not think it was less.

3958. He left in this sudden way afterwards, did he?—I think I heard so. I have no knowledge how he left the Island. I do not think I saw him after that day. I requested Sergeant Farrel to keep it a secret, because there would be plenty of time to apprehend the man after getting further information about him; but he buzzed it about to everybody; and every one I met returning from this Catholic Chapel appeared to know all the story.

3959. Your reason for not arresting him was that you wished to be sure before you ran the risk?—Yes. I would not run the risk of apprehending the man for a crime committed in Ireland, till I was sure that he was the right person.

3960. Did you tell Farrel, if he arrested Flinn, you would protect Flinn?—I proceeded as far as Pollet Street; and Farrel said, "Are not you going to seize him?" I said, "No, inasmuch as I do not think I should be justified in doing so." He said, "Well, if you do not, I will." I said, "If you do, and cause any disturbance in the street, I must be compelled to oblige you to let the man have his liberty."

3961. Did you ascertain where he lived?—Yes; we followed him at some distance.

3962. Is that all that passed that day?—No. We parted on my telling him that, if he came down at two o'clock, I would inform him whether I could take any steps in the matter. In the meantime, I called on the Procureur, who, it being Sunday, accompanied me to the Lieutenant Bailiff's house. I stated the affair to the Lieutenant Bailiff and to the Procureur, who were of opinion I had acted right in not apprehending the man, as Farrel was not sufficiently sure of the man to take his oath. The offence not being committed in the Island, we are, of course, very particular in taking any information, because we are responsible for our acts as Constables; we have no person to look to. If I imprison a man illegally I should be subject to an action for damages, as I was in Long's case. The Court authorized me to bring the matter forward the next morning at ten o'clock.

3963. Who was Bailiff then?—The late Mr. Guille.

3964. Was it spring of last year, or of this year?—The spring of last year. I was out of office in the spring of this year. Sergeant Farrel attended Court that day; he said, he believed that to be the man, but he should decline swearing to him. I wrote by that night's post to Dublin.

3965. How did you get the direction?—Sergeant Farrel left it at my house, as I requested him to do. The answer I had back was that the sureties had made good the amount, and that the reward had been cancelled six months before I wrote.

3966. The reward had not been offered by the Crown, but by the Corporation?—Yes.

3967. The points upon which you and Farrel differ are two. First of all, you differ as to you being the person who suggested your going shares; and the other point is, you deny his speaking positively to the man.—Yes.

3968. When he was before the Court, do you recollect his saying, if there is a man in existence, that is the man?—He was very sure of the man. There was something said about his coming down again. He said his time would not allow him, that he might be broke for neglecting his duty. It did not come from the Court, but from him.

3969. Did the Court give him any caution about the scrape he would be in, if he was wrong?—No.

3970. Was anything said about damages?—I have some recollection that the Court told him that, if I had acted as hastily as he wished me to have done, I should have been responsible.

3971. Did Farrel exhibit the advertisement or proclamation of the reward?—No.

3972. (To the Procureur.) Is it the law here, if a Constable has information that a person has committed a crime, and he turns out to be mistaken, that, if he acts bonâ fide, he is responsible?—Not if he has sufficient reason for it.

3973. In England there are two questions. First, whether the arrest is malicious, and then, whether there is a reasonable cause. Supposing the cause is not very reasonable but the arrest not malicious, would the Constable be responsible?—I should think not. The Commissioners are perfectly well aware that this crime was committed out of the jurisdiction. Our mode of proceeding here is this. Supposing a felony to be committed in England, an English Policeman comes here with a Magistrate's warrant. The person against whom he has a warrant must be identified before the Court. On his being identified, the Court makes an acte and orders him to be detained, a certain time, till an Order in Council comes to take him away out of the Island.

GUERNSEY.

Mr. George Payne. September 28th, 1846.

3974. Mr. Payne. With respect to Sergeant Farrel offering me half the reward; if he had done so, or if I asked for half the reward, and if Sergeant Farrel had shewn me the man, it is very probable I should have been likely to have seized him.

3975. (To Mr. Farrel.) Mr. Payne says, that you said you could not swear to him?—I was very positive of the man. When I saw him I pointed out the man; and, when he was not willing to arrest him, I proffered myself to arrest him.

3976. Did you tell him you could not swear to the man?—I never spoke a word about it, except in that room when I was cautioned about the damages.

3977. Did any thing pass with Mr. Payne about your swearing to him?—No.

3978. Did you never say to Mr. Payne that you could not swear to the man?—No; not to Payne. I said it inside, when I was cautioned about the damages. "Oh," said I, "I will swear this, if there is a man in existence that is the man."

3979. Did you say to the Court, you would not swear to him, but that you were sure it was the man?—Yes.

3980. Why would not you swear to him, if you were positive?—I was afraid, when I was cautioned. When I saw there was such a responsibility in taking the man, I should not like to get myself into trouble, being a military man; and I said, I would let the thing drop, and have nothing more to do with it.

3981. Are you quite positive that the only place where you said you would not swear to him was in the Court?—In the private room.

3982. No where else?—No. I never told Mr. Payne a word about it.

3983. (To Mr. Payne.) Do you persist in saying that he did tell you so?—Yes.

3984. You are positive that Farrel told you he could not swear to the man?—Yes; it was on the Sunday he told me that. I should wish to make a remark on another subject. I was called on New Year's Day, 1844, in the evening, by a gentleman of the name of Clementson, saying, that a man and his wife had been seriously ill used by some soldiers on the highway. I immediately went out; and, at the bottom of High Street, there were some men bringing down the man.

3985. Bringing down whom?—Bringing down the man who had been ill used, of the name of Clarke. I knew the man. He was saturated with blood, and could scarcely speak. The doctor considered his life in danger several days after that. A young man in the crowd told me he could identify the soldiers who had assaulted him. I took him to the fort. The sergeant of the guard shewed me some men in the black hole, who had just come in.

3986. That is a place of confinement in the garrison, is it?—Yes, just under the archway. The young man pointed me out three of them as the persons who had attacked this man Clarke.

3987. Did he say he had been present himself?—Yes; Arthur Keys was the young man's name; the men were taken into the square, and the major was called. I made my complaint to the major, who told me I could either take the men down, or he would be responsible for their appearance at Court the next day. I told him I had left the man in High Street in such a state that I did not think myself justified in leaving the men behind. I took the men down, and lodged them in gaol. They had been very unruly at the fort, and had struck the young man who was with me a violent blow. The sergeant advised me, and furnished me with handcuffs to handcuff them; there was a little difference occurred then. The corporal, who came down with the men forgot to bring the key of the handcuffs, and the men were obliged to be confined in gaol with the handcuffs on.

3988. The corporal came down with you, did he?—Yes, with a file of men. The gaoler told him, if he would bring down the key, he would release them immediately.

3989. Did all three remain handcuffed?—No; I had the key of two of the handcuffs, but not the third. The corporal was told, if he would bring down the key of the handcuffs of the other man, they would be taken off immediately. He did not bring them down that night, so that the man remained in handcuffs the whole night. The Lieutenant-Governor complained that I had insulted a gentleman holding Her Majesty's commission, by not taking bail for those men.

3990, a. Did the Court hear the complaint?—No.

3990, b. The constable has no power to take bail, has he?—No, none whatever. He did me a great deal of injury among the depôt; for all the officers withdrew their custom from me.

3991. What did the Court say to the complaint?—I do not believe that they entertained the complaint.

3992. (To the Procureur.) Has the constable any power of taking bail?—No.

3993. The Contrôle. Mr. Payne, when the charge was made in this case, had to use his own discretion as to taking the officer's word or apprehending the men immediately. If in doubt, he ought to have asked advice. Bail, properly so called, of course, is only given to the Court.

3994. (To Mr. Payne.) Probably the complaint against you was your not taking the officer's word?—He complained that I had insulted gentlemen holding Her Majesty's Commission, by not taking their bail.

3995. Was not the supposed insult to the major, who gave his word that the men would be forthcoming?—Yes. I could not leave the men behind. I did not know but I should find the person dead when I got back. My particular object, in taking down the soldiers that night, was that they should not have any correspondence with each other, or plan anything by which they might defeat the ends of justice. When we apprehend persons on a charge, we put them in prison in separate cells, that they may not concoct a story together.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine, further examined.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

3996. Does the constable keep any books in which are entered the charges which are made to him?—No. At least he keeps no official books.

3997. It is no part of his duty to keep any books in which the charges made to him are entered?—When a person is put into prison that is entered.

3998. It would be entered probably in the prison books?—In a book kept for the purpose.

3999. Have you regulations sent by the Secretary of State for the regulation of your gaol here?

4000. Mr. Andros. The English gaols are under the management of the Secretary of State; but that does not extend to Guernsey.

4001. (To the Contrôle.) You are aware, probably, that the States of Jersey drew up some regulations, in conformity with the Act in England, which were submitted to the Privy Council.

4002. Yes. There is an order of the Court here on the subject of the prison. Some regulations are very much wanted. Some time ago a committee was named by the Court of Chief Pleas here, for the purpose of drawing up some regulations.

4003. Mr. Lefebvre (Greffier.) About ten years ago, an inspector of prisons came over and inspected the state of the gaol, and he made a report to the Secretary of State; but, since that, no further notice has been taken of the matter. It was at the time that Mr. Daniel De Lisle Brock was Bailiff.

4004. You have no Order of Council on the subject, such as they have in Jersey?—No.

4005. (To the Contrôle.) Is it part of the duty of the constable to send from the island people who are in a destitute condition?—People who are chargeable to the parish.

4006. Is that under an Ordonnance, or whence is the constable's power derived in that case?—There are a great many Ordonnances bearing upon the subject. They are scattered about and have not been properly collected. The Ordonnance in force now is that of the 30th of April, 1821. The effect of the practice is that the constables of their own authority order persons out of the Island.

4008. The constable's first duty, in the passage read from the Ordonnance, is stated to be to keep a list of the persons who arrive in their respective parishes. Is such a book generally kept?—I cannot give you any information upon that point.

4009. Mr. Metivier. A book is kept at the constable's office of every stranger arriving. The masters of vessels bringing passengers send in a list to the Governor, and another to the police officers. That is entered in a book.

4010. One list of persons is sent to the Governor, and another to the police officers of the town of St. Peter Port?—Yes.

4011. (The Contrôle.) There is a special Ordonnance to that effect, which is embodied in the Harbour Ordonnance of the 19th January, 1846, Art. 2, by which all masters of vessels are bound, under a penalty, to give in a list of all persons arriving in the Island.

4012. This Ordonnance to which you have referred goes further than that. In case of a person disembarking in the country parishes, his name ought to be entered in a book kept there. Is that done?—I should think not very strictly.

4013 a. Mr. De Havilland. I was but a short time the principal constable, so that I had not the keeping of the book; but there is such a book kept.

4013 b. (To the Contrôle.) The next thing they have to do appears to be to take care that people of bad life or without means do not establish themselves in the parish. That is part of the constable's duty, is it?—Yes.

4014. The Ordonnance goes on to say that people of bad conduct, drunkards and ill conducted persons shall find no favour, particularly at the beginning of their residence; and the constables are authorized by their office to send them out of the country, informing them, at the same time, that they are free to appeal to the Court from the order.—Yes.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 28th, 1846.

4015. And that it is the duty of the public officers to act with severity against people of this description, to prevent their fixing themselves in the country?—Yes.

4016. And to show indulgence to persons who, after a residence more or less long, have given proof of good conduct and industrious habits?—Yes.

4017. This Ordonnance, therefore, gives considerable discretion to the constable?—Yes. But I understand that, in practice, the constables do not exercise that power to any extent, except in cases of strangers who become chargeable to the parish. With regard to disorderly persons, I conceive that they would invariably bring the parties before the Court, and not exert this power of their own authority.

4018. It would appear from this that, before sending them away, the constables are to give them notice that they have power to appeal to the Court against the order of the constable. Are you aware whether in practice that information is always given to them?—I believe that it is in practice given. I cannot say whether it is always done. I have known parties come before the Court and complain of an order of the kind.

4019. Are such applications to the Court frequent?—No, they are not.

4020. In strict law, drunkenness would be a cause of removal, would not it?—I conceive so by the construction of this ordonnance.

4021. With an appeal to the Court?—Yes.

4022. Mr. De Havilland. That is confined to the chief constable.

4023. (The Contrôle.) I have understood that the assistant constables do exercise this discretion. It may be that I am wrong.

4024. (To Mr. Metivier.) Is it your opinion that it is confined to the chief constable?—In law, it is confined to the chief constable. While I was constable, it never was the practice. If the chief constable think a person ought to be sent out of the Island, he looks in the book, and sees when the man came, and by what vessel he came, and then, if he sees cause, he gives him a pass, entitling him to a free passage. The only limitation is that, if it be within a year and a day of his arrival, the master of the vessel that brought him is obliged to take him back at his own expense.

4025. The Contrôle. That was formerly the law; it is not so now.

4026. What is the modern law?—I understand that, after a fortnight, the master of the vessel is not considered any longer responsible. He is bound to report him, under penalty; and, till the man had been reported, the master of the vessel would be answerable of course.

4027. Where is the Ordonnance imposing this specific duty upon the master?—I think is is an Ordonnance embodied in the Harbour Ordonnance. The Ordonnance itself I think is the 23rd of November, 1844.

4028. The Ordonnance, now in force, confines the responsibility of the master of a vessel to a fortnight, does it?—Yes.

4029. Do you hold that to be among the Ordonnances which the Court of Chief Pleas has power to pass themselves?—The Court have passed this aux Chefs Plaids: and, from time immemorial, they have legislated upon similar subjects. I see that the whole subject is contained in the ordonnance of 1821. Article 14 limits the obligation of a master to a fortnight.

The Article was read as follows.

4030. " Les maîtres de navires qui apportent un étranger dans cette Ile sont tenus d'en donner avis au connétables de la paroisse où ils débarquent, dans les vingt quatre heures après leur arrivée, spécifiant le nom de l'étranger, son état ou sa profession, et le port dont il est venu, sur la peine de trois Livres Tournois d'amende et d'être tenu ci-après de tous les fraix et de maintien ou autrement qu'aurait encouru le dit étranger envers les officiers publics dans aucune des paroisses de cette Ile, et ce, pendant an et jour de son arrivée. Et dans le cas où le dit étranger viendrait à charge aux officiers publics dans le courant de quinze jours après son arrivée, le maître de navire qui l'a apportè sera tenu de le transporter hors de cette Ile, malgré qu'il ait donné connaissance aux connétables de son arrivée."

4031. How is this Ordonnance carried into effect? What is the actual mode in which the party is sent from the country?—Supposing a person to become chargeable, the constable would ask him where he wishes to go. Supposing the person to mention a place and to acquiesce in the constable's order, the constable would give him a pass by the first vessel leaving for his destination, or the nearest place to it. Supposing the person to name no place, or to refuse to leave the Island, the constable would then bring him before the Court.

4032. If the party named St. Petersburgh, for instance?—I suppose he would be sent to Southampton. In a case of a difficulty of that kind, he is generally sent where he came from.

4033. Supposing he came from Yarmouth; what would happen then?—He would be sent by a vessel that would be going nearest to Yarmouth. If there happened to be a sailing vessel going still nearer than a steamer, he would be sent by that.

4034. Mr. Dobrée. The Contrôle said that, in case of an individual wishing to go to St. Petersburgh, he would be sent to Southampton. I wish to mention that, when I was constable, in the case of foreigners, such as Russians or Danes, I have known the police go to the expense of paying as much as fifteen shillings or more to enable a person to go to London, where he would have constant opportunities to go to all foreign parts, rather than to Southampton.

4035. You send all foreigners, therefore, of all sorts and descriptions to England, thinking that from England they will find their way to their respective countries?—Yes: the

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 28th, 1846.

the Consuls of their respective nations are bound to provide for them when they get to London.

4036. The Contrôle. I think it is right to qualify what Mr. Dobrée has said. I conceive, whatever the nation of a person may be, if he arrives here from England, he would be sent to England; but, supposing a foreigner to be here who had come by a foreign vessel, a Dane for instance, I do not consider, in such a case as that, the constable would feel himself authorized to send him to Southampton.

4037. Mr. Dobrée stated that the practice was to send a Russian or a Dane to England because there was a facility for his returning to his own country.—If a man wishes to be sent to a particular place, he is always sent there.

4038. Supposing a person wished to go to Madeira?—Then he would be sent to Southampton.

4039. You think you are not bound to send a man to his actual country, but you would send him as near as possible to the place from which he came?—Yes.

4040. Mr. Dobrée. In the appendix to Duncan's History of Guernsey, page 567, we find a letter from the late Bailiff, Mr. Daniel De Lisle Brock, to Lord Normanby on this subject, in which he goes very fully into it.

4041. The Contrôle. I believe, with regard to foreigners, the consuls are generally consulted. They act in concert with the constables.

4042. Have you consuls here from all nations?—We have consuls from most nations. There are very few foreigners that come here, except by foreign vessels; and then they take them back.

4043. What fixes chargeability upon a person?—Requiring relief; going for relief and obtaining relief, or being in such a position that the constable thinks it necessary to relieve him and does relieve him.

4044. Have you any lists of the number of persons sent from the Island in this way?—I presume lists of that kind are kept by the constables: but, upon those points, the constables themselves would give the Commissioners better information than I can.

4045. Mr. Mellish is the constable of the town, is not he?—He was the constable of the town. Mr. Ahier, whose year of service expired a very short time ago, I should think, would give the best information.

4046. Mr. Dobrée. The number sent away depends upon the activity and zeal of the constable of the day. I do not know what may be the smallest number: but I have known from 250 to 300 sent home in the course of a year. I think when I was constable there were 250.

4047. In what year was that?—That was the year after the cholera; 1833 I think.

4048. Were all those people chargeable here?—Yes. They were people that came to my office and said, "I cannot find any work here, you must find me work or give me relief." Perhaps not a tenth part of those persons were sent forcibly; but they were people who came to me in the way I have mentioned. Mr. Mellish also, in his year of office, was a very active constable, and sent out a great many.

4049. Mr. Mellish. I have sent as many as 400 or 450 in my time. Twenty three came by one vessel; and I sent seventeen of them back by the next.

4050. The instruction to the constable, in this Ordonnance, is that he is to show greater indulgence to persons who, after residence more or less long, have given proof of constant good conduct. Does that apply also to persons chargeable, or, as soon as a person is chargeable, is he removed as a matter of course? Suppose a person who had resided in the island five or six years, and conducted himself properly, were to fall into a position rendering it necessary for him to ask relief, would he render himself liable to be sent out of the country?—That power is not exercised in the case of a man who from accident is reduced in that way. He would not be sent away.

4051. The words of the Ordonnance would almost appear to give a right to such parties to maintenance. It is said to be the duty of the officer to show indulgence to such persons.—Yes. We think we have a right to relieve parties in that way, when the distress arises from accident or casual illness.

4052. The Bailiff. The relief given to strangers probably amounts to about 800*l.* a-year. That, of course, includes the expenses of removal, as well as the expenses of maintenance.

4053. The Contrôle. There is partial relief administered, during the winter, to all persons indiscriminately, which, of course, would not come under the head of chargeability. During severe seasons, there are distributions of soup and coals made to the poor indiscriminately. Applying for that kind of relief does not constitute chargeability. It is given gratuitously upon application.

4054. Mr. Dobrée. I hold in my hand a paper which I drew up a short time ago for my own guidance. It includes the amount of relief given to stranger poor, and also the cost of coals and soup, which in the winter time are issued gratuitously by the Police to all applicants, both strangers and natives. The amount of gratuitous charity was—

The reason why there is no return for 1841 is, that the constable's accounts were thrown one into another during the years 1839, 1840 and 1842. There were four constables in those three years: therefore the three last sums must be divided by four. I can also supply from this list a separate return of the sums paid for the passages of strangers, including both English and foreigners.

As it is a gratuitous relief, to prevent abuse, the constables make it a rule to give to no one, unless he is recommended by some rate-payer, and also to prevent the same persons applying two or three different times.

4056. Mr. De Courcy. Permission has been refused to me, though I am a ratepayer, to recommend a person.

4057. (To the Contrôle.) In case of a person refusing to go from the Island, what would be the remedy?—In case of a person refusing to go, he would be brought before the Court.

4058. What would take place upon that?—The Court would examine into the case, whether the man ought to be sent away or not: and, if they decided that he was to be sent away, they would authorize the constables sending him away by the first opportunity; and, if necessary, they would authorize the constable to keep him in prison till the vessel sailed.

4059. Could you give the Commissioners the form of an order of Court in such a case?—The order is similar to that in any case of complaint; it always expresses that the party complained of is "au charge."

4060. Where the complaint is that the person is de mauvaise vie, would that be expressed?—Yes.

4061. And then it is ordered that he shall leave the Island?—Yes. The form is étant au charge il est ordonné qu'il vuidera l'Ile. But, in the event of a person being brought up under those circumstances before the Court, he would be allowed to give bail that he should not become chargeable; and, if any person came forward who was willing to be bail for him, that would put an end to the proceeding.

4062. Would a person be allowed to disprove the fact of his chargeability?—Yes. That would be a matter of evidence; and, supposing chargeability to be proved, he would be ordered to leave the island, if he could not find bail.

4063. In the particular case, in which a person is brought before the Court and chargeability is proved, would it become a question before the Court as to where he is to be sent?—Yes.

4064. The Court would examine into that?—Certainly.

4065. Would the Court first inquire into his country?—The first question, I think, after having ascertained whether he was chargeable or not, would be where the person came from.

4066. Assuming the answer to be that he came from England, would the Court further inquire as to what part of England the party belonged to?—Yes; they would certainly inquire into that.

4067. Do they inquire into the place of his birth, or what inquiry do they make?—They would inquire into the place of his birth and his settlement. Where he was residing before he came here; what his calling was.

4068. What guides the Court as to where he is to be sent?—The wish of the party himself very much.

4069. Supposing he is a party who refuses to go?—He is told, "You must leave the Island; what place do you wish to get to?"

4070. Supposing he says, "It is indifferent to me"?—Then, of course, he would be sent to the first place to which a vessel was going. The course, I conceive, would be to make all those general inquiries. The constable comes forward and states upon oath, "this man is chargeable," and tells what story the man has given him. The man is asked whether he is chargeable or not. Supposing he denies his chargeability, that is matter of evidence. Supposing he admits it, he is told, "You must leave the Island; we cannot maintain you; where will you go?" And, upon that, all those different questions are gone into.

4071. Do they interrogate the party himself? "Where do you come from? Where were you born?"—Yes. In many cases that is given to them from the constable. The person contradicts the constable, if he states anything which is contrary to his statement.

4072. They would send him to the nearest port in England, to his residence, or place of birth?—Yes.

4073. Is there any particular rule adopted by you as to that?—There is no particular rule.

4074. Mr. De Havilland. It is always our endeavour to find out the parish to which the man belongs.

4075. The Bailiff. I take it the man would be asked generally, where he was settled in England; and, probably, his word would be taken. Every now and then we have sent over to us by the English authorities persons who are supposed to have settled in Guernsey; but they come without any legal document that we can appeal from. They are shipped by the English authorities, being probably settled in the very parish that sent them over.

4076. In that case you send them back probably?—Yes. There are many cases that have come before me incidentally in which that has been done; and I have been puzzled in my own mind to know what to do under those circumstances. With respect to the antiquity of this power of sending away those persons, I have a copy of a manuscript, which has no date, but which is, from internal evidence, manifestly written before the year 1605. It is intituled "Devoir de tous Etâts en l'Ile de Guernsey." It is stated "Item les dits conestables ont la charge de voir que nuls vagabons ny autre personne digne de travailler ne demeurent à part ou aillent mendiant, mais soient mis en quelque service par les dits conestables, et soient vestus aux fraix et coûtages de leurs paroisses: mais si les dits mendiants sont étrangers et ne se veulent mettre en service, les conestables les envoyeront hors de la dite Isle par le premier vesseau qui partira pour aller au pais dont ils sont natifs."

4077. Has not the Lieutenant Governor also the power of sending parties who are not natives from the island?—Yes; aliens. That subject has lately been brought before the Privy Council, and adjudicated upon there.

4078. That is a power, is it not, of very ancient date?—Yes.

4079. Would that extend to natives of England, or is it confined to aliens from the allegiance of her Majesty?—I conceive it is clearly confined to aliens from the allegiance of her Majesty.

4080. In case of a person sent out of the Island by means of an order of the Court, if he should return, is there any punishment attached to his returning?—No. My answer of course is limited to the particular case which I mentioned.

4081. You mean where persons are brought before the Court for being chargeable, and are sent out of the country?—Yes.

4082. Of course, if they were sent out by a pass willingly, there could be no punishment for their returning?—No.

4083. They would be liable to be sent out again probably?—Yes.

---

Mr. William Mellish.

Mr. William Mellish, examined.

4084. You have been head constable, have not you?—I have.

4085. When did you cease to be constable?—In the spring of 1845.

4086. Were you constable of the town parish?—Yes.

4087. How long had you been constable?—Twelve months. That is the regular time. You are allowed to remain three years; but it is such an office that every person who has any good wishes to himself gets out of it as soon as possible.

4088. Are the assistant constables and special constables under the orders of the principal constables?—I do not believe there is a person in the Island who can tell you anything about that. Very often I have come before the Court, and the Queen's Officers have told me: "Monsieur vous êtes le chef de police:" but, if I go to the person himself, he will tell me it is his business, and not mine.

4089. The whole body act independently, in fact, do not they?—Yes, they do.

4090. Supposing a riot were apprehended in any one place, and you thought it exceedingly important that the police should be gathered at that point, and any of the police constables took a different view, and thought it was elsewhere, would they all act for themselves?—If I were to go to the assistant constables, and say "I wish your attendance in the evening," they would attend. But, if I were to go and interfere with an assistant constable, when he has a case in hand, he would tell me to go about my business. The duty of an assistant constable has varied very much. Formerly, they used to attend at the Police Office every morning at ten o'clock, to receive orders from the head constable; but that has been done away with. They think their power is just as great as the head constable; and there is nothing that wants regulating more than that in the Island of Guernsey.

4091. Do you think that the existence of insubordination or want of organization of that kind, has produced any mischief?—That is what I think requires most alteration.

4092. Do you think, in point of fact, property or life has become less secure from the want of organization?—I think the assistant constables are as active, All I mean to say is that the power is not defined between both, between the head constable and the assistant constable. There is no regular rule; there is no rule whatever, who or how. They are chosen by the parish; and there is an end of it. They act as they please and as they choose; and, oftentimes, the constables will come to the Police Court and sit down, and cases will be brought up by the assistant constables that the constables have not been told of and know nothing about.

4093. Do they make no report to the head constable?—They may do it by chance; but they do not think themselves obliged to de so.

4094. It is not the system to make a report?—No.

4095. Supposing you heard of a robbery, and you were told that one assistant constable had gone to one end of the town, and another to another, and a third to another, have you the power to command those three constables to go at once to one place?—I would tell them, such and such a robbery has taken place, if they pleased to go. But, if I were to say, "Go, and do that for me," if they did not go, I should then come and bring it before the Court; and I should have to state the reasons why I did not go myself.

4096. If they did not go to those places you indicated, would the Court visit it as a case of their not acting upon information given them?—As there is no rule for a constable to go by, in such circumstances he is left to the views of the Court, and the Queen's Officers, and the townspeople. He is chosen by the parish. After he is chosen by the parish, he goes into the douzaine; he assists there in everything that is done; and he knows his routine of business. But, as to any other part of his duty as constable, he knows nothing about it. Go to the Queen's Officers, what will they say?—"You must do as those have done before you." That is exactly what the Procureur or the Contrôle would tell you.

4097. As a matter of fact, do you think the want of organization has led to any insecurity of property?—It is according to who you choose for assistant constable. There are some that are very active, and some that are of no use whatever.

4098. Does it produce less security in the streets?—I might judge of that if this town were a town where there were broils and assaults committed at night; but you may walk these streets all night long, and you will not find, perhaps, two persons in the street after 11 o'clock. I do not suppose there is any town in Europe more quiet than this is, generally speaking.

4099. Is there anything like a day or night patrol by the Police?—Unfortunately we had a gang of thieves in Guernsey, during the time I was in office. There had been a great many robberies committed; and the Court called all the constables together, and said, of course they wished very much that those cases should be found out; and we made a point of our own free will to go. I took half the assistant constables, and the other constable took the other half, and we paraded the town and the suburbs of the town at night.

4100. Who superintended the distribution of the force in that case?—I asked one of the assistant constables to come with me.

4101. You arranged it?—We agreed upon it among ourselves.

4102. We understand that there was a claim upon the part of the Police to call out the military to assist them?—At one time, we had the facility of putting any vagrants or drunken men in the guard-house down upon the pier. That place was built partly by the Government and partly by the States; but afterwards it was given up to Government. Formerly, we could ask for the assistance of soldiers, and it was granted to us. But there was an order came from the Horse Guards; I believe a representation was made by General Napier to the Horse Guards about it (*). In cases of fire, and so on, we could go to the fort and ask for some men to assist us; but that has been very much restricted by this order.

4103. Was not the direction from the Horse Guards that application must be made through the officers, and that they must use their discretion?—Yes.

* The following is the Order referred to, approved by the Secretary at War and the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Permanent General Orders for Guernsey.

In all cases where the Military force is called out in aid of the Civil authority, the responsibility of keeping order is thrown upon the Lieutenant Governor or some person to whom he may issue his orders upon the occasion.

The Military force of every description is essentially and solely under the command of the Lieutenant Governor. Neither the Bailiff nor the Royal Court, nor the Constables and Assistant Constables, can claim military assistance, unless with the sanction of the Lieutenant Governor.

The cases in which the present Lieutenant Governor will sanction the employment of Military force in aid of the Civil authority, are as follows, and conditionally, viz :—

1.—FIRES BY NIGHT OR DAY. On such occasions, at the requisition of a Constable or Assistant Constable who shows his staff of office, the Officer commanding the troops will give such aid as he may deem necessary, whether to guard property or extinguish the flames, or both; keeping however the armed party and the fatigue party distinct, and under different Officers, who will follow the general directions of the Constables present, in the mode which seems best at the time to attain their object. The Commanding Officer is to act with the utmost promptitude on such occasions; but he is to send instant notice of the requisition made to the Lieutenant Governor, indicating also where the fire rages.

2.—IN THE EVENT OF ANY GREAT OR DANGEROUS RIOT, Constables or Assistant Constables may demand Military aid from the Officer commanding the troops at the Fort or other Barracks; and the latter will immediately put the troops under arms in readiness to act: but he must not march to the scene of riot, until he has reported the occurrence to the Lieutenant Governor and received his orders. A Constable or Assistant Constable will also on such occasions proceed at once to the Lieutenant Governor's house at the same time that his colleague goes to the Commanding Officer to demand the aid of the troops. This with a view to save time and render the assistance more prompt.

3. It is not likely that in Guernsey any riot should occur, so sudden and dangerous as to require the instant interference of the military: but, should such an emergency arise, and the Lieutenant Governor be at any distant point of the Island, the Officer commanding the troops will then act according to his own judgment of the emergency, without waiting for the sanction of the Lieutenant Governor.

4. When the troops are called out to aid the Civil power in quelling riots, the Officer commanding will always send an ample force, and he will keep the remainder of his troops under arms until the riot is quelled; and, in this and every case, the troops who do not march out will be kept under arms until the troops who do march out return.

5 The Officer commanding any detachment sent to quell a riot will keep his men together, as a support to the Civil force; and they must not act as a Military force until the efforts of the Civil force have entirely failed to restore the public peace, and that, the chief Civil authority present having complied with all legal forms, has declared his inability to quell the disturbance without Military interference. Then the Officer in charge of the troops will act to the best of his judgment, and vigorously, so as to make the turbulent respect his force, but with a humane discretion according to circumstances.

6. A Constable or Assistant Constable who obtains the aid of the troops must not quit the force so obtained, unless another peace Officer of as high authority takes his place; if he does, the Officer commanding the troops will march them back to their quarters, unless the Lieutenant Governor be present on the ground.

7. No demands for Military aid made by the Bailiff, or the Royal Court, or the Constables, or Assistant-Constables, for escort of Civil prisoners, or for suppression of brawls or frays, or for common police cases, or for any case save those above-mentioned, are to be complied with, except under the particular sanction of the Lieutenant Governor. But this prohibition will not apply, if a Constable or Assistant Constable should, in the execution of his duty, be placed in positive personal danger, where he cannot obtain the aid of the Civil force for his protection. In such cases, the Commanding Officer of the troops, if applied to, will use his discretion in granting an armed force for protection: and every officer and soldier is bound, like all other citizens, to give aid to a civil officer in danger who calls upon them in the Sovereign's name.

Guernsey, April 12, 1844.

WILLIAM NAPIER,
Major General and Lieutenant Governor.

GUERNSEY.

Colonel Thomas Kennedy.

September 28th, 1846.

4105. You were not born here?—No; I came as Aide de Camp to Sir John Doyle.

4106. Where do you reside? In the town?—In the new ground, L'Hyvreuse.

4107. What is your opinion of the quietness of the town? Is the peace tolerably preserved?—I go home rather late; and I have never found anything but peace and quietness.

4108. And property is understood to be safe, is it?—Yes; we have no lock upon our house but any one could open with the greatest ease.

4109. (To Captain De Lancy.) You have resided in Guernsey, have not you, some time?—Yes.

4110. Do you agree with Colonel Kennedy's representation as to the state of the town?—The town is quiet enough, certainly; but, at the same time, I think a paid police here would be of service.

4111. For what purpose?—For general purposes; to examine into the state of things in different parts of the town.

4112. You think it would be of service on account of its general vigilance?—Yes.

4113. If there is nothing for them to watch nor any crime to be repressed, what would be the need of them?—In the case of robberies taking place, the duty falls upon the constables, who are unpaid officers.

---

Colonel Frederick Mann.

Colonel Frederick Mann examined.

4114. Are you a Colonel in Her Majesty's service?—Yes; I am a Colonel in the Staff Corps.

4115. Have you heard the evidence which has been just given?—Yes.

4116. Do you agree in it?—I am not in the habit of visiting the town late at night; but I have always understood it to be very quiet.

---

Colonel Ambrose Lane.

Colonel Ambrose Lane examined.

4117. Are you a Colonel in the army?—Yes; I am a Colonel in the Line.

4118. How long have you lived here?—About twenty four years.

4119. Are you an Englishman?—Yes.

4120. Do you agree in the evidence as to the general quietness of the town?—I do.

4121. Mr. Mellish. I think, to prevent misunderstanding, I ought to give some explanation as to persons sent away from the Island. I said that I had sent away seventeen out of twenty three persons. It occurred in this way. They came to my house at seven o'clock at night, and asked me if I could give them a bed and something to eat; that they had been brought here from England by a gentleman, who led them to believe that there were public works going on in Guernsey: and, when they came here, they found they were deceived. In the case of persons coming to the Police Office to ask for relief, we ask them first, where they are from; and, after they have stated their case, if we consider them worthy of relief, we give it to them; and, if there is any way for them to get on in the Island, we do not send them away. There were one or two men in my time, one in particular, he had a very bad leg: he was an active man; but his leg was taken off in the hospital: his family, however, worked hard; and this man has been left in Guernsey because he was an industrious man.

4122. We understand, if persons have been a certain time in the Island, it makes a difference as to your sending them away?—Yes. We have now in the office a number of persons whom we assist weekly; old people who have been here thirty years or longer than that. Those people we do not send away; we allow them so much a week.

4123. Was it ever your misfortune to have to send people away for bad conduct?—Yes; we have sometimes done so. For instance, if a man is in the habit of getting drunk and lying about the town, and not attending to his work, we have sent people off in such circumstances when they have come to ask us for relief.

4124. Without their applying for relief, have you sent any persons away for bad conduct?—They are brought before the Police Court first, and the Court decides upon it. They are generally bound to give bail within a certain time for their future good conduct.

4125. Then the practice is, as to those who are guilty of misconduct, to bring them before the Police Court and make them either give security for their good conduct or quit the Island?—Yes.

---

Mr. George Payne.

Mr. George Payne further examined.

4126. Have you any observation to make?—Whenever the high constable calls upon us, we always consider it our duty to go; and, whatever he says, when we are in his company, we abide by.

4127. You yourself do so?—It is the general practice of the assistant constables. But, if we undertook a case and the high constable came the next day, we should tell him it was our case, and he could not interfere with it.

4128. The case then becomes your property?—Yes; we bring the case before the Court. We take the same oath as the constable does.

4129. Suppose there were an apprehended riot, on any occasion, and the high constable said, "I think the great danger is up at the end of the esplanade," and the assistant constable said, "No, I think it is down at the harbour;" should you think it your duty to give up your opinion?—If there were three or four of us, we should go to separate places.

Mr. George Payne. September 28th, 1846.

4130. Suppose he said, "I think all should watch at the place where there is most danger:" should you think it your duty to comply?—When called upon by the high constable, I think we ought all to go with him.

4131. You would think it your duty to give up your own view in such a matter and act upon his?—Yes.

---

Maurice De Courcy, Esq.

Maurice De Courcy, Esq., examined.

4132. The Commissioners understand you wish to offer some observations to them?—I think it was in 1828, the high constable was called on in a case of riot, and the assistant constable, who certainly is one of the most respectable men who ever filled that office in the Island, was in a billiard room. The constable was sent for; but the assistant constable reached the point before him. The constable was Mr. Curtis; the assistant, was a person of the name of Rendell. Two gentlemen pointed out to the constable, some very serious complaint which had been committed upon a young gentleman in the Island. The assistant constable set the constable's authority aside, and even swept him away from the surface of the room.

4133*a*. You rather take Mr. Mellish's view of the case?—Yes. In addition to that, I have been at Plymouth and at Exeter: and there I found the police much better established and organized than it is in this Island: but they were paid; and the labourer is worthy of his hire. The consequence was, that there was no instance of crime in those places. All the vagabonds were driven from those large places into localities where there was no watch or protection to property, and that at a very trifling expense indeed. When you consider the extraordinary population of the City of Exeter, and the opportunity which is given there for plunder, I was surprised at hearing that there were only four cases of criminal prosecution in two years.

[Adjourned to to-morrow at eleven o'clock.]

Maurice De Courcy, Esq. September 29th, 1846.

Tuesday, 29th September, 1846.

Maurice De Courcy, Esq., further examined.

4133*b*. The Commissioners understand that, you wish to address to them some further observations?—Yes; I would wish to state to the Commissioners that, in the year 1837, during the Hampshire election, I was leaving Winchester about 4 o'clock in the morning; on the top of the coach I met an overseer of a parish from Birmingham, having charge of six paupers, one of whom was an idiot. The children were children of a soldier who had been in the garrison at Jersey. I advised the man to leave the paupers at Southampton, and go over to Jersey himself to ascertain whether they would receive them. The man did so. What I wish to represent to the Commissioners is that, if these Islands are to maintain the children of soldiers who happen to have been here, the whole riches of the place will not be sufficient for the purpose.

---

Mr. Joshua Philip Thomas Ahier.

Mr. Joshua Philip Thomas Ahier examined.

4134. Are you constable of St Peter Port?—No. I have retired.

4135. When were you so?—On the 21st of last May I got out of office.

4136. From what time had you served?—From the 19th of April the previous year. I was thirteen months in office.

4138. Putting the case of a fair difference of opinion between them?—In my case, they have been always ready to assist me in all cases of emergency.

4139. Supposing you apprehended a riot in some part of the town, and it occurred to you that the only place of danger was the harbour, and you wanted the assistant constables to attend there, and the assistant constables said, "We think you are wrong, and that the real danger is at the Esplanade;" would they think themselves bound to act upon their own opinion or yours?—I have always found them very ready to do what I directed them.

4140. No difference of opinion has arisen in your case, probably?—No; not in my time.

4141. Perhaps, you met and consulted?—I always did it, and they all used to attend the office in my time and make their report. Everything that transpired, at any time during the night or the day, I was always informed of it by them, either the next day or evening, or when they had an opportunity of meeting me.

4142. Had you the power of making them patrol the streets at night, if you thought it necessary?—I have done it on some occasions; and they were quite ready to do so, both assistant and special constables.

4143. Has it often happened that you have found that necessary?—About two or three times during my thirteen months. Two occasions were at the theatre, where we anticipated a little disturbance with the soldiers. We were told that the soldiers and sailors intended to be at the pit and gallery to create some disturbance. We met together on the evening; three or four of us met at one time; and the others met as the people were eturning from the theatre, in two or three parts of the town.

4144. What is meant, at this moment, is the actual patrolling of the streets at night?—That has never been done in my time.

4145. Do you conceive you have power to compel that?—I have always thought so.

4146. Do you consider property tolerably safe in houses in this town?—Yes.

4147. Are cases of house-breaking common?—There have been a few, but not very many.

4148. What should you call few or many?—I am only speaking of during my time. There were only three cases of house-breaking.

4149. Were those all detected?—Two of them were detected; the third we could not find out.

4150. Were they in the night?—Yes.

4151. All three?—Two were in the night. I could not say as to the third.

4152. The two that were detected were in the night?—Yes.

4153. Do you consider that the assistant constables have the power to act, under the Ordinance for the removal of paupers who are chargeable, as well as the head constable?—No; they have no power. The head constable is bound to give a printed pass, so that the assistant constables, whenever cases come under their notice, come up to the office and state the case to us.

4154. Do you remember how many were removed during your year of office?—There were about forty six families with children, some two, some three, and some five. There were one hundred and twelve single persons, male and female.

4155. Besides the forty six families?—Yes; all those were sent away at their own request. They applied to me or to the assistant constables asking for passes, being destitute and having no work.

4156. Have there been any appeals from your removals to the Court?—Only in one case. The individual was a person who brought a pauper, at least a labouring man, and his family to the Island, and promised to give him work. The twelvemonth and a day had not expired; and he wished to go back. I applied to the individual to remove this family at his own expense. He refused to do so, and brought me before the Court.

4157. Do you recollect any instance of removal, in your time, where the people objected?—No; not in my time. I think, a week previous to my entering into office, there was one individual whom Mr. Collings sent over to England. I did not see the woman herself; but I heard it reported that she had made some appeal refusing to be sent out of the island.

4158. Was that Ann Elliott?—Yes. There was no force used in her case. She was quite destitute; she had no friends; her only relatives were at Weymouth. Mr. Collings the constable called on us on the subject.

4159. Was she brought before the Court?—No; at least not that I know of. Mr. Collings did not mention the circumstance to me.

4160. How long had she been in the Island?—Fourteen or fifteen years, I understand.

4161. We were told, yesterday, that the law was never, in practice, applied to persons who had been a certain time in the island.

4162. Mr. Lefebvre (Greffier). It has been customary to allow persons to remain here who have become infirm and aged; but there have been many instances of persons who had been a long time in the island being sent away.

4164. Had she applied for relief?—She had applied to the constable. We have a number of paupers of a certain age, whom we allow two and sixpence and three and sixpence a-week to; and, as she was out of employ, she applied to the constable to submit her case to the Douzaine, to have a certain amount weekly. She declined going to the workhouse; and then he proposed that she should go to Weymouth, it being near her own home, and among her friends. I understood from him that she made no difficulties. The steamer was to leave the Island very early in the morning. Mr. Collings called on her, and found her trunks were packed up. He did not give her a common pass, but gave her money to pay her passage, in order that she might not go as a pauper, but might return to her own friends.

4165. How old was the woman?—About fifty or fifty two.

4166. Do you know what occupation she had followed?—A domestic servant. She was at my house a few months.

4167. You knew her therefore?—Yes.

4168. Was she an industrious and well conducted woman?—Quite so.

4169. There must be a process before the Cour Royale, must not there, according to the Ordonnance, to give an inhabitant the right of a native?—Yes.

4170. The Contrôle. They would acquire the right to relief by paying rate.

4171. (To Mr. Ahier.) Had this woman paid any rate?—No.

4172. Would not this have fallen within the case of indulgence mentioned in the Ordonnance?—She was quite able to be removed; and I do not think she had been long enough in the Island to come within the indulgence.

4173. You would construe that clause in the Ordonnance not to apply to so short a residence as fifteen years?—Yes; and we had the full number on the list.

4174. Mr. Collings thought that, the list being full, this was a case in which he might exercise his discretion as to the removal of the woman or not?—Yes.

4175. Your answer would be, would not it, that this was not a case coming within the rule, but still that there was no want of indulgence?—Yes.

Mr. Thomas Barnes examined.

Mr. Thos. Barnes. September 29th, 1846.

4176. What are you?—I am a shoemaker.

4177. Living in this town?—Yes.

4178. Did you know Ann Elliott?—Very well, and her father before her.

4179. Was he a native?—No; he came here forty years ago and rented a house in New Town; he kept a public house there.

4180. Do you recollect her going away the last time?—Yes, very well. I was the person who saw her off.

4181. Did she go willingly?—No; far from it.

4182. How came she to have her trunks packed up?—Because Mr. Collings said there was no alternative, as it was the last packet by which she could leave.

4183. Did you hear him say that?—No; that was what she told me. There is a mistake in the statement with regard to fifteen years. She had been thirty five years in the island.

4184. You were not present at any of the conversations between her and Mr. Collings were you?—No; I was not.

4185. Are you quite positive about her going unwillingly?—Yes. I applied to Mr. Ahier, myself, on the subject. Mr. Collings said, he could do nothing for her.

4186. Had she any mode of getting her livelihood at that time?—No; from her deafness she could not get a situation.

4187. Where was she living?—I believe with one Mrs. Smith, in Fountain Street.

4188. Residing there as a friend?—Yes. She had been backwards and forwards to the Island two or three times.

4189. You say she had been here thirty five years?—Yes. I knew her when she came to the Island, and her father before her.

4190. You say she had been backwards and forwards two or three times?—Yes; with different families.

4191. Perhaps the fourteen years which Mr. Ahier speaks of was from her last coming here?—It was only with different families, in whose service she was, as they left the Island in the summer season. There is a gentleman in the Island of the name of Connell, whom she lived with many years; she left with that family.

---

Mrs. Francis MacGurn examined.

Mrs. Francis MacGurn.

4192. Are you an English woman?—Yes.

4193. How long have you lived in this island?—Since 1819.

4194. What are you?—My husband is a pensioner from the Artillery.

4195. Did you know Ann Elliott?—Yes; above twenty years ago.

4196. Do you recollect her going away?—Yes; she went from my house.

4197. Willingly?—No, not willingly; she grieved very much about it. She was under compulsion.

4198. Why do you say she was under compulsion?—She had no way of living, except what little I could now and then do for her; and, coming backwards and forwards, she always came to my house as a mother.

4199. Were you present when Mr. Collings directed her to go?—Yes.

4200. Did she object to go?—I stated the case, in the first place, to Mr. Cochrane; and he told me he would lay it before the gentlemen. Mr. Mellish was in office then; and Mr Collings was just come in. He said he would lay it before the committee; but I believe he forgot it. It was then mentioned to Mr. Collings; he came to my house, and she was there. He said to her, "You have made an application to be taken into the house, or to be allowed something from the parish." He said that he could do nothing for her; that she must be sent home. I told him, it was a very hard case, that she had been thirty five years in the Island, and that I always knew her in gentlemen's families to be a very good servant: she lived with Mr. Ahier, and with Mr. Connell nine and a half years. He said nothing could be done for her; if she was not born in the Island, she must be sent home. I asked Mr. Collings, could he do any thing for her, that she was quite destitute being deaf so long. He said he could do nothing for her, except pay her passage. He told her he would send a man to take her box down by the first vessel that was going, which was in a few days. I went to Miss Dobrée, in Grange Road, the next day; and she made a little collection for her before she went, or she would have gone quite destitute.

4201. (To Mr. Ahier.) When a person gets relief from the Douzaine, which we understand is a charitable assistance given by the parish, is it generally permanent or temporary?—Temporary.

4202. Did she ask for any thing more than that?—She asked for relief for the remainder of her existence. She tried three or four services; but, in consequence of her deafness, she was not able to get a livelihood. She wished a permanent relief.

4203. It was only the Douzaine she applied to, was it?—First of all, to one of the constables. The constable relieves them just for one or two or three weeks, till the body of the Douzaine meet on a particular day. The constable then produces the case before the Douzaine, on a particular day, and states the case. In consequence of her deafness and so on, she applied to be put on the permanent list. I may mention that there are several individuals on that list receiving two and sixpence and three and sixpence a week, who are not natives. That is only a relief for strangers. The constables only relieve strangers.

4204. Mr. Carré. The native poor are relieved by the Procureur des pauvres; stranger poor are relieved by the constable, after consulting the Douzaine. The principle, upon which

GUERNSEY.

Mrs. Francis Mac-Gurn.

September 29th 1846.

that is done is that the relief of the stranger poor is not obligatory, but it is permitted by the Douzaine by an Ordinance. I have always understood, though I would not speak confidently to the practice, that an industrious stranger, having remained here sometime, and being prevented from finding employment or work by some temporary cause, is allowed temporary relief, if he appears likely to be able to find employment afterwards.

4205. Who are the strangers that are on the permanent list?—They are persons who are aged or infirm, so that it would be a cruelty to send them back to their parish. I would beg to suggest that some of the older Douzainiers, who have been in the Douzaine, would be able to give more correct information upon the principles adopted by the Douzaine in this matter.

4206. Is the relief by the Douzaine a voluntary subscription?—It is out of the funds of the parish. A discretion is allowed to the Douzaine; and I speak of the way in which they use it.

4207. Mr. Ahier. With respect to persons being sent away from this Island, there is no force whatever used. There were several instances I could name, but one in particular. I was in office, as one of the Directors of the Hospital. There was an old man, a native of this Island seventy five years of age, of the name of Lepage; he was out of the Island for forty five years. He married an English woman in London; and, in the forty fifth or forty sixth year, he applied to the authorities in London for relief. They ascertained his name and occupation, and sent a Police Officer to Southampton, and shipped him on board one of the steamers to this Island. This was a very peculiar case. When the old man arrived in the workhouse, the authorities there and the inmates in the house did not recognize him. At last, the mistress mentioned that there was an old woman in the Hospital ninety five years of age. The old man was taken into the ward; and, the moment the old woman saw him, she looked up, and burst into tears, and said, "This is my son." Therefore the authorities could not refuse taking him in, though they had doubted whether he was a Guernsey man.

4208. What species of control has the constable over public houses here?—By an Ordonnance we have power to visit them whenever we think proper, and to see that the regulations of the Ordonnance referring to public houses are put in force.

4209. (To Mr. Carré.) Does not the Cour Royale grant the licence?—Yes.

4210. The Cour en corps?—Yes; at present, it is generally done upon the recommendation of the Douzaine of each parish. It is never granted till an application has been made to the Douzaine and their opinion taken.

4211. Is it a license to sell spirituous liquors or to keep an open house?—To sell spirituous liquors.

4212. May an ordinary shop have a license of that sort attached to it?—Yes; it is only to sell spirituous liquors.

4213. The Procureur. The house is specified in the license.

4214. (To Mr. Carré.) Is the license a personal license, or does it refer to a specific house?—It is both. It is to such a person to sell in such a house.

4215. Is any person allowed to object to the grant of a license?—If any person were to object, his objections would be attended to.

4216. If some one were to allege that the person applying for a license was an unfit person to be entrusted with a license to sell spirituous liquors, would his representation be attended to?—Yes; there have been cases where a license has been refused upon such objections.

4217. Do the Court not only exercise the power of granting licenses, but also a discretion as to the propriety of granting them?—Yes.

4218. Mr. Ahier. There is one thing I wish to refer to, that, during my thirteen months of office, the monies spent for stranger poor amounted to 1025*l*. 13*s*. That was for the relief of stranger poor, passage money, coals, soup and medical attendance.

4219. What is the general head of L'Hôpital?—That would include hospital relief for stranger poor.

4220. The whole items of expense in the hospital for stranger poor are under that head?—Yes; out of that 1,025*l*., 175*l*. is paid by the States of the Island for soldiers' wives who have served here in garrison. The constable advances the money, and, at the end of the year, the States repay it to us.

4221. (To Mr. Carré.) On applications for licenses, have you any rule that members of the Court, who themselves deal in spirits or are interested in houses of the kind, cannot join in granting licences?—I do not think there are any such upon the bench.

4222. The Bailiff. The following Regulation of the Commissioners of 1607 is all that subsists upon the subject. "Forasmuch as we are of opinion that brewers and brewhouses, being discreetly ordered and well used, would rather prove beneficial than prejudicial to the poor inhabitants, who (as we are credibly informed) for want of brewers, or of skill in brewing, or of such other things as are thereunto needful, for the most part drink water; we do therefore refer the consideration hereof to the Bailiff and Jurats who best understand what appertaineth to the common good of the Island, and, whatsoever order they shall set down herein, we require to be observed; provided always that neither the Bailiff nor any of the Jurats shall be a common brewer to the end to sell any beer or ale in any wise."

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine, further examined.

4223. There is a proceeding of the Court by summary jurisdiction is there not?—Yes.

4224. Is it in the sitting au secret that the Court decides whether the case shall be disposed of in exercise of summary jurisdiction or not?—If there is no doubt, upon the constable's statement whether the matter shall be treated summarily or not, the case is gone into immediately, summarily in public. If any doubt exists in the mind of the Court, they would deliberate upon that privately; and, if they decide upon taking the case summarily, they would re-open the Court to do so.

4225. We take for granted the Crown Officers act, as advisers to the Court, in that particular as well as in others?—Certainly.

4226. The Crown Officers would be present at that private meeting?—Yes.

4227. Both at what precedes the private meeting and at the private meeting?—Yes.

4228. Does the decision take place immediately after the statement of the constable, and before hearing the evidence?—Yes. In some cases the Court will hear one or two of the principal witnesses, not upon oath, but by way of explanation. The examination is to know what the nature of the charge is. If there is any doubt upon it upon the constable's information, the decision is taken whether the evidence shall be taken in private or not.

4229. Can you give the Commissioners any thing like a practical test as to when the jurisdiction is summary or not?—The only practical test I can give you is this. When the offence charged, supposing it to be proved to its full extent, would be considered to be adequately punished by an imprisonment of one month, any part or the whole of which may be in solitary confinement and on bread and water or by a fine of 5*l.* at most, then the Court would take the case summarily. I think I might add to that, that, with regard to larceny, unless it be what is considered a petty theft, the practice is to commit for trial. I mean that the practice, in larceny, unless it be a very petty theft, is to commit; but, upon the trial, no further punishment is given than would have been given if the case had been taken au police.

4230. Do the Court by treating it summarily consider themselves bound not to inflict more than a certain punishment?—Yes. The jurisdiction of the Court does not extend beyond that.

4231. Does it not rest upon the exercise of a sort of discretion, whether they think the offence if it is proved would be liable to such a punishment?

4232. The Bailiff. It is not unlike the discretion of an English magistrate in the case of an assault.

4233. (To the Contrôle.) May the defendant, when he sees the Court are going to proceed summarily, have counsel?—Yes. The moment the proceeding is entered upon, of course he may have counsel.

4234. Supposing the defendant says, "I would rather take my chance of a larger punishment and have a larger body of gentlemen to hear the case:" has he the choice?—I do not remember any case of that kind having arisen.

4235. You have not perhaps turned your attention to the question whether that right exists?—I have never seen any such case arise.

4236*a*. The Procureur. In practice, they would all prefer a summary proceeding.

4236*b*. The Contrôle. I have seen the contrary arise.

4236*c*. Mr. De Courcy. I have myself applied to be heard before a full Court, and have been refused within the last month.

4236*d*. (To the Contrôle.) You say you have never known an instance occur of a party requiring to be heard before the greater body; and you have not considered the question whether the right exists?—No; I have not considered the question at all.

4236*e*. The Bailiff. I am inclined to think the Court would have a right to proceed summarily.

4236*f*. Mr. Carré. In cases of theft, and actual crime, not mere assault or disturbance of the peace, it has occasionally been put to the prisoner whether he desired to be tried summarily or by the Cour en Corps.

4236*g*. (To Mr. De Courcy.) You say you have known an instance where the option has been refused?—Yes; on August the 20th, 1846, I was brought before the Court at the instance of a constable, on a complaint: he told me, he was directed to investigate on the part of a person named Blair and his wife in this Island. I appeared before the Court, and cited many cases, from which I considered they were not competent to enter into the complaint; cases too, in which my own interests were involved and upon which I have been put to very considerable costs.

4236*h*. Was this a criminal charge?—It was a breach of the peace. I urged that the Court, as it was then constituted, was not competent to hear the case.

4237. You were over-ruled?—Yes; with advice of the learned Contrôle, in the absence of the Attorney General. I would also observe that, independently of the Court being incompetent in that respect, it was incompetent in the absence of another Crown lawyer.

4238. The Bailiff. I presided in that case; and I am glad this has been mentioned, because it makes my view rather more clear than it has been before. The case alluded to by Mr. De Courcy was a case in which the charge was one of assault. His objection was that a case of that kind was not a case of police, but that it was a case to form the foundation of a cause en adjonction. He argued that point on certain authorities which it is not necessary to go into; and the Court held that an assault or breach of the peace essentially belonged to the Police Court, and that the right to make it the subject of a cause en adjonction belonged to the complainant, and not to the party charged.

4239. You understood the alternative insisted upon by Mr. De Courcy to have been not a procès à l'ordinaire, but a cause en adjonction?—Yes; which is proved by the cases to which he referred, which were causes en adjonction; and the costs which he refers to were costs of proceedings where he, being the complaining party, had proceeded by a cause en adjonction. I only mention it, at present, to show that the question he raised was with respect to a cause en adjonction, and had no reference to the case immediately before the Commissioners.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 29th, 1846.

4241. The question the Commissioners want to understand is whether, if a party is proceeded against in a case where the alternative is either a summary criminal proceeding or a criminal proceeding by the Cour en Corps, he is permitted to throw himself upon the greater body?—Decidedly not in my case.

4242. We understand your argument was to prove the proper alternative to have been a cause en adjonction?—All I did was to protest against the course.

4243. The Bailiff. If I were to express an opinion, without binding myself to it, it would be that, where a matter was in the nature of a crime, such as a theft, the party would be entitled, if he insisted upon it, to be tried by the Court; but, where it was mere disorderly conduct, and a little more than a breach of the peace or an assault without any matter of aggravation, the Court, I think, would be quite justified in taking that summarily even in invitum. That I should apprehend to be the rule; but I do not state it as the result of any practice.

4244. Must not the question of jurisdiction always be a question for the Court?—Yes.

4245. Is there any Ordonnance or Order in Council on the subject?

The Contrôle. No.

4246. The Bailiff. There is an Ordonnance relating to the Police Court; but I do not think it touches that point. It gives power to sue for penalties for breaches of Ordonnances where the penalty is not greater than a certain amount. I do not think it limits the jurisdiction in any other way. In England a proposition has been made to allow juvenile offenders to be tried summarily. A learned Judge objected to it, because he thought it contrary to principle to allow a felony to be tried otherwise than by a jury, to which the answer was that nothing would be easier than to say that in certain cases larceny should not be felony.

4247. (To the Contrôle.) How often does the Court sit in exercise of its summary jurisdiction?—Every Thursday throughout the year, and oftener if required. I wish to add that Thursday being fixed for hearing cases en Police is by a modern custom.

4248. Supposing a person in custody charged with an offense whose punishment might not exceed the interval between that and the next Thursday, would that be thought a reason for sitting before the Thursday?—It might; and in many cases, where there is a doubt, the Court has met earlier.

4249. The Bailiff. The odds are that a person of that kind would not be kept in prison.

4250. A person likely to have less than a week's imprisonment, you think, would be warned?—Yes. I recollect one or two occasions of the Court having been requested to meet on that ground.

4251. The Contrôle. I wish to add that it is only of late years this custom has prevailed of meeting on Thursday. Formerly, the constables were in the habit of bringing up persons every time the Court sat, indiscriminately; the consequence of which was, when the Court were met to try civil cases in which sometimes there would be a great number of witnesses, the constables would come in to interrupt the proceedings, and the day would be lost and the suitors put to great inconvenience. In consequence of which the Court fixed Thursday for that special purpose.

4252. (To the Bailiff.) Practically, do you find meeting once a week sufficient for all purposes of Police?—I think meeting once a week with the power of meeting oftener is so.

4253. Mr. Dobrée. It not unfrequently occurs that, from week to week, there is not one Police case brought before us.

4254. The Bailiff. Before I left Guernsey there were four successive Thursdays on which there was not one conviction nor a committal.

4255. Is it in the power of the Bailiff to assemble the Court more than once in the week, or does it depend upon the will of the Court generally?—I suppose the Bailiff has the power; he has the power of summoning the Court at all times.

4256. So that, if once a week were not sufficient, it would be within the jurisdiction of the Bailiff to remedy that by summoning the Court on an additional day?—Yes. When application is made to the Court to fix a day, it is done by the Bailiff and Jurats; but, I apprehend, if a Court is to be summoned unexpectedly, the Bailiff is the only person to do so; and he does summon them, not only for judicial, but deliberative purposes. He summons the Court, if any matter arises, for the next day, or any time that may be necessary.

4257. Do the Jurats make a point of attending in rotation at the Police Court, or is there any order of attending?—That is done by the Quartier.

4258. Mr. Mac Culloch. That is regulated by an Ordonnance of 1608.

"Est Ordonné que la Justice, en nombre de douze Jurez, assisteront à Mons$^{r}$ Le Baillif, ou son Lieutenant, à tenir Justice, savoir quatre d'iceux à chacune ouverture des Cours àpres les chefs Plaids, qui se tiennent, trois fois l'an, ou trois d'iceux pour le moins, sinon en cas de maladie ou excuse raisonable, neanmoins quoy, sera chacun sujet prier un de ses frères servir pour lui, à ce que Justice ne manque au peuple; lesquels quatre Jurez continueront à tenir les Cours avec le dit Baillif ou Lieuten$^{t}$, come à la coutumée et, en meuble, de huitaine en huitaine chaque jour de Mecredy jusques au chefs Plaids suivant, que quatre autres Jurez seront sujets pour assister à faire Justice à leur tour. Et ainsi des quatre autres Jurez, et que la Justice sera tenue être en Cour des les 10 heures du matin chacun jour de Cour, et y continuer jusqu' à trois heures après midy, si le nombre des causes le requiert, et qu'iceluy Bailly, ou son Lieutenant, et Jurez auront pour eux les profits et emoluments tant du sçeau qu'autres choses qui pouront échoir durant leur tour."

4260. The Bailiff. There is nothing to prevent any other Magistrate attending.

4261. Do the Jurats regularly attend?—There are four whose duty it is to attend. I do not mean that every one of the four attends, every one of the days: but I think on the average there are three.

4262. In case of one of the four, whose duty it would be to attend, not attending, might the Court be constituted by the attendance of any other Jurat?—Yes; a message would be sent to some Jurat who happened to be in the neighbourhood. That occurred at the last Court day. Mr. Carré having presided as Lieutenant Bailiff in the first matter that came on, he continued in Court during that day, though it was not his Quartier. On the same day, while the Court was sitting in private, another Magistrate entered, Mr. Dobrée: but, as he did not hear the whole of the case, he took no part in it whatever; which is the invariable rule.

4263. When the Court is sitting as a Court of committal, has each Jurat a right to attend, or only those necessary to form the Court of committal?—I do not think there is any thing to prevent the attendance of any Jurat: but I do not at this moment recollect any case, in which more than four have attended.

4264. In cases that would excite great public interest, would not it be likely that most of the Jurats, if not all, might attend the Court of committal?—I think rather otherwise.

4265. You think, in those cases, it would be confined to the Bailiff and two Jurats?—To the Bailiff and four Jurats. Two form a quorum: but it is the business of four to attend, and, in a very important case, in all probability, you would have the Bailiff and four Jurats, and no more.

4266. The four form the whole committing Court; but two make a quorum?—Yes. There was lately a case of great public interest and of very great difficulty with respect to facts. It occupied the Court in private for a great length of time. I mean by a great length of time, two days, till late at night each day. There the Court consisted of the Bailiff and four Jurats.

4267. The four whose turn it was to attend?—Yes. It was at one time a question with the Court so constituted, whether it would not be advisable to have other Jurats present, in order to have the benefit of their advice, and that the matter might be inquired into by a larger number. The question was then considered upon general principles; and what was acted upon then, and which was rather looked upon as a general principle of right, was that the responsibility of acting should be taken by the Cour du Quartier alone, leaving the facts to come fresh before the Cour en Corps at the trial. That is not quite to the point of the Commissioners' question, but very nearly. I think it is the feeling of the Magistrates that the responsibility of the police business lies with those whose duty it is by law and custom to make up the Police Court; and I think that, the more important the case, the less likely you would be to have volunteers come in.

4268. Of course the case you mention was something which occurred while you have been Bailiff?—Yes.

4269. Have you any means of knowing whether the practice has always been uniformly that which you now state?—I cannot say whether it has been so or not.

4270. (To Mr. Carré.) Can you say how that has been?—I am aware of cases in which a larger number than the Cour de Quartier have attended.

4271. Have those been cases of public interest?—I only recollect two cases distinctly; one was the case of a murder many years ago, and the other the case of an accusation for conspiracy against certain officers of the Militia here.

4272. The Contrôle. In the last prosecution for murder, which was the case of the Danish boy, I find the following Jurats attended the preliminary investigation; Sir William Collings, Frederic Mansell, S. W. Gosselin, Tho$^{s}$. Le Retilley, Harry Dobrée, and Edgar MacCulloch, Esquires.

4273. That was at the Cour au secret?—Yes.

4274. Mr. Mac Culloch. On the day the man was committed the Court was not met as a body.

4275. Mr. Carré. I recollect another case, in which others besides the Cour de Quartier attended, though I am not sure that there were more than four. It was a case of an accusation brought by a person of the name of Irving against the then Contrôle about eighteen months ago. I think one of the members of the Cour du Quartier could not judge, as being a relation of the party accused.

4276. (To the Contrôle.) Is not it common for the Court sitting as a Police Court to order parties against whom there is a charge to find bail for good conduct, or to leave the Island?—Yes.

4277. Is that ever done in the case of a native?—Never, nor in the case of a person received as an inhabitant under the Ordinance.

4278. They are quasi natives?—Yes. I would also add, with respect to that point, that, in many cases where the Court ordered a person to leave the Island in default of finding bail, they give him a certain number of days to find the bail or to transact his business, preparatory to leaving the Island. The time depends upon circumstances; a week is very often given; and sometimes it is prolonged upon application.

4279. The bail is under some penalty?—He is ordered to give caution to the amount of from ten or fifteen or twenty pounds sterling, ou vider l'Isle.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

September 29 h, 1846.

4280. Is the passage paid in that case?—Yes; the Prevôt pays the passage money, and he is repaid by the Crown.

4281. Do you give the person his choice then where he goes?—Exactly in the same way as the constables.

4282. Supposing a person leaves the Island, and comes back by the next packet?—Then he is sent back again.

4283. If he comes back, is the previous sentence of itself substantive evidence?—Yes. In a case similar to that which has been mentioned, supposing there to be a judgment against the person that he should give bail for such sum or leave the Island, if he should leave the Island in consequence of that sentence, and, immediately afterwards, return, the constable would, I think, consider himself authorized to send him back, without applying to the Court at all, subject of course to the same limitation, that the person would have a right to apply to the Court again, and a new acte would be made.

4284. Would he not in strictness have obeyed his sentence?—Yes.

4285. Is there any limit of time?—One year is considered to be the limit of time for the duration of that sentence, the time during which he is to vider the Island.

4286. If he goes away immediately, and does not return till the expiration of a year, he is then like a person coming to the Island for the first time?—Yes. In cases of persons returning in that way, before the year, after being condemned to find bail, it is usual to pass a new acte, and make a more stringent regulation. The constable might turn him out; but in some cases he might be brought before the Court, and a new sentence would be given.

Mr. Carré. That is very rare.

4287. The Contrôle. But it has occurred: there are cases where persons have been sent away and have returned again, and the Court has made a new acte. They have been imprisoned and ordered to leave the Island, et "défendu d'y revenir sans avoir donné la dite caution, sous peine de punition corporelle à discrétion de Justice."

4288. What would be the limit of that peine de punition corporelle à discrétion de Justice?—It might be imprisonment, either solitary, or on bread and water.

4289. What would be the time of it?—One month, I should think, would be about the time.

4290. Is there any legal limit?—No. In cases of persons having been banished from the Island after criminal sentence, they are tried for it.

4291. Does the return become itself a question of Police, or, the sentence having been passed and having been infringed, is it turned into an offence of another sort?—It becomes a matter of Police again.

4292. And, of course, the punishment would be limited to the punishment which the Police Court would have a right to inflict?—Yes.

4293. Are there any cases in which a person has an option given him by the authorities to avoid prosecution by leaving the Island?—With regard to the constable's authority to do so, I conceive he has none. Cases do occur, in which the constable makes use of that discretion upon taking the advice of the Bailiff and the Crown officers. In some cases, where the Court are sitting en Police, the constable brings a person before them accused of some petty offence, and says, "this person is willing to leave the Island:" and that has been allowed. There is also a special form which goes under the title of forjurer le pays. In some cases, where a prisoner, having been committed for trial in the ordinary form, is brought up to the bar, on the following Saturday, to plead to the inditement, his counsel applies to the Court for him to be allowed "forjurer le pays" for such a time as the Court may think fit, without going through a trial. It then lies with the Court to grant the application or not. This is founded upon Terrien, Book xii., chapter xxxiv., page 518, "De ceux qui se retirent en franchise et qui forjurent le pays." I would add that this is not the common practice; and, of late years, it has been seldom allowed. The last case, in which it was allowed, was in the case of two very young men, natives of Guernsey, aged about seventeen, who were indicted for housebreaking.

4294. What were their names?—Cohu was one, and Dufour the other. They were indicted for housebreaking. They were allowed "forjurer le pays," the one for four, and the other for five years. That was on the 27th of April, 1844, and is the last case. I believe there have only been two others since I have been at the bar; one of which was the case of an Englishman, and the other a Guernseyman.

4295. That prevents, of course, a subsequent charge for the same crime?—Yes; unless they return to the Island.

4296. If they returned, would they be charged with the old crime, or with returning?—For returning. I presume their returning before the time would have the same effect as a person sentenced to banishment by an acte of Court returning before the expiration of the banishment, which is an indictable offence. The record of the conviction would be produced, and the identity of the person proved. I have known applications for permission "forjurer le pays" refused.

4297. Do such persons pay their passage?—Yes.

4298. (To Mr. Carré.) Have you, in your experience, known any case of a person having returned to Guernsey, after having been permitted forjurer le pays?—I am not aware of any such case having occurred. I have no doubt he would be proceeded against, just the same as a person who had returned from banishment.

4299. Would his coming back subject him to the original punishment due to his offence?—I think not. I think he would be tried for this specific crime of having returned.

4300. The Contrôle. I think it is quite clear, from the form of the acte, in the case I mentioned. The acte says "Sur la demande du dit Cohu de forjurer le pays pour le terme et espace de cinq ans, la Cour, vû les circonstances particulières du cas, a accordé sa dite demande, et lui est defendu de revenir dans l'Ile pendant les dits cinq ans, à peine de punition corporelle à discrétion de Justice."

4301. Mr. Dobrée. I wish to state, before the inquiry is closed upon the subject of strangers, that there is a numerous class here who create a great deal of trouble, and respecting whom there is no defined rule, so that it varies, and sometimes the Court find themselves embarrassed. I allude to the widows and children of military pensioners. There are, I believe, nearly three hundred of those individuals now settled in the Island. They themselves very seldom apply for relief, or become in any way troublesome: but, from the circumstance of the pensioners having a certain pension, ranging probably from one to three shillings a day, they frequently marry late in life, and leave in this parish wives, and sometimes large families, unprovided for. Those families, or part of them, very frequently apply for parochial relief, or relief from the constable's office, more properly speaking.

4302. You mean children born in the Island?—Children, some born in the Island, and some not. When they apply for parochial relief, the first question asked is, "What parish do you belong to?" And, very frequently, it is difficult to get at the parish, for two reasons; sometimes the wives do not know to what parish their husbands belonged; and, in other cases, aware of the very indulgent treatment which foreign paupers meet with here, they affect ignorance of it: consequently those parties remain here; and we find it, in numerous cases, quite impossible to get rid of them. I believe, I am speaking the language of the Police and of the Court, when I say we are very little acquainted as to what are the means to be taken to get rid of such persons, or to what extent, they being wives and children of pensioners, we have the power of sending them out of the Island. It is an increasing evil; those pensioners are increasing every year in number; and, as they die off, their families remain quite unconnected with any persons in the Island. Sometimes the children are born abroad; we have no means of knowing what their parish is; and they become chargeable to us for the whole of their lives.

4303*a*. They become a permanent burden upon the Island?—Yes; an increasing burden from year to year. It is exceedingly desirable, both for the Police and the Court, that the law on this subject should be defined.

4303*b*. Mr. Carré. There was a point, respecting the authority of the head constable over the assistant constable, which, I think, was not very clearly defined. It is settled, I think, by law sufficiently to enable the Commissioners to understand it. The first Ordonnance appointing and establishing assistant constables was in 1736. They were then appointed as mere assistants to constables, without any authority of their own. In the year 1799, the constables represented to the Court that, on account of the increase of population in the town and parish of St. Peter Port, the two head constables were not sufficient to keep the police of the town; and, for this purpose, they applied to the Court to enlarge the authority of the assistant constables, so as to enable them to act in the absence of the head constable. Here is the Ordonnance itself, in the terms in which it is drawn up, of the 30th of September, 1799.

The same was put in and read as follows.

"Sur la représentation des officiers du Roi, à l'instance des connétables de la ville et paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, que la population de la dite ville et paroisse de Saint Pierre Port est tellement augmentée, que les dits connétables ne suffisent pas pour y maintenir la police et le bon ordre, et que, pour à ce remédier, il conviendroit d'étendre l'autorité des assistants connétables de la dite ville et paroisse: La Cour, ouie la conclusion des dits officiers du Roi, a ordonné qu' à l'avenir les dits assistants des connétables seront, dans l'absence des connétables, revêtus des mêmes pouvoirs que les connétables mêmes, en tout ce qui regarde la police et l'ordre public en la dite paroisse, et, pour l'effet, que les assistants des connétables actuels et tous autres assistants ci-après prendront le serment suivant qui sera la régle de leur autorité et de leur devoir."

They were still the servants of the constable, and were bound to do the work assigned to them. It enlarges their power, but does not take from them their subordination. With regard to the manner in which special constables were first established, the first Acte, in November, 1838, shews they were only appointed for one week. At the end of that week, which was in November, they were sworn to act till the next Chief Pleas, which was till the middle of the next January. It was done upon the application of the constables. In January, 1839, they were again, upon the representation of the constable, sworn to act till the Chief Pleas at Easter of the same year. This was done upon the application of the constables and the douzeniers. At the Easter Chief Pleas of 1839, a portion of those special constables, they having been willing to continue their services, was then sworn jusqu' à autre ordre. I should wish to say, with regard to the case of Flinn, which was mentioned yesterday, as not having been arrested by the constable: the reason why the Court did not authorize the constable to take Flinn into custody was, not because they did not consider the identity sufficiently proved, but because it did not appear that any felony was charged against him, nor that any warrant had been issued for his apprehension. In any previous cases of the kind which I have known, the authorities have never been called upon to lend their assistance in apprehending a party for anything committed out of the Island, except upon charges of felony and upon the exhibition of a warrant.

4304. Was not this a case of embezzlement?—The Bailiff. There was no evidence to shew that it was not the case of a defaulter: and it appears probable that it was a case of default from this circumstance, that the corporation called upon the sureties to make it good.

Mr. Carré. The Court directed the constable to write to Dublin, to inquire into the particulars, before they would authorize him to take any measures.

4305. Is it the practice of the Court never to lend their assistance, in apprehending a person charged with an offence committed in Great Britain, unless a magistrate's warrant is produced?—Only in such cases.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine

September 29th, 1846.

4306. (To the Bailiff.) Should not you consider it an advantage to have an Act of the Imperial Legislature enabling you to get at criminals in England and in Jersey for crimes committed here; and, vice versâ, for the Jersey and English authorities to get at criminals here. Might not the provision be also extended to compel the attendance of witnesses in criminal cases?—Yes. It requires some authority greater than we have in this Island. In the case of witnesses, great practical difficulty would arise here touching the mode of doing it and touching the expenses.

The Procureur. Our charters state that we are not obliged to leave Guernsey to attend Courts in England.

4307. The Bailiff. In looking at Cowell's Interpreter, voce "Abjuration:" he compares the Norman law with the English. "This part of our law," he says, "was, in some sort, practised by the Saxons, as appeareth by the laws of King Edward, set out by Mr. Lambard, num. 10; but, more directly by the Normans, evidenced by the Grand Customary, cap. 24, where the form of the oath is likewise set down with the rest of the proceedings therein, very agreeable to ours."

---

Hilary Olivier Carré, Esq., Lieutenant Bailiff.

Hilary Olivier Carré, Esq., Lieutenant Bailiff, examined.

4308. With regard to preliminary proceedings au secret: are they absolutely au secret, so that no person has any means of becoming acquainted with what passes there?—The officers of the Court, called the Prevôt, and the Sergeant, are, by sufferance, allowed to be present.

4309. Do they take any oath of secrecy?—They do not. They are sworn officers of the Court.

4310. What are the terms of their oath?—Mr. Lefebvre (Greffier). "Vous jurez et prommettez, par la foi que vous devez à Dieu, que bien et fidellement vous exercerez la charge de Prevôt de la Reine, comme à telle charge et office appartient."

4311. (To Mr. Carré.) Part of their duty, of course, would be the maintaining the secrecy of the Court on those occasions?—Yes.

4312. No note is kept of what is said by witnesses au secret?—In general, not.

4313. The interrogatoire of the prisoner, of course, remains?—Yes.

4314*a.* The Bailiff. In modern practice, there are no depositions. There appear to be some, in particular cases, in ancient books.

4314*b.* Mr. Carré. I think, only in particular cases of importance some depositions appear to have been preserved.

4315. Of course, the witnesses take no oath of secrecy: they can, therefore, report what they have said?—Yes.

4316. Has the party accused a right to have his counsel present when he is submitted to the interrogatoire?—He has not. It is essential to the interrogatoire that it be taken immediately, before the party accused has communicated with the witnesses.

4317. Could not a prisoner have a counsel by him to say, I advise you not to answer such a question?—No; he must act of his own accord.

4318. After the interrogatoire has been taken, is it always communicated to the prisoner, or his counsel?—As soon as he has chosen his counsel, a copy is delivered to the counsel himself, that is, on the subsequent day.

4319. He does not select his counsel, does he, till a subsequent day, when he is called up?—He does not select his counsel till he is summoned before the Court to plead.

4320. Which is on a subsequent day?—Yes.

4321. After the interrogatoire has been taken, does the Court ever remand for a further examination of the witnesses?—They may, and do in practice, occasionally. The prisoner is brought up in custody; he would then be of course detained in custody, or some bail be taken. When he is "constitué prisonnier pour plus ample information," he is then in the Prevôt's custody, not the constable's.

4322. He then goes out of the charge of the constable into the charge of your officer, the Prevôt?—Yes.

4323. Have the Court the power of bailing?—Not in cases of theft, or in cases of a higher nature than theft.

4324. Do you mean that they have not the power, or that it is not usual to exercise it?—I believe they have not the power.

4325. So that, in the case of a person accused of highway robbery, or felonious homicide, you could not take bail under any circumstances?—No.

4326. Mr. Le Retilley. A man, in fighting another with fists, killed his antagonist; he knocked him down, and he was killed; but it did not amount to murder, and he was bailed.

4327. Mr. Carré. In cases of homicide, the accusation is always laid as if for murder. When it appears a clear case of homicide, and not of murder, before the Cour du Quartier, he is admitted to bail.

4328. But not for cases of petty theft?—No.

4329. Is there any order of Privy Council, or Ordonnance, defining the power of the Court to take bail?—No.

4330. (To the Procureur).—Is there any passage in Terrien upon this subject?—Yes, there is, Book xii. chap. xxxii., page 513. "Si cas soit tel qu'il doye detention." C'est à sçavoir quand le cas est si grief qu'il requiert punition corporelle. Tunc enim neque fidei jussoribus neque militibus reus committi debet, verum hanc ipsam carceris pœnam ante supplicium sustinere. Mais quand le cas n'est que civil, comme dit ceste ordonnance, c'est à dire qu'il n'y gist que peine pécuniaire tant au Roy qu'á la partie, il suffit de décerner adjournement personel. Et doit l'accusé estre eslargi à caution, pourveu que ce ne soit pendant les délais, qui sont baillez pour faire les confrontations. Toutesfois en cela ne peut estre donnée certaine regle, ains depend de l'arbitre du Juge. Pareillement, combien que la qualité du crime requiere emprisonnement de la personne, toutesfois, si la preuve n'est faite par tesmoins déposans du faict principal pertinemment; et qu'il n'y ait que conjectures, en ce cas, il suffit decreter adjournement personnel; Sinon que, pour la qualité ou vilité du chargé on voye qu'il y ait notable suspicion de fuite." Also at page 514—"Vive prison est appelée quand aucun donne bons pleges qui le prennent en garde, qu'ils le rendront au jour qui est dit, ou mort ou vif sans exoine, et sans delay; ainsi comme le Geolier le rendroit s'il estait en sa garde." Again, "Vive prison. Telle provision est ordonnée aux personnes notables, et d'honneste famille quand le cas n'est fort grief." Again, Book xii. chap. xxxv., at page 523, speaking of an offence to be prosecuted by procès ordinaire, he says, "cependant eslargir l'accusé à caution limitée, selon la qualité et l'excez du delict: et à la charge de se rendre en l'estat au jour de la reception de l'enqueste." There are also passages in Mr. Le Marchant's Book, pages 226 and 239, upon the subject.

4331. (To Mr. Carré). With regard to the taking bail or the amount of the bail, is the prisoner allowed to be heard by counsel upon that point?—I do not know of any case of the kind. I do not think an application to be heard by counsel would be refused. In all cases, upon the question whether it should be allowed or not, the advice of the Crown officers would be taken.

4332. Does the Cour Royale here exercise the jurisdiction of coroner?—Yes.

4333. Do they do so by members of the Court, or through some officer?—By the members of the Court.

4334. Not through the Prevôt, but immediately?—Yes.

4335. By the Cour en Corps, or by the smaller number?—The Bailiff and two Jurats constitute the Court.

4336. That is, the Court, the full body of which would be the Bailiff and four, the quorum being the Bailiff and two Jurats?—Yes, the Cour du Quartier.

4337. Are the Crown officers present?—Always; one of them.

4338. Is it a Court which sits super visum corporis? Is the body visited by the Court?—In cases of violence, or where violence is suspected to have been committed so as to require a subsequent trial, it is considered necessary that the body should be inspected by the Court.

4339. The Procureur. The Approbation is very clear upon that point in the 28th chapter 12th Book, "Nous usons de ce chapitre, réservé que le Bailiff et Jurez avec les Officiers de Sa Majesté ont la veüe des corps et aussi y appellent tels Surgiens qui pensent estre convenable."

4340. (To Mr. Carré). How is the Court put in motion in presiding as Coroners?—The constable, or any other person, reports the death to the Crown officers and to the Bailiff, by whom the matter is brought before the Court.

4341. The Bailiff. The case is not put off till the next sitting day, but generally the Court is specially summoned.

4342. Is evidence heard before the Court?—It is.

4343. Mr. Carré. The constables of their own authority, or on being required by the Crown officers, collect all the evidence which they can discover, and bring the witnesses before the Court.

4344. Is this proceeding au secret?—When brought before the Court it is au secret. The witnesses are examined separately and in private.

4345. Are they examined on oath?—They are.

4346. Does the inquiry go to the mode in which the death has been occasioned?—Yes: the cause of death is investigated, as completely as it is possible to discover from the evidence.

4347. Are medical men examined?—One medical man, at least, is almost invariably examined.

4348. If it should appear that death has been caused under circumstances which would lead to the supposition that a crime has been committed, does the Court upon that occasion proceed to trace the author of the crime as far as they can?—Certainly.

4349. Are the conclusions of the Crown officers heard?—They are.

4350. What is the technical name of the inquest?—It is called the "Levée de Corps."

4351—52. Do you distinguish between suicide in cases of mental aberration and suicide done wilfully?—Yes. I do not remember any case myself; but the form is different, and in the case of death by accident.

4353. Supposing the result is wilful murder against a party, is he then interrogated?—The investigation, upon which the act is drawn up, is used as evidence to authorise the Court to commit any person who may be accused.

4354. Does it take the place of the ordinary evidence au secret?—Yes. It may be made to form part of the usual investigation, au secret, but not necessarily so.

4355. In a case in which the evidence leads the Court to the result that the death has been caused by wilful murder?—In that case, if the party were not apprehended, the constable would receive orders to apprehend him.

4356. Is the conclusion come to before the party is heard or seen?—There are two distinct actes; the Levée de Corps, then the acte d'accusation and the interrogatoire.

4357. (To the Bailiff). How far does the Acte of the Levée de corps take the place of the other proceeding?—I think it forms but one step: it is not substituted for the acte d'accusation.

4358. Mr. Carré. It is quite distinct from the acte d'accusation: the Levée de corps is a distinct proceeding; but the Court, at the same sitting, may go on to investigate the accusation against the party.

4359. Supposing they go on to do so at the same sitting, the man being in custody, could they, the moment they had made up their minds that it was murder, call in the man, without hearing the evidence anew?—Certainly; they could do so.

4360. Would they read to the accused the evidence given on the Levée de corps?—Yes. But the evidence on the Levée de corps is never used beyond the day on which it is given.

GUERNSEY.

Hilary Olivier Carré, Esq., Lieutenant Bailiff.

September 29th, 1846.

4361. We understand you to say that, if the person was within reach, the moment you had come to your decision on the Levée de corps, you would have the prisoner brought in and interrogated?—An acte of accusation would first be drawn up and read to him.

4362. Then you do not go through the evidence afresh?—No.

4363. Is the accused in the same position as if the evidence had been taken in the ordinary manner?—Exactly so.

4364. Mr. Le Retilley. That is not so. After the inquest has taken place, the accused or suspected person is brought before the Court; and, before he is committed finally, the witnesses declare upon oath sufficient to warrant the Court to commit him.

4365. The evidence is gone through formally again is it?—Yes; not to the extent it is upon the inquest, but sufficient to warrant the Court to commit the accused.

4366. The Procureur. The Levée de corps and the proceedings for the crime, I should say, are essentially different.

4367. Mr. Carré. I should say that the two proceedings are totally distinct. That would be proved by the origin of the proceedings in either case. The form in which the Levée de corps comes before the Court is this, "Les officiers de la Reine actionnent les témoins d'enquête pour découvrir comment un tel trouvé mort est parvenu à sa fin."

The Bailli. The act of the Levée de corps only states the cause of death, not the fact that it has been occasioned by a crime.

4368. (To Mr. Lefebvre, Greffier). Will you give the Commissioners the formal mode of stating the verdict in the various cases of Levée de corps?

No. 1.—In the case of Natural Death.

"Justice ayant éte informée que Henry Mauger, fils de Daniel, de la paroisse du Câtel serait mort ce matin, dans une maison, occupée par Jâques Berger, située au Haut Pavé en la paroisse de St. Pierre Port, et les officiers de la Reine ayant fait convenir un chirurgien et des témoins dignes de foi pour découvrir comment il est parvenu à sa fin, la Cour, après avoir entendu les dits témoins par serment, et ouies les conclusions des dits officiers de la Reine, a permis à qui il appartiendra de le faire inhumer en terre sainte, après qu'il a paru à la Cour que le dit Henri Mauger, qui a longtems été dans un mauvais état de santé, est mort subitement de sa mort naturelle, après être venu en ville consulter son medicin."

4369.—No. 2.—Violent Death by Suicide from temporary insanity.

"Justice ayant été informée que Pierre D'Orange, natif de Couville, département de la Manche, trouvé noyé, le 1 Mai, 1841, dans un puits, situé dans un courtil, en la paroisse de Clos du Valle, appartenant à Mr. Frederic Thomas Falla, et les officiers de la Reine ayant fait convenir devant elle un chirurgien et des témoins dignes de foi, pour découvrir comment il est parvenu à sa fin, la Cour, après avoir entendu les dits témoins par serment, ouies les conclusions des dits officiers de la Reine, a permis à qui il appartiendra de le faire inhumer en terre sainte, après qu'il a paru à la cour que le dit D'Orange s'est noyé lorsque dans un état d'ivresse et de délire momentane."

4370. No, 3.—Violent Death by Self-murder.

"Le dix-neufième jour du mois de May mille sept-cents cinquante-trois, devant Thomas Le Marchant, Esq., Lt. Baillif, présents Messrs. Jean De Havilland, James De Beauvoir, Wm. Le Marchant, Laurens Fiott, Daniel De Lisle, Samuel Bonamy, Jean Andros, Jean Ozanne, et Jean Guille, Jurez. Sur ce que Messrs. Josias Le Marchant, et Charles Andros, jun., deputy Prevost du Roy, auroient présentement fait raport à la Cour, que s'étant ce jour d'hui transportez au Château Cornet, pour amener en justice Jean Kemp, prisonnier à la suite des officiers du Roy, étant accusé d'avoir meurtri et occis Judith Le Normand, femme de David Jehan, de la paroisse de St. Sampson, et étant entrés dans la prison où le dit Kemp étoit détenu, d'avoir trouvé le dit Kemp mort, étant pendu par le cou avec ses jarretières; la Cour, sur ce, ouies les officiers du Roy, a ordonné qu'enquête sera incessamment faite, pour découvrir comment le dit Kemp est parvenue à sa fin.

La Cour s'étant ce jour d'hui transportée au chateau, vertu d'acte ci-dessus, pour faire enquête et découvrir comment le sus-dit Kemp est parvenu à sa fin, après avoir fait visiter le corps du dit Kemp par deux chirurgiens, et avoir examiné par serment douzet émoins dignes de foi, par le témoignage desquels il est évident que le dit Kemp s'est détruit lui même, s'étant étranglé la nuit dernière avec ses jarretières dans la prison où il étoit détenu pour crime du meurtre mentioné au sus-dit acte: la dite Cour, (après avoir oui les conclusions des officiers du Roy) a jugé que le dit Kemp est coupable du crime d'homicide de soi même, et est conséquemment, suivant aux loix, duement atteint et covaincu d'avoir cõmis le meurtre dont il étoit accusé; et, pour réparation desquels crimes, est ordonné que le corps du dit Kemp, sera, Lundy prochain, entre les dix heures du matin et les quatre heures de l'après midi, livré entre les mains de l'exécuteur des hautes œuvres pour être trainé sur une claye la harte au coû, et conduit au rocher, appellé la Heronnière, proche la Tounelle du Mont Orgueil (autrement dite la Tounelle aux Pendus), pour être là pendu avec des chaines de fer, et exposé sur une potence qui sera érigée sur le dit rocher pour l'effect; et sont Mr. Le Prevost du Roy et ses députés enjoints de faire deüement excécuter la présente sentence; et sont tous les biens meubles & héritages du dit Kemp, qu'il pourroit avoir, dans ce Baillage, confiscqués à Sa Majesté, ou aux Seigneurs de Fiefs à qui il appartiendra."

4371. No. 4.—Violent Death by Homicide.

Le seizième Novembre mil huit-cent vingt-cinq, devant Daniel De Lisle Brock, Ecuier, Bailiff, présens, &c. &c. &c.

La Cour, s'étant ce jour extraordinairement assemblée sur l'information donnée à Monsieur Le Baillif que le Sieur William Brown, natif d'Angleterre, et dernièrement résident en cette Ile, seroit mort d'une mort violente ce matin, environ les sept à huit heures, proche la maison qu'il habitoit, sur les Banques en la paroisse de St. Sampson: La Cour, s'étant transportée à la dite maison, où se trouvait le cadavre du dit William Brown, pour faire enquête afin de découvrir comment le dit Brown est parvenu à sa fin, et les officiers du Roi ayant fait convenir deux chirurgiens et plusieurs autres témoins dignes de foi, lesquels ont été examinés par serment, a permis, ouië la conclusion des dits officiers du Roi, de faire inhumer le dit Brown en terre sainte, après qu'il a paru à la Cour que sa mort a été causée par un coup d'arme à feu, tiré par J. J. Chapman, alias Melmoth, fils de Jean Ecuier, la charge de laquelle arme est entrée par devant et en dessous de la clavicule de l'épaule droite, et est sortie en derrière et au travers de l'épaule droite, après avoir coupé une artère et produit une hémorragie, qui a été la cause de la mort du dit William Brown, lequel est décédé quelques instans après, en dehors et proche la dite maison.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., further examined.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq.

4372. In reply to the 8th question of the first series of the Commissioners' questions, whether any functionary has, at any and what stages of the proceedings, the power of causing criminal proceedings to be abandoned, an instance was given of proceedings being abandoned when a party becomes evidence for the Crown?—That is one instance.

4373. You mean abandoned against that particular party?—Yes.

4375. Does the abandoning of the proceedings operate as a formal acquittal of that individual, or merely guide the Crown officers in declining to prosecute him?—I think there is some doubt upon that point. In practice, I have never known proceedings recommenced after they had been so abandoned. In the case of a person admitted to give evidence, if he afterwards refused to give evidence, I apprehend the proceedings might be recommenced.

4376. Is it also in the discretion of the Crown officers to abandon the proceedings, if, at any step of the investigation, they find the evidence not likely to support the charge?—I take it they cannot abandon proceedings without the sanction of the Court.

4377. The proper course, then, is for the Crown officers to apply to the Court for leave to abandon the proceedings?—Exactly so.

4379. If the proceedings were abandoned by the Crown lawyers from some defect in the mode in which they had framed their accusation, for instance, if they had framed it in a way which would not hit the particular crime, would it, in that case, be competent for them to abandon the acte and bring forward the charge in another and a more correct shape?—Undoubtedly; some instances might be given, if it were necessary.

4380. The Bailiff. That would be probably expressed in the acte of Court.

4381. The Contrôle. The prosecution, in such a case, would be begun de novo.

4382. Would the acte of Court express the cause of the abandonment of the prosecution?—Yes.

4383. The Procureur. Here is a case of misnomer. A number of soldiers attacked a woman of the name of Emilie Du Chemin. In the indictment the word "Marie" was inserted instead of "Emilie:" and, on the day the prisoner was going to choose his counsel, the father of the woman happened to be present, and mentioned it. The Court made an acte; and the thing was rectified, and the prisoners tried afterwards.

4384. Does the acte of Court state the reason why the proceedings are abandoned?—Yes. There is an acte of Court to that effect.

4385. (To Mr. Lefebvre, Greffier). Will you produce it?

The same was put in, and is as follows.

Samedi, le vingt-huitième d'Avril, mil huit cent dix, devant Eléazar Le Marchant, Ecuyer, Lieutenant Baillif, présens Pierre De Jersey, Pierre De Havilland, Cartaret Priaulx, Jean La Serre, Josias Le Marchant, Henri Frederic Brock, Pierre Le Pelley, Jean de Lisle, et Jean Guille, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Daniel Fell, de la ville de Cork en Irlande, soldat, dans le 67$^{me}$ régiment d'infanterie en garnison en cette Ile, ayant été ce jourd'hui produit devant la Cour par le ministère de Frederic Price, Ecuyer, un des connétables de la ville et paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, étant accusé d'avoir, avec autres ses complices, félonieusement, environ les deux heures la nuit du 23$^{e}$ au 24$^{e}$ Avril, 1810, entouré sur le chemin public, proche l'église de la ville, Marie Du Chemin, fille d'Hellier, femme de Thomas Piseing, laquelle retournoit chez elle avec son mari, et ayant battu et excédé de coups le dit Piseing, et, tandis qu'il étoit empêché (iceux le tenant par force) de donner assistance à sa dite femme, avoir enlevé la dite Du Chemin, et l'avoir conduite par force et violence sur le Corps de Garde, et là avoir, le dit Fell, ou ses dits complices, commis le crime de rapt et de viol sur la personne de la dite Du Chemin, ayant deux d'entr'eux cohabité avec elle contre son gré et consentement, et avoir ensuite, le dit Fell, ou ses dits complices, par force et violence enlevé du dit Corps de Garde la dite Du Chemin, et l'avoir trainée dans un appartement sous la dite Garde, appellée le Strong Room, et là avoir, le dit Fell, ou ses dits complices, encore commis le crime de rapt et de viol sur la personne de la dite Du Chemin, quatre d'entr'eux ayant cohabité avec elle contre son gré et consentement.

La Cour, après avoir pris par écrit l'interrogatoire du dit Fell, a ordonné que le dit Fell sera constitué prisonnier au Château Cornet pour plus ample information.

Vendredi, le onzième de Mai, mil huit-cent dix, devant Monsieur le Lieutenant Baillif, présens &c.

Daniel Fell, constitué prisonnier au Château Cornet pour plus ample information, vertu d'acte du 28$^{e}$ Avril, 1810, ayant été ce jourd'hui, réproduit devant la Cour. Il a été ordonné, après avoir entendu des témoins dignes de foi, que le dit Fell sera constitué prisonnier au dit Château pour que les officiers du Roi informent contre lui.

Samedi, le dix-neuvième de Mai, mil huit-cent dix, devant Pierre De Havilland, Ecuyer, Baillif, présens, &c. &c.

Les officiers du Roi prouveront les fins de l'action qu'ils ont contre Daniel Fell de la ville de Cork en Irlande, soldat dans le 67$^{me}$ regiment d'infanterie en garnison en cette Ile, prisonnier au Château Cornet, à se voir adjuger au peines et punitions imposées par les loix, pour avoir, le dit Fell, avec autres ses complices, félonieusement, environ les deux heures la nuit du 23e au 24e Avril, 1810, entouré sur le chemin public, proche l'église de la ville MARIE, Du Chemin, fille de Hellier, femme de Thomas Piseing, &c. (setting out the facts as before). Après que le dit Fell a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime et a fait choix de l'Avocat Le Cocq pour son conseil.

Mardi, le vingt-deuxième de Mai, mil huit-cent dix devant Pierre De Havilland, Ecuyer, Bailiff, présens, &c.

La Cour, informée d'une erreur qui s'est glissée dans les procédures en crime commencées contre Daniel Fell, présentement prisonnier au Château Cornet, en ce qu'il est accusé d'avoir, avec autres ses complices, félonieusement commis divers crimes, et excès, portés aux Actes de cette Cour du 28e Avril dernier, et 11e et 19e de Mai courant, et, entr'autres, d'avoir, le dit Fell, ou ses dits complices, commis le crime de rapt et de viol, et autres crimes et excès sur la person de MARIE Du Chemin, femme de Thomas Piseing, au lieu que le nom de la dite femme du dit Piseing est EMILIE Du Chemin, a ordonné que le dit Fell sera fait convenir de nouveau devant la Cour pour qu'il ait connoissance de la dite erreur, et qu'il réponde à l'accusation qui sera derigée contre lui, tant pour les dits crimes et excès commis sur la personne de la dite Emilie Du Chemin, que pour les autres crimes portés aux dits Actes du 28e Avril dernier, 11e et 19e de Mai courant.

Mercredi, le vingt-troisième de Mai, mil huit-cent dix, devant Pierre De Havilland, Ecuyer, Baillif, présens, &c.

Daniel Fell de la ville de Cork en Irlande, soldat dans le 67e régiment d'infanterie en garnison en cette Ile, ayant été, ce jourd'hui, produit devant la Cour, conformément à l'acte de cette Cour du 22e du courant, étant présentement accusé d'avoir, avec autres ses complices, félonieusement, environ les deux heures la nuit du 23e au 24e Avril, 1810, entouré sur le chemin public, proche l'église de la ville, EMILIE Du CHEMIN, fille d'Hellier, femme de Thomas Piseing, &c. (setting out the facts as before).

La Cour, après avoir pris par écrit l'interrogatoire du dit Fell, et entendu par serment des témoins dignes de foi, a ordonné qu'il sera constitué prisonnier au Château Cornet pour que les officiers du Roi informent contre lui.

Samedi, le vingt-sixième de Mai, mil huit-cent dix, devant Pierre De Havilland, Ecuyer, Bailiff, présens, &c.

L'action de Daniel Fell de la ville de Cork en Irlande, soldat dans le 67e régiment d'infanterie en garnison en cette Ile, prisonnier au Château Cornet, contre les officiers du Roi—à voir la Cour faire droit sur l'action des dits officiers du Roi contre le dit Daniel Fell, à se voir adjugé aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix, pour avoir, le dit Fell, avec autres ses complices, félonieusement, environ les deux heures la nuit du 23e au 24e Avril, 1810, entouré, sur le chemin public, proche l'église de la ville, Marie Du Chemin, fille d'Hellier, femme de Thomas Piseing, &c. (setting out the facts as before); après que par acte du 19e Mai, 1810, il a été ordonné que les dits officiers du Roi vérifieraient les fins de leur action, après que le dit Fell a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime, et a fait choix de l'Avocat Le Cocq, pour son conseil, a été rejettée, et le dit Fell aux fraix.

Les officiers du Roi prouveront les fins de l'action qu'ils ont contre Daniel Fell de la ville de Cork en Irlande, soldat dans le 67e régiment d'infanterie, en garnison en cette Ile, prisonnier au Château Cornet, à se voir adjuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix, pour avoir, le dit Fell, avec autres ses complices, félonieusement, environ les deux heures la nuit du 23e au 24e Avril, 1810, entouré sur le chemin public, proche l'église de la ville, Emilie Du Chemin, fille d'Hellier, femme de Thomas Piseing, &c. (setting out the facts as before). Après que le dit Fell a fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime, et a fait choix de l'avocat Le Cocq pour son Conseil.

Samedi, le septième Juillet, mil huit-cent dix, devant Pierre De Havilland, Ecuyer, Bailiff, présens, &c.

Daniel Fell de la ville de Cork en Irlande, soldat dans le 67e régiment d'infanterie, en garnison en cette Ile, prisonnier au Château Cornet, amerci envers les officiers du Roi, et est après preuve d'avoir le dit Fell, avec autres ses complices, félonieusement, environ les deux heures la nuit du 23e au 24e Avril, 1810, entouré, sur le chemin public, proche l'église de la ville, Emilie Du Chemin, fille d'Hellier, femme de Thomas Piseing, &c. (setting out the facts as before). Aux fins d'acte du 26e Mai, 1810, pour punition et réparation des quels crimes, est le dit Fell condamné à être réconduit prisonnier au Château Cornet, là être gardé en basse-fosse pour être, Vendredi prochain, livré à l'exécution de la haute Justice, pour par lui être conduit au lieu du supplice, la harte au col, et là être pendu par le col et étranglé, jusqu'à ce que mort s'en ensuive. Et sont ses biens meubles et héritages, si aucuns a, confisqués et acquis à Sa Majesté, ou au Seigneur du fief à qui droit aura; aprés les frais du procès pris sur iceux."

4384. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Would it be competent, upon the proceedings recommencing, for the counsel for the party to insist that the charge, as then framed, was identical with the old charge, and that, therefore, the prisoner was entitled to his acquittal?—I should say decidedly not. It is the particular proceeding which is abandoned, not the right of prosecution.

4385. The Contrôle. Of course all amendments must take place before the trial has once begun.

4387. What would be the proper time to take the objection?—After all the evidence has been taken in writing.

4388. The evidence, au grand criminel, having been taken down in writing at previous meetings of the Court, we understand the trial commences by reading the whole of the proceedings, the plea of the prisoner, and the whole of the evidence taken; then the counsel for the prisoner is heard generally upon the case. Is that the proper time to take advantage of this objection?—Yes.

4389. Supposing the counsel for the defence were to say, "Taking all this as true, it is not a crime known to our law," would that objection be taken before or after the evidence is heard?—I have known it taken before, and after. Our general practice is to take the objection after the evidence has been gone into; but I have known many cases in which the objection has been taken before the evidence has been gone into. I recollect one case particularly, the Crown versus Cumber, and the Crown versus Gallien for an alleged fraud. The objection upon that occasion was taken before any evidence was gone into, and the accusation was set aside.

4390. If the objection were taken before the witnesses were heard, and prevailed, what would be the consequence of it upon a subsequent accusation?—I have never known the question raised here. If you asked me my private opinion, I should say that a new accusation could be brought in proper form; but that is merely my private opinion.

4391. That, upon the face of it, would not be identical with the former one?—Certainly; and that is the principle upon which I give my opinion.

4392. In that case it would be the interest of the accused to take the objection after the evidence has been heard?—In general, I should say, it was; for it may often be the object of the defendant's counsel to shew, although the acte d'accusation does not contain, upon the face of it, an indictable offence, that, in point of fact, the accused is not guilty even of the facts alleged.

4393. In cases au petit criminel, you do not know your evidence till you hear it on the trial?—No.

4394. Then, by taking the objection afterwards, it would put the counsel for the defence in possession of the evidence to be brought against him on the second trial?—Exactly so.

4395. The Bailiff. The Commissioners ask what would be the effect, if the objection were taken; I apprehend the answer to mean that, if the objection is taken preliminarily, you may have another trial; if it is taken after evidence you cannot have another trial.

4396. Do you think, if the acte d'accusation were set aside on the ground that it did not, upon the face of it, set forth any crime, that would be any answer to a second accusation which did?—I do not know what would be done in that case. I do not exactly know what the form of the judgment would be supposing that to be the case.

4397. Mr. MacCulloch. In a case where an objection was taken before the evidence was gone into and the objection prevailed, the finding would be "action rejetée," and not "au silence."

4398. The Bailiff. In civil cases, the right of action is not touched; and Mr. MacCulloch appears to be of opinion that the same would be the effect in criminal proceedings; and I am inclined to think so too.

4399. In civil matters might not you bring the same action again in the same words?

4400. Mr. MacCulloch. No, not in the same words.

4401. The Bailiff. If it were after the evidence, I do not conceive it would be action rejetée.

4402. Mr. MacCulloch. I think not; I think, if the evidence had been gone into, and the acte stated, "Les officiers de la Reine à silence," then you could not bring the party to trial again.

4403. Are there any gentlemen belonging to the Court who fill the office of attorneys or écrivains?—There are none recognized by law, though, in practice, there are many who so act.

4404. What is the nature of the business which they transact?—It is rather difficult to define it.

4405. Are they officers of the Court at all?—Not in any way or shape.

4406. Are they persons who, not being regularly educated for the bar, get up cases, and put instructions into the hands of the advocates?—Yes; they very often hold a power of attorney from the parties concerned.

4407. The Bailiff. I do not know that, in criminal business, there would be any functions which they could exercise.

4408. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Are the facts collected for the defence, in cases where the defence is at all complicated, by the gentlemen of the bar themselves?—They are to a certain extent; as far as they are able to collect them. But the means of collecting them are very limited. In general the advocate must depend principally upon the statement made to him by the party charged.

4409. In what way is the brief of the defendant's counsel collected together?—He has no brief at all. I may state that, in practice, the usual course is, after a party charged has chosen his counsel, as it is termed here, for the counsel to see the party at the prison, and collect the facts from him as well as he is able.

4410. In a case which might frequently arise, for instance, in indictments for forgery, the prisoner might misrepresent the effect of the evidence he expected very fatally. Would the counsel for the prisoner, generally, think it necessary to hear from the witness what he was going to say, without taking the prisoner's word for it?—In a case of any importance, the counsel for the prisoner would endeavour to see one or two of the principal witnesses, or would send a clerk to them to get as much information as he could.

4411. Wherever he thought a mistake would be dangerous?—Yes.

4412. It is sometimes very necessary to save people from their own witnesses?—I am quite aware of that.

4413. Supposing disbursements are necessary in the course of the cause, do they go through the hands of the counsel first?—There are no disbursements necessary.

4414. Take the case of procuring documents from England, which might be essential to proof of a prisoner's innocence?—I have never known such a case occur. In such a case, I should not feel bound, as the prisoner's counsel, to advance the money.

4415. We understand that, though the gentlemen of the bar consider themselves bound, where a prisoner has not the means to pay for it, to undertake his defence gratuitously, yet, where prisoners have the means, they are as much retained for them as in civil cases?—Yes; those cases are not very frequent.

GUERNSEY.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq.

September 29th 1846.

4416. In those cases, does the counsel make out his own account against his client?—He does in every case; and the reason of it is plain, that the advocates here perform the duties both of solicitors and barristers.

4417. Is there any kind of tribunal here to investigate the correctness of the costs?—I conceive it would be just the same as any private account between party and party. The account might be subjected to a decision of the Court.

4418. Does any such thing exist here as a right of action on the part of a counsel for his fees?—Yes: there is no taxing officer; but the Court would examine the account, just as in any other case.

4419. The Court possesses the power of displacing gentlemen of the bar, does not it?—I conceive the Court has that power.

4420. And of suspending?—Yes.

4421. Does the Court act of its own motion in such a case, or is there anything like a tribunal of honour?—There is nothing like a tribunal of honour.

4422. Would the gentleman be heard whose conduct was impeached?—I should think he would; it would depend upon circumstances.

4423. That would depend, perhaps, upon the good sense and conscience of the Court?—I think, entirely so.

4424. Is it the whole Court, or the Bailiff, who possesses the power?—The whole Court.

4425. Is there any appeal?—No.

4426. Before a gentleman is admitted an advocate, we understand there is no certificate necessary?—No.

4427. Is there any application or notice given to the Court?—There is an application or notice given to the Court.

4428. At what distance of time?—It varies very much; generally, at an interval of some months; but it is rather in the shape of a private application to each member of the Court. The practice has rather varied upon that subject.

4429. Mr. Carré. Frequently, notice has been given before the person commenced his legal education.

4430. That is, a gentleman, before he commences his legal education, endeavours to ascertain whether it is worth his while to do so?—It does not amount to that. At one time, there was a book kept, containing the names of persons who were candidates for the bar. They had their names inscribed before their education commenced.

4431. At that time, was any length of time necessary before the party could be admitted after inscribing his name in the book?—No.

4432. Mr. MacCulloch. That book was kept for some time; but some inconvenience arose from the circumstance that the party whose name was first on the list used to consider himself as primarily entitled to come in at the first vacancy. I believe it was agreed, afterwards, that the keeping of the book should be discontinued.

4432. How long ago is that?—Ten or fifteen years ago.

4433. Is the competition at all strong to come in?—Not at present; a few years ago there was some little competition.

4433. The Procureur. I think I am correct in stating that from 1806 to 1822 there were only three advocates at the bar. The greater part of the time there were only two, besides the King's officers.

4434. The Contrôle. From 1829 to this time, the bar has only been full two or three years.

4435. (To Mr. MacCulloch). Several gentlemen, in answering question sixteen, have used the expression, "after the plea is taken." What is technically the time when the plea is taken?—We understand it to be after the party charged has been committed for trial. He then is summoned by the Crown lawyers. The summons contains a copy of the charge; and he is then asked, are you Guilty or Not guilty.

4436. Is that in open Court?—Yes; it used to be before the full Court; now, by an Order in Council, it may be before any Court, or on any day.

4437. What is the ordinary time which elapses before the proceeding by interrogatoire would commence?—About a week. If a man is committed pour plus information, it may drag on for some weeks; but it is generally a week.

4438. From the interrogatoire to the plea is how long?—About two days, generally; seldom more than a week.

4439. How long is it from that to the trial?—It varies very much, according to circumstances.

4440. Would it be shorter au petit criminel?—In cases au petit criminel, or in term time, it would be from a week to a fortnight, at the most.

4441. In term time, how often does the Court sit?—Four days a week.

4442. The Bailiff. For criminal cases only on the Saturday.

4443. Mr. MacCulloch. The proper terms for proceedings au petit criminel, or au grand criminel, are these. The Chief Pleas are held the first Monday after the 15th of January; and the second Saturday after that is the commencement of the term for criminal cases; the term continues till the Saturday which precedes Passion week. The Chief Pleas, after Easter, are held on the first Monday after Easter week; the second Saturday after the Chief Pleas, the term commences, and closes upon the Saturday immediately preceding the 15th of July. The next Chief Pleas are on the first Monday after Michaelmas day; the term commences on the second Saturday after the Chief Pleas, and closes on the Saturday preceding Christmas day. Strictly speaking, criminal cases, after the committal for trial, or an Acte au Quartier, can only be tried during those terms. That explains the answer I previously gave,

GUERNSEY.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq.

September 29th, 1846.

that, supposing a party to be committed for trial in term time, he would generally be brought to trial within a week or fortnight afterwards. The practice is, that out of term you cannot try any man against his will; nor do I consider the Court bound to try him even upon his request. But, in practice, parties charged are continually in the habit, through their counsel, of asking to be tried out of term; and the application is generally granted. I have, however, known some hesitation to take place when a crime has been of a very serious nature. I should have some doubts whether the Court would try a man for murder out of term. I know a doubt has been expressed upon the subject.

4444. In term, the interval from the interrogatoire to the pleading would be from Thursday to Saturday?—Yes.

4445. What is the interval from the plea to the trial?—A week or a fortnight, according to circumstances. If there are several parties in prison who have to be tried, it is impossible that they should all be tried on the next Saturday: and some delay may, occasionally, occur from the absence from the Island of material witnesses.

4446. May delay also arise from the mode of taking depositions au grand criminel?—I am speaking, now, of cases in which the depositions are not taken in writing. The delay would be longer, of course, from the necessity of taking the evidence in writing, which is a very tedious process.

Wednesday 30*th September,* 1846.

Mr. Peter John Agnew examined.

Mr. Peter John Agnew.

September 30th, 1846.

4447. The Commissioners understand you wish to make some observation to them.—I wish to observe that there have been no paupers sent out of the Island in my time, unless by their own consent, or by order of the Court. They were brought before the Court; and we obtained an acte of Court to that effect.

4448. When were you constable?—In part of 1828 and 1829.

4449. For the town parish?—Yes. I wish, also, to observe how much we are exposed to be imposed upon by some of these paupers. In April, 1829, a family came either from Manchester or Norwich. They were sent here by the authorities of that town. They came by the government packet from Weymouth. They applied to me for relief.

4450. How soon after their arrival?—On arriving. I placed them in the poor-house and desired the master of the poor-house to have them well taken care of, and to examine their clothes. The man was stripped; and, in the back of his waistcoat, was found a pensioner's certificate. He had given out, of course, in Manchester or Norwich, that he was a native of this place. The certificate being found, of course, we came to know where he was from.

4451. The certificate does not state the parish of his settlement, but the parish of his residence?—Yes. I produced the man in Court, and I had an acte of Court, which is registered at the Greffe.

4452. What is the nature of the imposition to which you wish to draw the Commissioners' attention in this case?—He gave out that he was a native of this place; and he and his wife and family were sent here.

4453. How did you find out that he was not a native of the Island?—We examined the parish books, and could not find his name here.

4454. Which parish books did you look at?—The town parish.

4455. Why did you select those books, instead of any other?—He mentioned the town parish.

4456. He himself said he was born in the town parish?—Yes.

4457. Are all births registered in the town parish books?—All baptisms are registered.

4458. Are persons of all persuasions baptized in the town parish?—Yes; I should say each church has its registry here.

4459. Do they baptize people of all sects in the town parish church?—Those that are born in the parish. Dissenters register in their own chapels. This man was returned to England with this acte of Court; and nothing more was heard of the person or his family.

4460. You sent him back to Manchester?—Yes.

4461. Who brought him?—One of the packets.

4462. Was he in charge of any person?—No: the master of the packet was bound to bring him, I suppose.

4463. There were no parish officers from Manchester or Norwich with him?—No.

4464. Do you ever recollect any parish authorities coming over here with paupers?—Yes.

4465. How long ago would that be?—It must have been in 1832 or 1833. My brother was in office at that time, I think; it was from St. Pancras.

4466. Do you recollect any Manchester authorities coming here?—No.

4467. In the St. Pancras case, did it turn out that the paupers were settled here?—It was not in my time.

4468. What became of the parish officers?

The Procureur.—A person, of the name of Capes, came here with several paupers. There was a doubt whether they were born in Guernsey; but they were all soldiers' children, and had no right to relief from Guernsey.

4469—70. Is it the rule that, if they were soldiers' children born in Guernsey, they have no right of relief here?—Yes. The person who brought them to the Island was ordered to take them away again. He did not do so. He was arrested; and a habeas corpus was sent over in the usual manner: and Sir John De Veulle, the Bailiff of Jersey, Mr. Dupré, King's Advocate in Jersey, and the late Mr. Brock, Bailiff of Guernsey, and myself, went over, as deputies from Jersey and Guernsey to London, in August 1832. The matter was represented to the Secretary of State. We had several interviews with him, and made different representations, but one in particular, which I have before me: and, finally, there was an understanding that the officer should be put out of prison.

GUERNSEY.

Mr. Peter John Agnew.

September 30th, 1846.

4471. How came it that he was not taken to England under the habeas corpus?—We did not then hold that Writ to run in this island. It was before the late decision upon the subject. The officer was put out of prison. He embarked; and the paupers were put on board the same ship with him: and we have heard nothing more about it since.

4472. Is there an Ordonnance, or is it the custom that the children of soldiers in garrison born here do not thereby gain a settlement here?—It is the common law of the country. There is also the Ordonnance of 1821, the first article of which says: "Tout enfant légitime appartient de la paroisse de son père, quoiqu'il n'y soit point né; il suit, jusqu'à ce qu'il soit d'âge, les changements de paroisse de son père, et continuera, après, de la paroisse dont appartenait le père lorsqu'il est devenu d'âge, à l'exception des cas spécifiés dans la présente ordonnance."

4473. If any gentleman, born in England, had a child born here, would he be considered a Guernsey man?—No; not till he became of age.

4474. That law does not attach merely to soldiers in garrison, but it attaches to anybody, does not it?—Yes, to anybody. By the common law of the Island, whoever brings a stranger here, who becomes chargeable within a year and a day after his arrival, is bound to pay his passage back. An individual, for example, sends to England for a servant: that individual is bound to pay the passage of that servant back, supposing he or she becomes chargeable within a year and a day; and the captain of the vessel which has brought over a person who becomes chargeable within a fortnight after his arrival is bound to take him back at his own expense.

4475. Mr. Agnew.—I had an uncle who was residing at Southampton, about forty years ago: he brought a servant with him from Southampton. On bringing the servant here, he signed a bail of 50*l.*, at the Police office, that she should not be chargeable to the parish. Some little time after, she left his service and went to reside with another person, and was there some time. My uncle did not take the legal measure of going to the Police office to cancel his bail of 50*l.*: and that servant, some time after, was taken ill, and was taken to the poor-house; a bill was sent to him, and he had to pay about 38*l.* expenses.

4476. We are to understand the law to be that a person is in strictness bound to execute an instrument of that sort?—It is the custom.

4477. The Contrôle.—It is practised in the country parishes to this day. There is a printed form kept: and, when a person brings persons to the Island, in that way of a low class of life, they are bound to sign an instrument of that kind. We had a case of that kind about two years ago.

4478. The Procureur.—I have here the act of Court on the arrest of Capes the parish officer from St. Pancras.

The same was read as follows.

Hilary De Garis Agnew et Jean Mellish, Esc$^{s}$., Connétables de la ville et paroisse de S$^{t}$. Pierre Port, ont déclaré par serment que le Sieur Jean Capes, officier de la paroisse de Saint Pancras, en la ville de Londres, amena dans cet Ile, le 15 Décembre, 1831, ou environ, cinq pauvres présens, et, en conséquence, demande de faire arrêt de la personne du dit Capes, pour l'obliger à leur donner caution de cent livres stg., qu'il répondra jusqu' à fin de plaid et du jugé, en la cause qu'ils se proposent d'intenter contre le dit Capes, à se voir ajuger leur donner bonne et suffisante caution, qu'il répondra du maintien des dits pauvres, pendant leur séjour en cette Ile, aux fins d'acte d'amerci du 15$^{e}$ Décembre, 1831; et, Secondo, qu'il leur donnera bonne et suffisante caution de payer tous les fraix nécessaires pour renvoyer les dits pauvres hors de cette Ile, le dit Capes, au dit nom, étant tenu et obligé, tant au dit maintien qu'aux fraix de renvoi, suivant loi et coûtume. Et ce, si mieux n'aime le dit Capes, au dit nom, renvoyer les dits pauvres hors de cette Ile à ses fraix, le dit Capes étant sur son départ.

Sermenté le 23$^{e}$ Mars, 1832.
D. D. L. Brock, Baillif.

H. D. G. Agnew,
John Mellish, Jr.,
} Connétables.

En conséquence du serment ci-dessus et en l'autre coté, je permets aux dits Mess$^{rs}$. Agnew et Mellish, au dit nom, de faire arrêt de la personne du dit Capes, au dit nom, lequel amena dans cette Ile cinq pauvres, ou pieds poudreux, vers le 15$^{e}$ Décembre, 1831, lesquels sont à la charge de la dite paroisse, de faire arrêt de la personne du dit Capes au dit nom pour l'obliger à leur donner caution de cent livres stg., qu'il répondra jusqu' à fin de plaid et du jugé, en la cause que les dits Connétables se proposent d'intenter contre lui, à se voir ajugé primo leur donner bonne et suffisante caution qu'il répondra du maintien des dits pauvres pendant leur séjour en cette Ile, aux fins d'acte du 15$^{e}$ Décembre, 1831, et secondo qu'il leur donnera bonne et suffisante caution de payer tous les fraix nécessaires pour renvoyer les dits pauvres hors de cette Ile, le dit Capes, au dit nom, étant tenu et obligé tant au dit maintien qu'aux fraix de renvoi, suivant loi et coûtume. Et ce, si mieux n'aime le dit Capes, au dit nom, renvoyer les dit pauvres hors de cette Ile, à ses fraix, le dit Capes au dit nom étant sur son départ de cette Ile. Et au défaut &c.

Le 23$^{e}$ Mars, 1832. D. D. Le Brock, Baillif.

Je sous-signé, vertu de mon office et de la permission ci-dessus écrite, certifie avoir fait arrêt de la personne du dit Mr. Capes, sur quoi, les dits Connétables ayant déclaré au dit Mr. Capes être prêts de se satisfaire de sa promesse de ne point quitter cette Ile, sans prendre les dits pauvres avec lui, jusqu'à autre ordre, et le dit Capes promis de ne point quitter cette Ile aux fins que dessus: le 24$^{e}$ Mars, 1832.

Thomas Le Retilley, D$^{te}$. Prevôt du Roi.

GUERNSEY.

Mr. Peter John Agnew.

September 30th, 1846.

Je sous-signé, vertu de mon office et de la permission d'arrêt ci-dessus écrite, certifie avoir, ce jour, constitué le dit Mr. Capes prisonnier dans la prison publique, et ce, attendu qu'il est venu, ce jour, me déclarer qu'il ne vouloit plus continuer la promesse qu'il m'avoit donnée, le 24e Mars dernier, de ne point quitter cette Ile, sans prendre les dits pauvres avec lui, aux fins de mon rapport ci-dessus, quoique les dits Connétables lui ont déclaré être prêts de se satisfaire de sa dite promesse, comme par le passé, s'il vouloit la continuer; ce qu'il a refusé de faire, ou de donner la caution de cent livres sterling demandée dans la permission d'arrêt.

Guernesey ce 3e Août, 1832. THOMAS LE RETILLEY, Dte Prevôt du Roi.

Je soussigné, vertu de mon office, certifie avoir, ce jour, à la requête de Messrs. les Connétables relâché le dit Mr. Capes de prison.

Ce 8e Août, 1832. THOMAS LE RETILLEY, Dte Prevôt du Roi.

4479. The Procureur. By the custom of the Island any stranger liable to an action may be required to give bail that he will execute the judgment of the Court. The first proceedings in this case are contained in an Acte of the 15th December, which explains the view the Court took of the law.

The same was read as follows.

Le quinze Décembre, mil huit—cent trente—un, devant Daniel De Lisle Brock, Ecuyer, Baillif, présens Jean Le Serre, Pierre Le Pelley, Jean Le Pelley, Jean Le Marchant, William Collings, H. O. Carré, Frédéric Mansell et Pierre Bonamy Dobrée, Ecuyer Jurés.

La Cour s'est, aujourdhui, extraordinairement assemblée en conséquence de l'arrivée de John Capes, officier de la paroisse de St Pancras, en la ville de Londres, accompagné d'un homme de loi, et amenant ici cinq pauvres à charge à la dite paroisse, dont l'un, William Locker agé de dix neuf ans, est, disent ils, natif du Val, et les autres, James Streep, agé de dix neuf ans, dit natif de St Pierre Port avec sa femme et deux enfans, les dits Locker et Streep, tous deux, fils de soldats nés en garnison en cette Ile, le dit Capes demandant aux procureurs des pauvres et connétables du Val et de St Pierre Port présens de prendre, sur leurs paroisses respectives, la charge des dits pauvres, en vertu de l'Acte de Parlement du 19e Mars 1830,* enregîtré sur les records de cette Ile, le 18e Octobre 1831: la Cour, en faisant droit entre les dites parties, et après les avoir entendues, considérant que l'evénement casuel de naissance sous de pareilles circonstances ne peut assujettir les paroisses de cette Ile au maintien des dits pauvres; considérant que l'Acte de Parlement précité n'a en vue, ainsi que son titre le porte, que de régler le transport des pauvres, de prevenir les abus et les dépens dont se plagnaient les ports de Southampton et de Weymouth, comme le prouve la correspondance qu'eut lieu alors entre les autorités de Southampton, la Cour Royale et le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté, et d'obliger, à l'avenir, les paroisses, qui chercheroient à faire passer leurs pauvres dans ces Iles, à en supporter les frais; considérant qu'un Acte ainsi réglémentaire n'a pu changer les loix fondamentales du pays, loix qui n'ont rien de commun avec les loix d'Angleterre pour le maintien des pauvres, loix qui émanent, non des Actes de Parlement, mais de la volonté des habitans confirmée et mise en vigeur par les autorités locales légalement constituées; considérant que les enfans de soldats en garnison n'ont jamais acquis d'établissement à raison de leur naissance casuelle en cette Ile, et que quand même une loi le leur donnerait à l'avenir, elle ne pourrait avoir un effet rétroactif: la Cour, se fondant sur des principes de droit aussi incontestables, reconnaissant entièrement les dispositions de l'Acte du 19e Mars, 1830, quant aux pauvres qui ont de justes réclamations à l'assistance des paroisses de cette Ile, et prête, ainsi que ces paroisses, à recueiller tous les pauvres natifs et indigènes du pays, a jugé, sans entrer dans les raisons particulières qui sont alleguées, par les paroisses du Val et de St Pierre Port contre l'admission des pauvres mineurs en question, que les dites paroisses ne sont pas tenues du maintien des dits pauvres; par conséquent est le dit Capes à silence et aux fraix quant à sa dite demande, lequel sera tenu personnellement du maintien des dits pauvres pendant leur séjour en cette Ile.

4480. The Bailiff. The proceeding of the 15th December is not quite an action between the parties; the case was brought before the Court by all the parties having come before it; the expression au silence rather belongs to the case of an action.

---

Mr. William Moullin examined.

Mr. William Moullin.

4481. Do you wish to address any remark to the Commissioners?—I wish, on the part of the Douzaine, not to individualize cases, but to explain the causes why paupers are sent away from this Island. When strangers apply to the constables, who are the parish treasurers for relief, it is given: but, when they find that they have no ostensible means of gaining a livelihood, they are forwarded to their parishes just as paupers would be forwarded from one parish to another, in England. It was stated by a gentleman that he had sent away a great number of paupers at their own request. In nine cases out of ten, paupers apply for passes: I may take this occasion to state that there are from forty to fifty families of strangers who receive allowances from this parish.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine, further examined.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

4482. You have some returns to lay before the Commissioners?—Yes. Here are two books, one headed "Prosecutions au Criminal Ordinaire," from January, 1826, to December, 1845, inclusive. Here is a table of ten years, from 1836 to 1845 inclusive. This table states that two hundred and twenty four persons have been tried during the ten years. It then goes on to state the number of persons tried au Grand Criminel, the number of acquittals, the number of persons condemned to transportation, the number of persons condemned to death, of whom there is not one, the number of persons fined, the number of persons condemned to imprisonment and banishment, the number of persons condemned to give bail, the number of persons condemned to imprisonment alone, the number of persons condemned to imprisonment and bail. Those who were English, Irish, Scotch, French, Guernsey, Jersey, Alderney, other countries, unknown. Under the article dismissed, when dismissed no record is made or kept.

* The 11 G. 4 & 1 W. 4, c. 5. "An Act to repeal the Provisions of certain Acts relating to the Removal of Poor Persons born in the Isles of Jersey and Guernsey, and chargeable to Parishes in England, and to make other Provisions in lieu thereof."

GUERNSEY.

4483. This does not contain the charges?—The books contain the charges. I have another table (producing the same) which distinguishes the different countries, from which those who have been tried came, and the number of persons fined; one English, one Irish, no Scotch, and so on. Here is the table for the Police Correctionelle, which I have headed "Summary Prosecutions, from January, 1836, to December, 1845, in the Court of Police Correctionnelle." The total for ten years is twelve hundred and one; the number of offences against property, the number of offences against the person, the number for disorderly conduct, and miscellaneous.

4484. The Bailiff. In the Police Correctionnelle, if a charge is made for any Police matter, and the person is acquitted, no entry of it is made. I do not suppose there is one person out of six who is brought up who is not either punished or committed.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq., further examined.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq.

4485. You are a good deal engaged in the defence of prisoners, are not you?—Very often.

4486. The Commissioners are informed that, when the defendant calls witnesses, the relevancy of the facts they are called to prove is a matter which the Court judges of before they are called?—Only au Grand Criminel, when the evidence is taken down in writing.

4487. A l'Ordinaire, does not the accused or his counsel deliver a list of the witnesses he proposes to call to the officers of the Crown?—No: perhaps, the Crown officers have a right to ask for a list; but I have never seen it done. It is necessary, however, that the summons should be signed by the Crown lawyers.

4488. Do they exercise any discretion as to signing the summons?—I have never seen any hesitation in doing so.

4489. There is a separate summons for each witness, is not there?—Yes.

4490. And each has the signature of one of the officers of the Crown?—Of one or both.

4491. The Procureur. The forms were sent to the Commissioners.

4492. (To Mr. Falla.) Does the counsel for the prisoner, in a case au Grand Criminel, state, on applying for a summons, what facts he wishes to prove?—Yes: then the Court decides whether the prisoner is to be admitted to prove those facts: afterwards the prisoner gives a list of the witnesses he wishes to call.

4493. If the Court say this fact is not relevant, is the counsel heard to argue that it is?—Yes.

4494. Does the Court decide upon hearing both sides?—Yes; upon, first of all, hearing the counsel for the prisoner, and, afterwards, the conclusions of the Crown lawyers.

4495. Are the limits of relevancy tolerably wide?—Yes; I should say so.

4496. Do you think the Court would be very cautious in refusing a witness?—Very cautious indeed. In my long practice, I do not think I have seen one instance where the Court has refused facts.

4497. Have you heard points of this kind argued?—I have.

4498. There is an expression, in the answer of one of the gentlemen, that the witnesses of the prisoner are cross-examined by the Crown Officers. Are the Commissioners to take that in the sense in which they are informed the duty of the Crown Officers is understood in this Island, not as adverse counsel but as a kind of advisers of the Court?—I presume their duty is to bring before the Court all the facts. Upon the witnesses of the accused being produced at the bar, his counsel, of course, questions them: after that, the Crown Lawyers have a right to cross question those witnesses.

4499. Is the practice, in that case, to conduct it as an adverse counsel, or in the character rather of a judicial party?—From my experience, I should say that the Crown Lawyers wish to elicit truth.

4500. Supposing on any occasion a very adverse tone on the part of the Crown Lawyer were exhibited, would it be thought a deviation from the ordinary practice?—Yes; I think it would. I do not mean to say I have never heard that tone used.

4501. But, when used, is it considered a deviation from the usual practice?—I do consider it so.

4502. Would it be used in any case in which the Crown or the Court was interested? Would not the Crown Officers, in such cases, acting as advocates for the Crown, endeavour by all proper means to secure a verdict?—No.

4503. The counsel for the defendant is of course a partizan; in case the Crown lawyer acts in the same way, as a partizan, is it considered that he is exceeding his duty?—I think so.

4504. Do you consider it no part of the duty of the Crown Officers to strive as advocates for a conviction?—No.

4505. If it should so happen that the counsel for the prisoner had neglected a point in favour of his own client, would you think it the duty of the Crown Officers to bring it forward?—I consider it would be their duty; and I have seen it done often.

4506. Would they supply any point omitted by the counsel for the defence?—I consider it is their duty to do so, by our practice; and I have seen it very often done.

4507. When a prisoner is produced at a trial, à l'Ordinaire, is the acte d'accusation read as a matter of form before the interrogatories are read?—The acte d'accusation is first read; the witnesses for the prosecution are then called; then the witnesses for the defence are called by the prisoner. They are sworn if there is no objection to any of them.

4508. If there is an objection to any of the witnesses, is it heard and decided upon argument?—Yes.

4509. Does not the interrogatory of the prisoner begin the evidence?—Yes.

4510. In trials au Grand Criminel, when evidence is taken down, is it taken down by the Greffier?—Yes.

4511. Does he read it out aloud after it is taken down?—It is not taken down in the presence of the counsel or of the prisoner.

4512. It is taken au secret in the first instance?—Yes.

4513. (To Mr. Lefebvre, Greffier.) How long have you been Greffier?—Since 1835.

4514. Will you explain the mode of taking down the evidence au Grand Criminel? Suppose the previous examination au secret over, the acte d'accusation drawn, the interrogatoire taken, and the prisoner committed, we are now at the next step: before whom is the evidence taken?—The examination of witnesses takes place in the presence of the Bailiff and at least two Jurats.

4515. Whenever you say Bailiff, may we take for granted you mean also Lieutenant Bailiff?—Yes. Questions are put to the witness by either of the members of the Court or the Crown Officers; and I take down the answers. The witness is made acquainted with the charge against the prisoner, and is told to declare what he knows respecting the matter. He makes a statement, which is taken down; and afterwards questions are put to him, if the whole of the facts are not made clear to the satisfaction of the Court.

4516. Is this all au secret?—Yes.

4517. Is more than one witness present at the same time?—No; only one witness is present in the Court.

4518. Who generally puts the questions, the Crown Officers or the Court?—The Crown Officers generally take the leading part in questioning the witnesses.

4519. You say, first of all, the witness makes his statement: that you take down from his own mouth?—Yes.

4520. Suppose a question is put, do you read the question?—Yes; and I then take down the answer to that question.

4521. Is the question read over to the witness from your note?—Yes.

4522. A question being put, you write that question down upon your note, read from your note the question to the witness, hear his answer, and write it down in your book?—Yes.

4523. At the end of the examination is the evidence read afresh to the witness?—It is usually; but it is not the invariable practice.

4524. Mr. Dobrée. I think it is always done: I have never seen it otherwise.

4525. Does the witness sign it?—No.

4526. Do you sign it?—I sign the copy I give to the Crown Officers.

4527. Is the deposition signed by any body?—The Bailiff and the two magistrates who are present put their initials. It is called paraphé by the Court.

4528. Do you keep the deposition of the witness?—Yes.

4529. Do you take it down in the first person or the third?—In the first person.

4530. You do not say "He does not know," but "I do not know?"—Yes; in the first person, from the man's mouth, "I saw so and so."

4531. The person making a statement would give a general account of things, in which would be found a great number of matters which would not be in the strict sense evidence; are these afterwards struck out of the statement?—No; nothing is struck out.

4532. In the statement made by a person there would naturally be many things that were not in the strict sense evidence?—Upon the witness's deposition being read to him, if he finds have misunderstood him, he corrects me.

4533. The question refers to a case in which a witness says, "Mr. so and so told me such and such a thing;" is that altered?—No; it is taken down, and remains part of the evidence.

4534. Mr. Andros. The Court would check any such statement at the time.

4535. The Contrôle. Every thing which the witness says is not taken down.

4536. Mr. Lefebvre, Greffier. If the Court observes that the witness is saying any thing which is irrelevant to the matter or hearing, the Court would tell him, that is not evidence, or that is not relevant to the case.

4537. The evidence is taken down from the mouth of the witnesses, with the exception of the parts which the Court directs to be omitted?—Whatever the witness wishes to be taken down I think would be inserted in the deposition.

4538. (To Mr. Carré.) Supposing a man is tried for murder, and the witness says the prisoner's wife told me that the prisoner did so and so, should you feel bound to check that as hearsay?—I do not know that the Court would take upon themselves to decide, at that moment, what was evidence or not: that would be the business of the Advocate afterwards.

4539. Mr. Lefebvre, (Greffier.) In practice they have not done so.

4540. Mr. Carré. I should say the Court exercise very little discretion upon that point, whether certain matters are legal evidence or not. That would be left for after consideration, and might be argued by the counsel for the prisoner.

4541. The Bailiff. That would be as in England, where sometimes it happens that matter, which is not evidence, occurs in answers to written interrogatories.

4542. In that case the party who takes the interrogatory is not the party who tries the fact?—No. I think that, in practice, when a witness is rambling to matters which are irrelevant, he is checked by the Court.

4543. Should you include in that hearsay evidence?—Yes; I think the Court would then direct him back again into the line of evidence; and, if he continued to be rambling, they would begin to question him, so as to cut short his irrelevant statement.

4544. Do you not think it possible that you, from your habits as an English lawyer, may adopt a different practice from that which Mr. Carré would take?—It is possible to some extent.

4545. Mr. Carré. What I say is, that the Court, if composed of a Bailiff and two magistrates, would not take upon itself to decide, in every case, what was evidence and what was not. While under examination, the Court would endeavour to keep the witness as closely as possible to what was evidence.

4546. The Bailiff. I think I have only been present at one case au Grand Criminel; and there almost all the evidence was taken down by way of question and answer.

4547. (To Mr. Lefebvre, Greffier.) Are those the only examinations of witnesses which take place au secret, witnesses in support of the charge against the prisoner?—The witnesses for the defence are also examined au secret.

4548. Are they examined in the absence of the prisoner or prisoner's counsel?—No: the prisoner and his counsel are there; but the public are excluded.

4549. Are they examined in the same way?—Yes.

4550. Except that the counsel for the prisoner is there to put any questions or make any suggestions which he likes?—Yes.

4551. Is the evidence taken in French or English?—In the language most familiar to the witness.

4552. And the question put in the same language?—Yes.

4553. The question to an English person is, of course, put in English?—Yes.

4554. In the case of the witness being a foreigner, an Italian, or a Dane, or Dutchman, is an interpreter sworn?—Yes; one would be sworn.

4555. You are allowed to exercise your office by a sworn Deputy, are not you?—Yes.

4556. What time elapses between the "évocation" of the witnesses and their appearance in Court?—No lapse of time takes place; they are examined immediately afterwards.

4557. Between their notice to appear and their appearing?—That depends upon the Crown Officers sending their summons. The Greffier has nothing to do with that: he finds the witness in Court.

4558. When does the act of récolement and confrontation take place?—It takes place before the witnesses for the prisoner are called.

4559. (To Mr. Falla.) After the evidence has been taken, are copies sent to the prisoner's counsel?—Yes; by a late order in Council, the evidence is sent to him on the morning of the confrontation.

4560. Have you any means of preventing parties capable of giving evidence from leaving the country?—Yes.

4561. How long has that been so?—Under the same order in Council.

4562. (The Order in Council was read as follows.)

At the Court of Buckingham Palace, the 19th day of June, 1844.

Present—The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty; His Royal Highness Prince Albert; Lord President; Earl of Aberdeen; Lord Privy Seal; Earl of Ripon; Duke of Wellington; Lord Granville Somerset; Lord Steward; Lord Stanley; Lord Chamberlain; Sir Robert Peel, Bart.; Earl of Jersey; Sir James Graham, Bart.; Earl of Haddington.

Whereas there was this day read at the Board a Report of the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council for the affairs of Guernsey and Jersey, dated the 18th of this instant June, in the words following, viz.: Your Majesty having been pleased, by your order in Council, of the 23d of May last, to refer unto this Committee the humble petition of the states of the Island of Guernsey, setting forth: "That, there being no local law to authorize the detention in the island of witnesses in criminal prosecutions, the Court of Chief Pleas, at a meeting held on the 22nd of January, 1844, passed an Ordinance, subject to the approval of the States and the confirmation of your Majesty, to supply the said defect as follows:—

"La Cour, sensible combien il est essentiel à l'administration de la justice criminelle qu'il soit loisible aux officiers de la Reine de pouvoir détenir dans l'Ile, pendant un temps suffisant pour son examen, récolement et confrontation un témoin nécessaire, qui serait sur son départ, a ordonné, ouies les conclusions des officiers de la Reine:

Primo. Que, dans tous les cas d'accusation criminelle, il sera loisible aux officiers de la Reine de suivre l'accusé en tous tems et devant toute Cour composée du President et de deux Jurés pour le moins, pour l'obliger à choisir un conseil.

Secondo. Qu'en cas de félonie, les officiers de la Reine seront autorisés à obliger un témoin nécessaire, étant sur son départ, de rester trois jours dans l'Ile à compter du jour de la constitution du prisonnier, afin d'être examiné provisoirement à futur, et pourra le dit témoin, dans ce cas, être récolé et confronté avec le prisonnier le même jour, et immediatement après avoir été examiné.

Tertio. Que l'interrogatoire sera donné au conseil du prisonnier dès que les témoins des officiers de la Reine auront été examinés à futur.

Quarto. Que les dépositions des témoins seront données au conseil du prisonnier le matin du récolement et confrontation.

That, much inconvenience and delay resulting from prosecutions for the breach of local police laws having to be made only in form, and before a Court composed of the Bailiff and at least seven Jurats, the said court of Chief Pleas on the said day, 22nd January, 1844, passed another Ordinance, subject also to the approval of the said States and the confirmation of your Majesty, authorizing, inter alia, such prosecutions to be made at all times, whether in or out of term, and before any Court composed of the Bailiff and two or more Jurats; provided that the maximum of the fine stated in the violated law did not exceed thirty livres tournois, or 2l. 2s. 10½*d.* sterling, as follows:—

GUERNSEY.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq. September 30th, 1846.

"La Cour ayant pris en considération le rapport du comité nommé par la Cour en Chef Plaids le 24 Avril, 1843, pour examiner la manière de procéder rélativement à ceux qui enfreignent les Ordonnances, et qui, d'après la loi actuelle, ne peuvent être légalement suivis que dans les termes et devant la Cour criminelle composée du President et de sept Jurés pour le moins, a ordonné, ouies les conclusions des officiers de la Reine:—

1°. Qu'à l'avenir il sera loisible de suivre toute infraction d'Ordonnance en aucun temps, soit dans ou hors des termes, devant une Cour composée du President et de deux Jurés pour le moins, pourvu que le maximum de l'amende portée dans l'Ordonnance n'excède pas £30 tournois.

2°. Le délinquant, dans les vingt quatre heures qui suivront le service de l'ajour, sera tenu de payer le minimum de l'amende, avec les frais de l'ajour et port, au Sergent de la Reine, faute de quoi, tant les officiers de Sa Majesté que l'accusé ajourneront leurs témoins sur le champ pour être entendus au jour indiqué dans l'ajour, envoyé par les dits officiers de Sa Majesté au délinquant.

3°. Dans le cas que le poursuivi ne réponde pas sur le premier ajour, l'appointement de "vers arrêt et aux frais" sera pris; et le poursuivi, s'il veut plaider par la suite, ne pourra le faire qu'en payant tous le dépens du passé.

4°. Que toute amende adjugée sera payée sur le champ sur peine d'emprisonnement d'autant de jours que de livres tournois adjugées.

5°. Qu'en cas que la Cour condamne l'infracteur aux frais et journées de témoins, il sera tenu de les payer, ainsi que l'amende, sur le champ.

6°. Que les amendes seront applicables moitié à Sa Majesté et moitié au délateur, au lieu d'être applicables comme dans les susdites Ordonnances, à quoi recours."

That, the term within which personal actions and suits relating to personal property may be instituted in Guernsey extending to thirty years, and it appearing that the interests of justice, the security of all classes, and especially the protection due to heirs, would be greatly promoted, were the said term considerably abridged: the said Court of Chief Pleas, at a meeting held on the 11th of April, 1836, passed an Ordinance reducing to ten years the term within which actions in personalty or simple contract, and without specialty, may be instituted, the said term to reckon from the 1st of June, 1836, with regard to all debts or demands created subsequently to that date, and barring by the lapse of ten years from the said day, 1st June, 1836, all right of action for debts or demands created antecedently thereunto, and which, under the existing law, might have more than ten years to run out, as follows:—

"La Cour a ordonné provisoirement, ouies les conclusions des officiers du Roi: 1° Qu'à compter du 1er Juin, 1836, toute demande mobilière par après crée, et pour laquelle il n'y aura ni reconnoissance par écrit, ni acte de Cour non-périmé sera prescrite après dix ans de sa création. 2°. Que les préscriptions commencées, et pour le completement desquelles il faudra encore au delà de dix ans à compter du 1er Juin, 1836, seront accomplies par le lapse de dix ans, à compter du dit jour. Et ne déroge cette Ordonnance aux préscriptions annales portées dans le 29e Chapitre du Livre 8 de Terrien."

That, the said three Ordinances having been submitted to the States of Guernsey, at a meeting held on the 27th of March, 1844, the said States unanimously approved of the same, and resolved that they should be submitted to your Majesty in order that, if approved by your Majesty, they might receive your Majesty's most gracious confirmation, and, thereupon, have force of law in Guernsey, and humbly praying that your Majesty may be graciously pleased to confirm the said three Ordinances, and to order that they shall thenceforth have force of law in Guernsey.

The Lords of the Committee, in obedience to your Majesty's said order of reference, this day took the said petition, and three Ordinances of the 22nd June, 1844, and 11th August, 1836, into consideration, and agree humbly to report, as their opinion, to your Majesty, that it may be advisable for your Majesty to approve of and ratify the said three Ordinances.

Her Majesty, having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased by and with the advice of Her Privy Council to approve thereof, and to order, as it is hereby ordered, that the said three Ordinances passed by the Court of Chief Pleas in the Island of Guernsey, and approved by the States of the said Island, be approved and ratified accordingly. Whereof the Lieutenant-Governor of the Island of Guernsey, the States of the said Island, and all other persons whom it may concern, are to take notice, and govern themselves accordingly."

4563. Are there any means of keeping a witness for the defence from leaving the Island?—That is not stated: but, I conceive, the Crown lawyers have the means of doing so, because the witnesses for the defence are summoned also by the Crown lawyers. If I am called upon as a lawyer to read that order in Council, I should say that it does not extend to witnesses for the defence.

4564. Then there would be no legal means of detaining them?—Not by that order in Council: but, having explained the way of our proceeding in Guernsey, that all the witnesses are summoned by the Crown lawyers for the prosecution and the defence, I should think they have a right, if requested by the prisoner, to stop the witnesses for the defence.

4565. What would be the actual means of stopping them?—That I am at a loss to say. It is not defined. I should say, of course, if there is an Order in Council to be put in force, the Crown lawyers must have the means of doing so. They may call upon the persons to give bail that they will be forthcoming on such a day to give evidence; and, if they do not, I think they have a right to secure their persons.

4566. Do you recollect any instance of that?—No.

4567. The Procureur. There is no instance, I believe.

4568. The Contrôle. In ninety nine cases out of a hundred the witnesses essential to the case, whether for the prosecution or for the defence, would be among the witnesses called by the Crown.

4569. The Procureur. All the witnesses, in a criminal proceeding, are, strictly speaking, Crown witnesses. The Crown sends the summonses. Sometimes witnesses are examined "provisoirement;" the meaning of the word "provisoirement" is this, both in civil and criminal cases, that, if a witness were likely to leave the Island before the case came forward, you would take a permit to have him examined provisoirement before the others were examined. He is examined in writing; his deposition remains closed at the Greffe till the others are examined; and then there is an order given to open them altogether.

4570. At all events, would it ot have this effect, that it would make it necessary for a party charged at the time of his being constitué prisonnier to know who his witnesses were to be? The limit given is three days: he might be committed, and, four days afterwards, recollect what witnesses he wanted?

4571. Mr. Falla. That was my reason for supposing that this was meant to apply to witnesses for the Crown strictly so called, because that could never happen as to them.

4572. The Bailiff. A man is constituted a prisoner before any witnesses are heard.

4573. Does not the preliminary proceeding, which leads to his being constituted a prisoner, to a certain extent, bring to the knowledge of the Court and the Crown officer, who the witnesses on the other side are?—Yes, to a certain extent.

4574. The Procureur. It is a case which has never taken place: but, if the case were to take place, and the man were to be committed, and to give notice to the Crown lawyers that he wished to have certain persons examined, the Crown lawyers would take means to have them examined.

4575. The Bailiff. It is quite clear that this Ordinance contemplated a witness who had been examined in the Court of Police. He might have been examined then, on either side, for the prosecution or for the defence.

4576. (To Mr. Falla.) After the récolement et confrontation, what takes place?—The prisoner is bound to state the facts he wishes to prove, and, at the same time, to give a list of the witnesses to prove those facts.

4577. Is it understood that he is bound to state, which witness proves any particular facts?—I have never been bound to state by which witnesses I meant to prove any particular fact. I do not mean to say it has never been done; but in my practice I have never seen it done.

4578. Then, in truth, the power of the Court to prevent a witness from coming is nominal?—It is only with respect to the facts, whether they are relevant or not. The Court would never prevent a witness being heard, in my opinion; I have never seen it done.

4579. The Bailiff. The Court, having allowed a particular fact to be gone into, would never object to any witness being heard in support of that fact.

4580. What takes place at the Confrontation?—The Counsel for the prisoner has a right to cross-examine the witness. Each witness is called, one after the other, in the presence of the prisoner; his evidence is read; and the counsel for the prisoner has the right to cross-examine the witness. The question is put down in writing by the Greffier; and the answer of the witness is also taken down.

4581. Is all this au secret still?—Yes. The Crown lawyers (I have seen it done in practice, and I believe they have the right of doing it) can put any question to the witness again; and so can the Court.

4582. The Crown Officers ask any questions they please upon the cross-examination of the prisoner's counsel?—Yes.

4583. Are the witnesses for the prisoner summoned for some future day?—The Court fixes a day to hear those witnesses. They are called, one after the other; and their evidence is taken down in the presence of the prisoner and his counsel.

4584. By means of questions?—Yes: but, generally speaking, the counsel will tell him, at least I do, to give his statement of the facts which he knows: and, in my opinion as a lawyer, I think it is more fair. Then, having given his statement, the counsel has a right to put questions. The Crown lawyers the same; and, of course, the Court has the same right.

4585. After being cross-questioned by the Crown Officers, would the counsel for the prisoner have a right to re-examine upon the cross-questions put by the Crown Officers?—I have seen it done. The right has never been questioned. I beg to state that I have explained our manner of proceeding, although as a lawyer I am decidedly opposed to that manner of proceeding.

4586. This proceeding au Grand Criminel you mean?—Yes.

4587. What is your objection to it?—My principal objection is this: that, when a witness is examined, the first time, it ought to be in the presence of the prisoner. My second objection to it is this: that it is not possible for the Court, who tries a prisoner, to know the exact meaning, or the strength of the evidence of the witness.

4588. The Court not having seen him?—No.

4589. You think a statement may mean one thing in one tone of voice, and another in another?—Yes.

4590. Do you apply that remark, as to the evidence being heard in the presence of the prisoner, to the evidence which precedes the committal, as well as the evidence at the trial?—I allude to evidence after the committal, principally. I am now explaining our proceeding after committal.

4591. With regard to the evidence which is taken at the committal, do you think it ought to be, as it is now, au secret, or that it ought to be heard by the prisoner?—To give a fair chance to a prisoner, if we had not the Crown lawyers in the Court who are bound to look to the defence of the prisoner, I should decidedly say that the witnesses for the committal should be heard in the presence of the accused.

4592. Do you think that the evidence, given before committal, should be preserved, and put in the hands of the prisoner or the prisoner's counsel afterwards?—I should say the witness should be heard in the presence of the prisoner. Every lawyer, if he consults the interest of the prisoner, and wishes to give him security that he should not be found guilty when he is innocent, would say that he ought to have a copy of the examinations of the witnesses. I say so from experience, because I am always at a loss to know what defence to make for a prisoner. When I say what defence, I mean what witnesses to call.

4593. Is not that rather stronger in cases à l'Ordinaire than au Grand Criminel, because there is less interval?—Yes. I was going to state, just now, that I think the evidence should be taken down in the presence of the prisoner au Grand Criminel, when the witnesses are examined from the beginning. Then his counsel might see in what manner the witness declares: but, now, it is not possible for a counsel to do that justice to his client by only hearing the evidence read to him.

GUERNSEY.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq.

4594. He loses also the means of commenting, before those who are to decide the matter, upon the mode in which the words came from the witness. Yes; but, in cases au Grand Criminel, I should say, the counsel is in very great danger of injuring the cause of his client by putting questions to a witness; and I have seen it done more than once.

4596. Might it not make the greater impression from the very discussion as to its relevancy?—Yes. Then another objection may arise, which is this: supposing a witness be objected to altogether, suppose the prisoner says, at the confrontation, "Such and such a person ought not to be heard, because of such and such a cause," his evidence would already have been taken, and would be known to the members of the Court, who were present; further, the Court would, notwithstanding, proceed to the récolement et confrontation, taking a note of the objection made and reserving it for the trial.

4597. Are you now speaking of the Cour du Quartier?—Yes. They would make a note of the objection and the grounds of it, and declare that the examination shall go on notwithstanding, sans préjudice au droit du dit prisonnier de faire valoir sa dite objection en temps et lieu, that is upon the trial. In that case, the objection may perhaps be found good, and the evidence of the witness struck out of the depositions: but, notwithstanding that, the evidence would have produced certain impressions on the minds of those members of the Cour du Quartier who were present when it was taken.

4598. Might not that last objection be met by insisting that the Court for taking the evidence and trying the fact should be constituted of different members?—That last objection might.

4599. (To Mr. Falla.) In cases au Petit Criminel the witnesses are examined vivâ voce, are not they?—Yes.

4600. Is there not a previous list of the witnesses for the defence given to the Crown officers?—There is not a list given to the Crown lawyers of the witnesses for the defence: they only sign the summonses.

4601. Blank summonses?—No, filled up by the counsel for the prisoner, where the names of the witnesses are stated. They may take a list if they think proper.

4602. Is the summons signed by the Crown officer before it is filled up?—No; after that.

4603. The Crown officers therefore know the witnesses for the defence?—Yes.

4604. Does the prisoner's counsel know the witnesses who are to be called against him?—No.

4605. How long does the summons precede the trial?—Generally speaking, I should say on the Friday they receive the summons for the Saturday, that is the day after. They may receive a summons any day during the week; but, in practice, it is received about Friday.

4606. The case being tried on Saturday?—Yes.

4607. The remedy of detaining witnesses about to leave the Island is confined to cases au Grand Criminel, is not it?—Yes: there is no remedy, au Petit Criminel, except that you may apply to take down the evidence of any person leaving the Island provisoirement.

4608. What is the form of taking the evidence provisoirement?—The witness is called before the Cour du Quartier; he is put upon oath, and then makes his statement.

4609. Is that in the presence of the prisoner's counsel?—Yes.

4610. If evidence for the prosecution is taken provisoirement, is that in the presence of the prisoner or his counsel?—Yes, in cases au Petit Criminel.

4611. The Procureur. That is in procès ordinaire: there is no difference between a procès ordinaire and au Petit Criminel.

4612. (To Mr. Falla.) The witnesses being called, are they examined and cross-examined?—Yes; the witnesses for the Crown are called first.

4613. Have you been present at any English trials?—Yes.

4614. Are the witnesses examined much in the way that they are in an English Court vivâ voce?—Yes.

4615. We do not usually begin by desiring the witness to tell his story: but we examine him by questions; we ask him "Where do you live?" and so on?—We do not do so much in Guernsey, because everybody knows everybody.

4616. Do you draw out the story of the witness by questions?—The practice in Guernsey, up to the last two or three years, has been to call the witness to the bar, and tell him to declare what he knows of the transaction. That is still the practice of some of the lawyers.

4617. Are the Commissioners to understand that your practice has been modified lately?—I have remarked that it has been to a certain extent.

4618. Since Mr. Carey has been Bailiff, should you say?—Yes. I have remarked that the Contrôle has introduced a practice in the case of a witness called by him, of questioning him upon all the facts.

4619. Is the objection to suggesting an answer by the form of the question, or to what we call a leading question, very strongly enforced?—I should say yes.

4620. (To the Bailiff.) Do you agree to that?—Not always. The cases, in which it appears to me that the rule has been erred against, have been chiefly where a witness has been asked, "Did not you say so and so."

4621. In the examination in chief?—Yes; in asking "Was not so and so said;" suggesting to the witness the nature of the conversation, instead of asking him what was said. I think it is in that class of cases I have observed it chiefly.

4622. Practically, do you find it to be an inconvenience that a witness should give a statement, instead of being questioned as to the material facts which are to be elicited?—I would distinguish. I find it very inconvenient, myself, that he should begin by giving a statement before I know who he is, what he is, how he got upon the place, and what is the point of view from which he starts. It frequently happened, when I first came, that a man, of whom I knew nothing, began telling a story. He went off in medias res; and I did not know what he was about, and was unable to follow him, till I ascertained the point from which he started. I think it is very convenient, when you have once got a man into a right course, to set him going by desiring him to tell his story.

4623. Should you say that this mode of examining a witness arises, in some measure, from there being no deposition furnished to the gentlemen who have to examine him?—I think very much so, there being no deposition furnished either to the examining counsel or to the Court.

4624. Does not that almost necessitate this mode of examination?—Yes; I think it does. In point of fact, not only is there no brief, but the advocate does not know, accurately, what it is that his witnesses are going to say. A great many witnesses do not state at all beforehand what they are going to say, which makes it necessary, very much, to adopt that kind of examination. That fact accounts a great deal for the form which the examination takes in this Court.

4625. Do you know what is the object of preserving no record of the evidence taken before the committing Court?—If you ask me the object, I suppose it is that, being a secret court, nothing is to be made known that passes there. As to the utility, that is quite another question. I know of no improvement which would be so great here, as that of taking down in writing all the evidence upon which a man is committed, and letting the counsel for the prisoner have copies of it a certain time before the trial. I believe that would secure two advantages: I think it would give the prisoner pretty nearly the same advantages as if he were present, while it would reserve to the Court all the power which it derives from a secret examination.

4626. What are the particular powers which the Court derives from secret examination?—The great point, with regard to secret examination, appears to me to be with respect to the interrogatory of the prisoner. There are other advantages which we can see: but the one which strikes my mind most strongly, and the only one which seems to be of any very great weight, is with reference to the interrogatory.

4627. The prisoner has the chance of evading that, has not he, if he is well advised?—The prisoner may decline stating anything, and sometimes does: but, sometimes, he states facts which are very material to the defence.

4628. May not he sometimes, being an ignorant man, make the blunder which we see ignorant men sometimes do, though innocent, tell an untruth to get rid of evidence which is suggested to his mind by the question put?—There is less danger of that when he has not heard the evidence than if he had heard the evidence.

4629. Is there no danger that the prisoner, who has minute questions put to him, may have recourse to a sudden falsehood for the purpose of getting rid of what he supposes to be a dangerous inference?—There is danger of it. I have no doubt it is done, from this fact, that, where two persons, charged with an offence committed by them jointly, have been severally interrogated, their statements have been different and inconsistent. One of those must have stated some facts which were untrue.

4631. Is there no risk of the system embarking those who are questioning him in a sort of contest with the prisoner?—I am not conscious of any thing of the kind taking place.

4632. Mr. Andros. The Procureur always cautions a prisoner that the statement he may make will be used against him upon the trial.

4633. (To the Bailiff.) Do you prefer the present system to the prisoner knowing all that has been said against him, and then telling him he may say what he pleases?—I do, as a preliminary inquiry.

4634. Mr. Carré. I believe that the Commissioners witnessed an examination of that sort the other day: and, I think I may say that that was as close an examination of a prisoner as takes place in any case.

4635. The Bailiff. If there were any facts likely to be evidence, either of guilt or innocence, that would be inquired into; but the inquiry would be confined to the facts. I apprehend that the purpose of the interrogatory is solely to inquire into the facts, and, if you can, having got the scene, to carry him, the actor, through the whole scene, to see whether he acted the part which has been attributed to him, or whether he represents any other line of conduct. I have heard small points stated by a man on his defence, which certainly were very material.

4636. And true?—Yes.

4637. Have you never known an untruth stated which injured the man himself?—I think I have. I have not at this moment a particular recollection: but I think I must have known such cases.

4638. Mr. Carré. I should say that, when a prisoner departed very much from the truth pon his interrogatory, it would rather turn against him at the time of his trial; whereas, in cases of doubt, where a prisoner appears to have adhered closely to the truth, his statement is received with a good deal of reliance and goes in his favour. I have frequently known prisoners acquitted, who have not adhered to the truth, because the evidence was not sufficient to convict them, though it was evident, from their interrogatory, that they endeavoured to conceal the truth.

4638. The Bailiff. I may allude to one case which occurred not long ago, in which three persons were charged with the same offence. There was considerable circumstantial evidence, but no identification of the parties. Each of the three gave a different story. The man against whom the evidence was strongest was tried first, and was acquitted, though, I think, there was enough before the Court to show that the statement which was given was not a straight forward statement of the facts.

4639. Mr. Andros. I have thought, if it were possible to have the advantage of the interrogatory, and yet confront the prisoner with the witness before he is committed, it would be a benefit. I mean, that the prisoner's interrogatory might be taken after the witness against him has been heard and the charge has been put into form. The prisoner might, then, be examined, and the witness called in again, so as to give an opportunity of confrontation before the committal of the prisoner.

4640. Mr. Falla. I wish to make an observation upon what we call l'interrogatoire. I must admit that it is a very essential part of our proceeding to convict all guilty persons; but my opinion is that, in doing so, you run the risk of finding guilty a person who is not; and, from the experience I have had at the bar, and I think I have pleaded for one half of the prisoners since I have been at the bar, whether I pleaded for guilty prisoners or innocent ones, l'interrogatoire has always given me more trouble than any thing else. I have seen prisoners, acquitted, in great danger of being found guilty by what they have stated in the interrogatoire; and I have very often heard the Crown lawyers, as well as members of the Court, bring forward things stated in the interrogatoire to ground an opinion of guilt upon. Where I have seen the greatest hardship to prisoners is, where there are two, three, four or five prisoners accused of the same crime.

4641. Are such prisoners in practice, tried together or one by one?—One after the other.

4642. The Bailiff. The evidence is sometimes taken together.

4643. Mr. Falla. When the prisoners agree to it. By our practice, they are not tried together; but, sometimes, when the prisoners agree to the witnesses being examined together upon all the cases on the part of the Crown, it is done, but not for the defence. When four or five prisoners are called in private into Court, one after the other, and questions are put to them, the first impression upon their mind is that the Crown lawyers in the Court wish to make them declare different things; and an ignorant person or a timid person, with that thought, is not capable, in my opinion, of giving a faithful statement; and, if he does not, it is sure to turn against him. If those several prisoners do not give the same statement, as to certain facts, the members of the Cour Ordinaire, which commits them for trial, sitting in judgment upon them when they are tried, remember perfectly well what the different prisoners have stated; and, though the interrogatoire is only read against the prisoner, who is taking his trial, the three or four magistrates who have been present when the prisoner has been committed, knowing what the other prisoners have stated, would be at a loss to know which has declared the truth.

4644. The particular difficulty you are just now adverting to would be got rid of by insisting upon the two tribunals consisting of different members?—That is my opinion.

4645. You said, just now, that you had heard the Crown lawyers, as well as the members of the Court, bring forward things stated in the interrogatoire as the foundation of their opinion upon the case. Was that in cases where you were sufficiently in possession of the facts to know that the statement in the interrogatoire was untrue?—That I cannot say, though I can state that I have seen prisoners give an incorrect answer in cases when they were not aware that it was incorrect.

4646. Suppose the interrogatoire to remain: is not it an objection that those, who have to decide ultimately upon the value of it, have not seen the manner in which it is given?—Certainly.

4647. On the other hand, if they were present, would you not get into the difficulty which was stated before of impressions remaining upon their minds?—Yes. I would do away entirely with the interrogatoire, because I do not think a person accused of a crime is in a fit state to be questioned by the Court. You must be aware of the manner in which they are taken up; they are not advised; they are put into a cell, and not allowed to see a counsel.

4648. If you were chosen counsel before the interrogatoire, and saw the prisoner, what advice should you give him as to answering?—I should tell a prisoner, whether he was guilty or not, to decline answering. I should tell him, from the experience I have had, to decline answering.

4649. You said, just now, that one strong objection you had to the interrogatoire was, that the prisoner, by giving false statements, might be involved in the falsehoods he had told:

would not that danger be increased by the fact that no person would be accused of any crime without strong circumstances of suspicion, whether true or false against him?—Certainly.

4650. The particular danger which you pointed out is the more liable to be brought on because there is always something to get rid of?—Yes: and I have seen a prisoner give an answer to a question, very insignificant in itself, directly contrary to truth; and, on other questions being put to him, that falsehood would lead him where he was not aware.

4651. Perhaps, as this is a practice which differs very much from our own mode of proceeding in England, the gentlemen acting as Judges here will say whether they adhere to what the Bailiff states, as to the benefit to be derived from the interrogatoire?

4652. Mr. Carré. I think it is found, in practice, exceedingly useful to throw light upon the evidence previously taken by the Court.

4653. And, in practice, not attended with the evil consequences which Mr. Falla attaches to it?—As far as we can ourselves judge, I should think not. The counsel for the prisoner, of course, views the interrogatoire in the light, I will not say of a partizan, but of a person desirous of saving his client. In almost every case, I think, it is of immense advantage to the elucidation of truth. The question then would be, whether in any particular case that has led to a wrong opinion. I am not aware that such a thing has occurred.

4654. Mr. Andros. I quite agree with what has been stated.

4655. (To Mr. Le Retilley.) Do you also agree with it?—I do. I think it is most important to preserve the interrogatoire for the administration of justice. I think no evil whatever can be traced to the interrogatoire. I think, on the contrary, it has tended to the discovery of many crimes which would never otherwise have been discovered. On the other hand, I think, it may be safely asserted that not one innocent person has been convicted, in consequence of having declared falsely in his ignorance.

4656. (To Colonel De Havilland.) Do you agree in that opinion?—I do. There may be some cases, perhaps, in which the members of the Court, when they come to try B., may recollect what A. has declared, and which, though relating to the same charge, is not admissible according to rule. But I agree with those gentlemen that the interrogatoire is generally useful. I have not been very long on the bench: but I do not think any man has suffered from his interrogatoire or his saying any thing falsely upon it.

4657. (To Mr. MacCulloch, Jurat.) Are you also of the same opinion?—I am.

4658. Mr. Falla. I can safely say I do not know one single instance where a prisoner has suffered because there has been an interrogatoire: but I have seen several cases where a prisoner has been in danger of being found guilty because he had been questioned before the Court, and his interrogatoire was brought forward upon the trial. When I speak of the danger of being found guilty (if he was acquitted I take for granted he was innocent), I mean, when, perhaps, out of ten magistrates there were four to convict him, and I may say even five out of ten to convict him, the Bailiff giving his casting vote in his favour. I say, in that case, I have never seen an instance where a prisoner has been found guilty while innocent; but, at the same time, I believe the interrogatoire is a most dangerous thing for an innocent person accused of a crime. I repeat, I perfectly agree with all these gentlemen in this. It is a very useful part of our proceedings to convict a guilty person, and to make sure of the conviction of all guilty persons brought before the Court; but from the interrogatoire an innocent person is in very great danger. To show that the interrogatoire is only brought forward to convict or show the guilt of the person accused, you may say that, in nine tenths of the cases brought before the Court, when the interrogatoire is cited by the Crown lawyers, it is to show that the prisoner is guilty, and not to show his innocence. I could go further than nine tenths. I remember very few cases where the Crown lawyers have brought forward the interrogatoire to prove that a person is innocent. It is invariably brought against him. I must also state that, in our present mode of proceeding in criminal cases, the interrogatoire is very useful to the counsel for the defence; because an advocate, after having pleaded for a few years before this Court, can guess pretty well what facts are to be brought against the prisoner, by the questions put to the prisoner; and that I may say is the only guide which in many cases I have had for the defence of a prisoner. I am not mentioning that fact, of course, to show that the interrogatoire is useful, because my opinion is that there ought to be something to enable the counsel to make his defence, especially as he has to plead before the Crown lawyers. To shew that the prisoner is very often not aware what he declares to the Court, upon reading to him his interrogatoire, I have very often heard a prisoner state, "I am not aware that I have declared so and so." I bring forward that fact to shew that the prisoner is not in a proper state of mind when brought before the Court to answer the questions put to him. I also object to the interrogatoire, because it brings the Court and the prisoner more or less in contact, especially in our way of proceeding, in which the Court, in constituting a prisoner, sits upon him in judgment. First, the prisoner has no confidence in the men before whom he appears, because he fancies that they wish to catch him or to detect him in an untruth; and if he does not declare openly and truly to the questions put to him by the Court, the Jurats have no confidence in what the prisoner declares; that is if he hesitates in any way, though he may declare the truth. If I am allowed to express an opinion, as to whether the Jurats who, as we say, constitute a prisoner, should sit upon him in judgment, I should say not; because they may hear evidence in the absence of the prisoner or his counsel, which evidence may not be brought before the Court; still they can bear in mind what they know, having heard that evidence in the Court below. The same witnesses may appear at the trial who have been present when the prisoner has been committed; they may declare part of the facts on the trial that they had declared before the Cour du Quartier, and only a part of those facts: but still, the same witnesses appearing before the same men, those men may go further, without being aware of it, than the evidence brought on the day of the trial would justify. I have only to add, upon this subject, that I came to the bar with the opinion which

GUERNSEY.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq.

I now express; and, from the experience I have had, I am the more confirmed in that opinion.

4659. Mr. MacCulloch, (Advocate). There is a remark I should wish to make. Without at this moment expressing an opinion upon the interrogatoire, I would merely state that I have known instances in which the interrogatoire has proved exceedingly useful to an innocent person, for example, in cases in which there was some doubt with respect to the weight of evidence on both sides, and in which the prisoner has been enabled to substantiate the truth of circumstances, in themselves immaterial, stated by him, at the time of his interrogatoire; the corroboration of certain circumstances seems to be taken as giving a sort of confirmation to the whole of his statement, showing him to have declared with good faith and that would of course weigh in his favour.

4660. (To Mr. Falla.) Suppose a prisoner were to hear the evidence against him, and then be told, now state what you please; would not that leave it open, if he chose, to tell his story then, to show a fair intention at that time, which he might afterwards corroborate by showing that his story was true?—Certainly it would.

4661. Mr. Carré. With regard to the question whether a prisoner might not be interrogated, after having heard the evidence against him, I should say it would take away altogether from the weight in his favour, which now, frequently, attaches to his being interrogated.

4662. Mr. MacCulloch. I should think so too.

4663. The Bailiff. I should think the interrogatory tells much more in favour of a prisoner than any story which he tells in England tells in his favour.

4664. The Procureur. I should wish to make a few observations upon the interrogatoire. The view I have of it is this, that the interrogatoire is a most important feature in our criminal proceedings, and it often is of the greatest use to a prisoner for the reasons which have been mentioned by other gentlemen. I think it right to add that I have now been at the bar forty years, and that, before I was Crown lawyer, I acted and pleaded for full one half of the prisoners, probably more, and that, during that time, I never knew an innocent person condemned in consequence of his interrogatoire. Indeed I may say I never knew one innocent person condemned. It appears to me that the great difficulty in the interrogatoire is this, how far it ought to be carried. That appears to me to be an important question.

4665. (To Mr. Jeremie.) Do you wish to state any thing upon this point?—The interrogatoire, I think, is a very proper instrument to find out the truth, whether to convict or to obtain a fair acquittal. In the first place, I will say that the great objection to it is this: the idea runs in most of our heads of a compulsory act on the part of the prisoner. If indeed it were similar to the interrogatories of which we form a notion when we think of interrogatories in the Inquisition and other tribunals of the kind, where you compelled a man to speak, it would be very different: but here, on the contrary, it is a free act upon his part, and a most material document for the acquittal or otherwise of the prisoner. I should say, when a prisoner is brought up, the Procureur, in particular, puts in the interrogatoire; and, if it is conformable to truth, conformable to the evidence, and conformable to a fair and reasonable deduction which may be taken from all that he has seen, he gives from that document a fair statement; and he is in point of fact the lawyer of the prisoner. But to say generally that the Crown officers are the lawyers of the prisoner, as one of my learned brothers has declared, I cannot, particularly when fines are in question. I think, they then prosecute with as much vigour as they do to obtain a verdict in any civil case: but, when it is a mere question of punishment, of corporal punishment for instance, I will say this: that the Queen's Procureur, particularly, weighs well both for and against, and, if the lawyer has forgotten any thing, as it sometimes happens to myself among others, he will bring up what has been lost sight of. I always form my opinion from what the prisoner says in his interrogatory. He cooks up a story sometimes when you go to him, when he has been in prison some time; and it is the interrogatoire which brings him to his senses. You declared so and so: do you persist in that? If he does, then you know how to act. I should say that the interrogatoire is of the greatest service to the counsel. It is upon that he knows what witnesses to bring; it is upon that he says to the prisoner you may bring so and so. It is irrelevant; but you can form your opinion upon it; and, besides that, it is of the greatest benefit when four or five prisoners are brought up and accused, and there is one rogue among the five; you can then find him out better by seeing which of them has most come within the verge of truth. If it had been found in any way the means of convicting an innocent person, or prejudicing innocence, then it would come back very closely to the system of the ancient Inquisition, where it was a forced and compulsory, not a free, instrument; and, in that case, I should say abolish it. Mr. Falla has stated that the Judge, who takes the interrogatoire and who commits the prisoner, ought not to be the Judge who condemns him or who tries him rather. If experience showed that from the committal or from the taking the interrogatoir any very erroneous impressions were created, or any acts were done to the prejudice of innocent persons, or of persons in whose favour there was a strong presumption of innocence, I should say, again, abolish it; but the practice is invariably to the contrary. I do not think the Judge, from having been on the preliminary proceeding, is biassed when he comes to give his opinion. There are some men who at a glance can find out the truth, and pursue it in all its ramifications; but those are very few individuals, I think. It is my opinion that, being well instructed and knowing what has passed, if they come forward with conscientious motives, it is a good thing that they should have seen all that has gone before: therefore, I think, from the experience which they have had of the case, their having had a certain knowledge of the past makes them better able to take a view of the whole. I know of no case where the Crown officers have insisted solely upon the interrogatoire, or where the Court has judged upon that to bring home a conviction. At the same time, I should say this, that, if an individual comes forward and makes a free confession, I think it ought to be taken. Here, I think, no body will ever say that a prisoner has been compelled to plead Guilty. At the same time, I must give my candid opinion that, if a man comes fairly and says "I am Guilty," I do not think it is the Judge's place to tell him, mind what you are about: but I think, such a confession ought to be immediately recorded and acted on.

4666. We understand you to consider the interrogatoire beneficial, not simply as assisting to find out guilt, but as also assisting to find out innocence. Why then should it not be compulsory?—For this reason, because, if it were compulsory, it would lose the effect of the instrumentality in finding out the guilt or proving the innocence. If you were to compel it, then you would lose the voluntary act. It is the voluntary act which, in my opinion, makes it valuable for finding out the truth.

4667. Supposing the compulsion merely went to this: if you do not answer the questions we will take that as a confession of guilt?—I should look upon that as a compulsion.

4668. If the answers given necessarily assist the discovery of the truth, whether he is guilty or innocent, how would the effect of his being bound to give those answers destroy their instrumentality?—I do not think it should be compulsory; because, if it is, his mind would not be unbiassed, and he would have to resort to those shifts which might put away the appearance of truth, whereas, being of his own free will, there is not that danger. Besides that, if it were an act of compulsion, the Queen's Procureur could no longer come and say, here is an act which brings out the truth in a fair manner: the good effect of the interrogatory would therefore be lost.

4669. Would not the Procureur then say, here is a man, who, being compelled to answer, has told a story which turns out to be true, and would not that tell strongly in his favour?—No; the freedom of the act which gives it its value would be lost.

4670. The Procureur. Here is a Dictionary of the Law of Scotland by Mr. William Bell. Under the head of "Criminal Prosecution", page 327, the first volume of the edition of 1826, he says, "In the case where the party is brought before a magistrate for examination, it is the duty of the magistrate, first, to see that the prisoner is in a fit state to undergo an examination; second, that he is warned of the use which may be made of what he says; and third, that the declaration is taken down in writing." He says afterwards, "Unless the magistrate see reason immediately to release the prisoner, his next step is to commence an inquiry or precognition, as it is termed, concerning the grounds of suspicion, in which he will take the declarations of such persons as have cause of knowledge of the offence and the prisoner's participation in it." Neither the accused nor his friends are entitled to be present at the precognition. It goes on to say, the precognition being concluded, the facts being such as to warrant committal, the accused is then committed for trial. Perhaps I might say that I am very much of opinion that the Court which commits might advantageously be different from that which tries.

4671. (To the Procureur.) Do you recollect in the case of the murder of the Danish boy, whether you were not excluded from some evidence by the list of witnesses being full?—I think we had all the important witnesses. There were one or two who came from England; but, as far as my memory serves me, their evidence did not appear to be very important.

4672. Can you furnish the Commissioners with any documents showing what those witnesses were to prove?—No: the impression upon my mind is that we selected the best witnesses, and that there were one or two not examined: but, if my impression be correct, they were not very essential.

4673. The question to be ascertained is whether your list was full, so that, however important those witnesses might have been, they could not have been examined?—I cannot say exactly how the facts were; I will endeavour to ascertain. I can cite one case, where many more than twelve witnesses were necessary. A person was tried some time ago who had committed nearly thirty burglaries, a man of the name of Churchill. The man was tried; and, of course, we could have only more than twelve witnesses.

4674. Was he tried for the thirty crimes at once?—Yes; they were all mentioned in the indictment. An accomplice turned King's evidence: but he was acquitted.

4675. You found your case embarrassed by the limitation?—Yes.

4676. The Bailiff. The embarrassment being to this effect, that only certain counts of the indictment could be proved. The Acte of accusation contains not the same thing differently described, but different offences.

4677. Do you use the word "Count?"—No; chefs d'accusation.

4678. The Procureur. Though we had eleven witnesses besides the accomplice, we felt that the proof might not be sufficiently strong, even on those counts to which some of those eleven witnesses spoke. The accomplice was admitted Queen's evidence in order to ensure a conviction.

4679. The Bailiff. Probably one or two cases would have been proved without an accomplice.

4680. The Procureur. Yes.

4681. (To the Procureur.) Why could not you have instituted ten separate prosecutions in the case of ten offences?—It is not usual.

4682. Supposing a man murdered a man in March and committed a burglary in June, would they be tried together?—If the one case was for murder, and the other for a small misdemeanour, I think the case for murder would be alone; but, if there are several accusations for theft, for instance, it has always been usual to put them together.

4683. At any distance of time? Supposing there was an interval of six months?—Certainly.

4684. Is there any law to that effect?—Only custom.

4685. The Bailiff. I very much suspect, from the practice, that formerly autrefois attaint cleared everything down to the actual attainder.

4686. (To the Bailiff.) Do you see any reason for keeping up such a practice as the present one?—I do not.

4687. (To the Procureur.) In the case of the Danish boy, what became of the prosecution?—The prisoner was acquitted.

GUERNSEY.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq.

September 30th, 1846.

4688. Mr. Andros. The Court was not satisfied that the violence used by the master caused the death of the boy.

4689. The Procureur. With respect to the witnesses, it has been said that notes might be taken of the evidence of the witnesses in the first instance, and given to the counsel. Suppose witnesses to be discovered afterwards: are the public prosecutors to be debarred from having those witnesses? The practice I should recommend would be that, when witnesses are ordered and the prisoner has chosen his counsel, the next summons should be sent a week before the day of trial, and that, at the back of the summons, the names of the witnesses against him should be inserted. Except you have the means of bringing the witnesses before the Court in the first instance and having them examined, it is impossible to know what they can say, because nineteen out of twenty witnesses would refuse to speak till they came to Court: and, indeed, many in this Island think it would not be right for them to tell what they know till they come to Court: so that, if you wish to have an opportunity of letting the counsel for the prisoner know what the witnesses say, you must, if you discover other witnesses, again bring them before the Court, take their evidence, and send notice of what they say to the counsel for the prisoner.

4690. The Bailiff. I have to hand in to the Commissioners certain Ordinances.

4691. Are those Ordinances which did not pass through the States?—I believe so. The first, of the date of the 27th of April, 1840, relates to the Militia. The next is concerning Taxes and Settlements, of the 30th of April, 1821. Also the Ordinances relating to the Harbour, of the 19th of January, 1846, in which I give the Commissioners the parts of the Ordinance as altered. There is another Ordinance about rents, 20th of January, 1840. With respect to the right of the Lieutenant Governor to be present in Court, here is a copy of the proceedings which took place when that claim was made. (Producing them.)

4692. What is the date of that?—The 20th and 21st of November 1845. The authority upon which the claim was founded was the following passage in Warburton's Treatise on the History, Laws and Customs of the Island of Guernsey, page 35. "The Governor, or his Lieutenant for the time being, may be present at all times when the Court sits, and has authority to command and advise the Bailiff and Jurats to observe the laws in the administration of justice, without any unnecessary delay thereof." A Commission, of the 11th of March, in the 6th of Queen Elizabeth, has been found using language from which Warburton appears to have derived what he says. Either this Commission of Elizabeth was his authority, or none can be found; and the main body of that Commission was to be in force for three years only. Of course, it would be a question, whether the particular clause related to this matter, and whether it was temporary only: but that was the shape in which the question came before the Court.

4693. What is the date of the Commission to which you refer?—In 1563. It is in the first Book in the Greffe.

The Commission is under the Great Seal, dated at our Castle of Hertford, the xi daye of Marche, in the sixte yeare of our raigne, and is addressed to Francis Chamberlayn Escuyer, Capitaine and Governor of our Isles of Guernsey, Alderney, Sarke, Erme, and Gettawe, Hellier De Carteret, Esq. Lieutenant to the said Francis in the said Isles, Thomas Compton, Esquire, Bailiff of our said Isle of Guernsey, John After, Dean of the same Isle, Ottis Nicholle, Bailiff of our said Isle of Jersey, Nicholas Collemine, Jurat, and Nicholas Careye Junior, Gentleman, Receiver of our Revenues in our said Isle of Guernsey. The passage referred to is as follows.

We also, having an especial care that justice be dewely ministered within our said Isles, and that our subjects, in the same Isles, be by no means abused therein, contrary to good laws, equitie and conscience, have ordeyned, and by these p̃nts do ordeyne, that the Captayne and Gouvernor or his Lyeutenant, for the tyme beinge, in our sayd Isle of Guernsey, shall be present at all Courts kepte or holden within our said Isle; unto whom we give auctoritie to advise, wyll, and, in our name, require and commande our Bailiff and Jurats, with the Prevost Procureur and Controller, and all other officers, that they and any of them, in their several vocations, have especiall regard that ancient written Politic Laws and approuved customs of our said Isles be in no wise neglected or abused, so as, thereby, our ancyent rights and deutyes, with such also as be newly accrued and reserved unto us, or any our officers or ministers there, may be redely answered, and in that part do yelde like expedition to all our good and loving subjects there without protractinge of time by process.

The following forms of Registering Orders in Council and Acts of Parliament were handed in by the Greffier.

Monsieur le Baillif a, ce jour, présenté à la Cour un Ordre de Sa Majesty en Conseil, en date du 15e Fevrier, 1838, qui lui a été transmis par son Excellence, Monsieur le Lieutenant Gouverneur et aquel la tenure suit.

At the Court of Buckingham Palace, the 15th of February, 1838.

Present,

The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty,

| Lord Chancellor, | Earl of Minto, |
| Lord President, | Viscount Palmerston, |
| Lord Steward, | Viscount Melbourne, |
| Lord Chamberlain, | Viscount Howick, |
| Earl of Albemarle, | Sir John Hobhouse, Bart. |

It is this day ordered by Her Majesty, by and with the advice of her Privy Council, that a printed copy of the Act 5th and 6th William IV., cap. 62, be transmitted to the royal Court of the island of Guernsey, viz.:—

An Act to repeal an Act of the present Session of Parliament, intituled An Act for the more effectual abolition of the Oaths and Affirmations taken and made in various Departments of the State, and to substitute declarations in lieu thereof, and for the more entire suppression of Voluntary and Extra Judicial Oaths and Affidavits; and to make other Provisions for the abolition of unnecessary Oaths. And it is hereby further ordered, that the said Act be registered and published in the Island of Guernsey, not as being essential to its operation therein, but that her Majesty's subjects in the said Island may have notice of the said Act having passed and that they are bound thereby. And the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or Commander in Chief, for the time being, of the Island of Guernsey and its Dependencies, and all other persons whom it may concern, are to take notice of Her Majesty's pleasure hereby signified, and govern themselves accordingly.

(Signed) C. Greville.

La Cour, en ordonnant l'enregistrement du susdit Ordre et de l'Acte de parlement du 9e Septembre, 1835, qui l'accompagne, a cru devoir insérer, en même tems, sur les Records les observations suivantes.

La Cour a toujours reconnu, et reconnait encore, que toutes les clauses d'un Acte de Parlement, où les Isles sont dénominées, sont en force dans les dites Iles, lorsqu'accompagnées d'un Ordre de Sa Majesté en Conseil et enregistrées sur nos Records.

En 1806, à la suite de quelque remontrance très humblement addressée a Sa Majesté en Conseil pour donner raison du retard que la Cour avait mis à l'enregistrement d'un Acte de Parlement, le Très Honourable Conseil insera, pour la première fois, la clause suivante dans les Ordres donnés à la Cour d'enregistrer les Actes de Parlement, que ces Ordres accompagnaient. "And it is hereby further ordered that the said Act be registered and published in the Island of Guernsey, not as being essential to its operation therein, but that Her Majesty's subjects in the said Island may have notice of the said Act having passed, and that they are bound thereby."

Cette clause s'est toujours depuis introduite dans les Ordres qui ont accompagné les Actes de parlement; et l'enregistrement des uns et des autres n'a pour cela, souffert aucune difficulté, parceque, dans les Actes de parlement ainsi transmis, l'Isle de Guernsey se trouvait distinctement denominée. Au contraire, le nom de cette Ile ou de ces Iles ne se trouve nulle part dans l'Acte de Parlement du

GUERNSEY.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq.

September 30th, 1846.

9e Septembre, 1835, quoiqu'il nous soit transmis le 15e Fevrier, 1838, par un Ordre en Conseil qui contient la clause précitée.

Enregistrer l'Acte en question dans lequel l'Ile n'est pas dénominée, enregistrer la clause qui déclare, malgré cela, que, pour le mettre en force, il suffit de donner connaissance aux habitants, qu'ils sont liés par les dispositions du dit Acte, et enregistrer le tout sans réserve, ce serait dire que tous les Actes de Parlement, sans exception, pourraient être transmis et avoir force dans l'Ile, soit qu'elle fût ou qu'elle ne fût pas nommée dans les dits Actes, et soit qui les dits Actes fussent ou ne fussent pas enregistrés sur nos records. Ce serait mettre de côté ce principe de la loi Anglaise, qui n'a jamais été contesté, que nul Acte de Parlement n'est en force dans les Iles, à moins qu'elles n'y soient particulièrement denominées.

N'ayant rien à objecter aux dispositions des Actes de Parlement en question, et les laissant dans toute leur force, c'est pour prévenir le préjugé d'un enregistrement, sous de pareilles circonstances, que la Cour a cru devoir insérer à sa suite les observations présentes, qui sont de nature à réserver à la Cour la faculté d'adresser, avec plus d'effet, ses très humbles remontrances à Sa Majesté en Conseil si jamais par inadvertence le même cas arrivait.

4694. Le 9e Septembre, 1837, devant Monsieur le Baillif, présens, &c.

Monsieur le Baillif ayant ce jour présenté à la Cour un Ordre de Sa Majesté en Conseil en date du 26 Juillet, 1837, qui lui a été transmis par Son Excellence le Lieut. Gouverneur, la Cour, après en avoir entendu lecture, a ordonné que le dit ordre sera enregistré.

---

4695. Le 16 Décembre, 1837, devant Monsieur le Baillif, présens, &c.

Monsieur le Baillif, ayant ce jour présenté à la Cour un ordre de Sa Majesté en Conseil, en date du 11 Novembre, 1837, avec un Acte de Parlement y annexé, il a été ordonné, après lecture d'icelui, que le dit Ordre sera enregistré, et que le dit Acte sera déposé au Greffe pour faire partie des Records de cette Ile.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine, further examined.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

October 1st, 1846.

4696. Does the Court sum up the law and the facts together?—The Bailiff sums up; and then each Jurat gives his opinion.

4697. The Bailiff sums up both the law and the facts?—Yes.

4698. After that summing up, do the Jurats decide?—Then each Jurat gives his opinion upon the law and the fact.

4699. Is there any other decision than that?—No; unless the advocate for the prisoner should have raised any point of law before the witnesses have been heard. Supposing it has come to the close of the evidence, the Bailiff sums up upon the law and the fact.

4700. Is sentence then pronounced upon all the points at once?—Yes.

4701. And the amount of punishment?—Yes, by each Jurat individually; the law officers having previously given their conclusions, as to what punishment should be awarded.

4702. You are aware that the course pursued in Jersey differs slightly from this practice?—Yes.

4703. There, after the decision of the fact, the conclusions of the law officers are given; and then the sentence is pronounced.—Yes; and I have recommended, here, that there should be a decision, first of all, upon any point of law raised by the counsel, then, a decision upon the fact of Guilty or Not guilty; and, after that, that the conclusions of the Crown lawyers should be given upon the amount of punishment, and that question again put to the Court.

4704. Will you be good enough to tell the Commissioners what the distinction is between the cases which come within the Procès Ordinaire and the Procès Extraordinaire?—It is rather difficult to distinguish exactly. When, in the acte d'accusation, we make use of the word félonieusement, the procès takes place au Grand Criminel: that is the rule.

4705. What are the cases in which you use the word félonieusement?—Every thing above larceny; cases of burglary and robbery. Our usual word for larceny is "Vol."

4706. Is simple vol ever laid félonieusement?—No, not simple vol. Vol avec violence, or avec effraction, is laid félonieusement.

4707. Would a simple vol nuitamment be laid félonieusement?—No. I should, perhaps, also add that, in cases where a prisoner is brought up on a number of charges of vol together, in practice, he might, then, be indicted félonieusment.

4708. Mr. Carré. Not unless some of them were avec effraction, or avec violence.

4709. Mr. MacCulloch. I should say not. It is necessary, I think, that, at least, one of the chefs d'accusation should fall under that head.

4710. The Contrôle. There are cases of vol avec effraction, or avec violence, with only one count, having been tried not au Grand Criminel: and I may also add that, I believe, of late years, some cases, which would formerly have been tried au Grand Criminel, have been tried à l'ordinaire.

4711. The Bailiff. I believe there are cases where the act has been laid félonieusement, which, by leave of the Court, have been tried au Criminel Ordinaire. That is a matter of convenience to the prisoner, as he can be tried much sooner, after his committal, à l'Ordinaire than à l'Extraordinaire.

4712. Mr. MacCulloch. Suppose the offence to be charged félonieusement, which is the nature of the class of offences generally so described, and supposing the circumstances to be such as not to render it probable that a heavy punishment will be inflicted, the Court have authorised the Crown lawyers to proceed à l'Ordinaire: but in such cases, the Court feels itself bound to inflict no higher punishment than would be usually inflicted in a Procès à l'Ordinaire. They could not punish a man, for example, by more than six years banishment.

4713. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) By deciding to take it in that form they limit the punishment?—Yes.

4714. In that case, is it charged, in the proceeding à l'Ordinaire, félonieusement?—Yes; therefore the prisoner never objects to it, as he makes sure of not having his goods forfeited, and of not being transported or banished for more than six years.

4716. (To the Contrôle.) Is it competent, in the case of a simple vol, not laid avec effraction, but laid félonieusement, for the counsel for the prisoner to object to the acte d'accusation?—Yes; it would be competent to him. If I understand you, you ask, whether, if in the case of a simple vol the Crown lawyers should have inserted the word félonieusement, it would be competent for a prisoner's counsel to argue that it ought not to be so laid?

4717. Yes. Then, assuming the charge followed by Procès à l'Ordinaire, could the counsel, of strict right, object?—I conceive, that he could argue it, upon the ground that it was not in conformity with the technical rule.

4718. At what time would that objection be taken?—He might object, either before the evidence was heard, or take the objection in his address to the Court upon the whole case. If the proceedings were au Grand Criminel he would have no opportunity till after the close of the case.

4719. Might not he do it before the evidence was read?—Yes.

4720. What would be the effect of such an objection?—It would depend, I think, in some measure, upon the time when it was taken. I certainly conceive, if it was taken after the evidence had been heard, and it was admitted by the Court, it would then amount to an acquittal.

4721. Do you think a subsequent charge might be brought à l'Ordinaire, leaving out félonieusement, or would the previous acquittal be an answer to that?—It has never been the practice to proceed a second time, after there has been an acquittal; and that question has never been raised, that I am aware of, in any case.

4722. As we understand, after the acte d'accusation is made out, the next process is that the prisoner is called upon to plead. Might not he take his objection to the acte d'accusation, in the first instance?—He might. It has been done on some occasions. In some cases, the prisoner instructs the counsel before. I have argued the point myself in that way.

4723. Mr. MacCulloch. The class of cases in which it is done is where the prisoner is out upon bail.

4724. The Contrôle. In all cases the counsel would consider it advantageous to keep it to the end. I have always been of opinion that, if a case of that kind were to come before the Court, the Court would be justified in following the principles of the English law, looking at the two indictments, and seeing whether they contained the same offence or not. But the question, I believe, has never been raised on any occasion; and, whenever a prisoner has escaped through some technical error in that way, I have never known a fresh indictment preferred.

4725. If the Court were to proceed to find the fact of guilt and pronounce sentence after having so found the fact of guilt, could the objection be taken?—No.

4726. Supposing the objection were taken before the evidence was read, what would follow?—If the objection were taken before the evidence was read, I conceive that the course taken by the Crown officers would be this. I conceive that, on hearing the prisoner's counsel argue the point, supposing that point to be good, their course would be to move the Court to quash that acte d'accusation and allow them to begin afresh. The case of the soldiers mentioned in the proceedings of yesterday is analogous. In that case the prisoners had pleaded to the charge, and had chosen counsel. After that, the Crown officers found that the name of the female was wrongly laid in the acte d'accusation; of course, they knew that that point would be taken on the trial, and that the prisoners would probably escape through that error. They, therefore, asked the Court to quash the proceedings, and allow them to begin afresh, which course was opposed by all the counsel for the prisoners, who insisted that the same rule applied to criminal cases as to civil, and that the acte d'accusation could not be changed. The Court, by a considerable majority, allowed the accusation to be quashed and a new one framed; and, in consequence of that precedent, I presume that, supposing a counsel to argue a technical error at the first stage before the witnesses were heard, the Crown officers would follow that course.

4727. The supposition you are making now is that the objection is taken antecedent to any evidence being taken?—Yes.

4728. Au Grand Criminel the evidence is taken before a different tribunal?—Yes.

4729. Then, if upon the day of trial the objection were taken before the evidence had been opened, would not the same rule apply exactly?—Yes, if taken before the officers of the Court begin to read the first deposition.

4730. The suggestion you have already made is on the supposition that the officers for the Crown consider the objection a fatal one. But, supposing they think they can maintain the acte, so that the Court is obliged to pronounce a judgment, what would be the result?—I haven ever seen any fresh case put after a result of that kind at all.

4731. Do you think the Court would follow the English practice?—I conceive so. I mean to say that there is no principle of our law which is opposed to that. But the reason I am not very clear upon it is that, it being to the counsel's advantage to take the objection afterwards, it is scarcely ever done before. I have suggested, in my answers, that that right should be limited, and that the counsel should be bound to argue any point of that kind before going into the facts of the case.

4732. Several gentlemen have suggested that the Procès au Grand Criminel, as far as it differs from the Procès à l'Ordinaire, might be abolished?—Yes.

4733. What do the Jurats generally think of that suggestion?

GUERNSEY.

John de Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

October 1st, 1846.

4734. Mr. Carré. I believe the object of taking the evidence in writing was to enable the Court to weigh the evidence more accurately and more carefully: but, if it has that advantage, it has also the disadvantage of preventing the Court from giving its due weight to the evidence of each witness, which can only take place when the witness is seen in delivering his evidence.

4735. The Contrôle. I would wish to remark, upon the first of those points, that, if the English system were followed here, of the depositions taken before the committing Court being taken down in writing, that would obviate, in some measure, the difficulty mentioned by Mr. Carré. I have heard Jurats say that, in cases of great importance, they like to have the evidence at home, and to consider it carefully in their own closets. This I consider very objectionable.

4736. Is there any considerable interval between the hearing of the evidence and the judgment?—There is usually an interval, because the evidence must be copied out. There must be two copies made, one for the prisoner's counsel and one for the Crown counsel.

4737. Supposing the trial to take place au Grand Criminel, are not the depositions then read before the Court at the trial?—Very often the Court get hold of them before that.

4738. How do they do so?—There must be two Jurats present at the time the evidence is taken in writing. In important cases, there are generally more than two. Those Jurats, very often, take copies of the evidence themselves at the same time as the Greffier. Others go to the Greffe, and copy it for themselves there, or get it from the Greffe. That is one of the greatest objections to the whole system.

4739. That may probably illustrate the way in which some gentlemen may consider it an advantage?—Very possibly.

4740. You look upon that consideration of the evidence, which you say takes place before the actual trial, as a great objection?—Yes. They come to try a cause the whole evidence of which they sometimes know by heart before they come into court.

4741. In criminal cases, is it usual for the Court to take time between hearing the conclusions of the law officers and pronouncing their sentence? Do they adjourn for the purpose of considering their sentence?—I have never known the Court adjourn. The sentence is always delivered at the conclusion of the proceedings, both à l'Ordinaire and au Grand Criminel. The only reason for which I have ever known the Court stop the proceedings has been the lateness of the hour, adjourning from one day to the next; and, in doing that, they would usually choose the moment when the evidence is finished. In cases au Grand Criminel, I cannot conceive any case in which the Court would ever take that step, because, as the whole of the evidence is in writing, it necessarily takes a much shorter time than the hearing of the evidence vivâ voce.

4742. A l'Ordinaire, do the jurats take notes of the vivâ voce evidence?—Most of them do.

4743. The Bailiff. If you ask the question as an English lawyer, I should say no; that is to say, they do not take the same notes as an English Judge would do. They take notes of such matters as strike them to guide themselves.

4744. (To the Bailiff.) You probably take fuller notes?—I do not take the same notes as an English Judge would take; nor do I conceive there is the same authority attaching to my notes.

4745. As you generally sum up the law and the facts, possibly the Jurats, who have not taken full notes, might sometimes say to you, will you let me know exactly what such a witness said?—What is a great impediment to taking notes, and renders it impossible to take the full note that an English Judge would, is the practice, which came before the Commissioners yesterday, of setting a man on upon his story and making him go on without stopping till he comes to the end. While that is going on, the utmost you can do is, just to take down those matters on which it is necessary to examine him further. I do not consider the Bailiff's notes as of any authority whatever. I should not send them as notes of the trial.

4746. What would guide the discretion of a Secretary of State, in the case of a sentence à l'Ordinaire and an application for a pardon?—I have applied for a pardon, not in a case à l'Ordinaire, but in a police case: and I applied in consequence of facts that came to my knowledge in a subsequent investigation au secret. Of course, whatever notes I might take in other cases, in point of fact, in a secret proceeding there are are no notes: but I stated the facts that had come to my knowledge; and a pardon was granted.

4747. Could this alteration be introduced? Assuming in all other respects the system to remain unaltered, that you should say to the Jurats, "I consider the law is so and so, and the questions of fact are these;" that, then, the opinion of the Jurats as judges should be taken on the law, and, that that being decided, they should determine upon the facts distinctly afterwards. Do you think that could be done?—I have occasionally, in my summing up, stated the point of law as it appeared to me clearly, without expressing any strong opinion as to the facts, but leaving them very much to the Jurats.

4748. That is, strictly, unconstitutional here, is not it?—I have sometimes, probably, abstained from expressing so strong an opinion upon the facts as it was necessary for them to do.

4749. Might not the law be laid down peremptorily first, and then the Jurats have the facts submitted to them?—I think it would be very difficult. Supposing the Bailiff proposes certain propositions as being the law of the case applicable to the facts, and the Court is of his opinion by a majority of five to four, I think the minority would be placed in a great difficulty. They would have either to follow their own judgment against the majority of the Court, or they would have to apply the facts to legal propositions which they thought erroneous.

4750. You think they could not be brought to consider the decision come to as peremptory, and acquitting their consciences up to that point?—I think it would be very difficult.

4751. Mr. Carré. The present system operates in favour of the prisoner, of taking the opinion concerning the law and the fact at the same time and individually from each Jurat. One Jurat, for instance, may consider the law to be in favour of the prisoner and the evidence to be against him; and then he would acquit: and another Jurat may conceive the law to be against the prisoner but the evidence not to make out the charge; and then, he would acquit also.

John de Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

October 1st, 1846.

4752. The Contrôle. With regard to one particular point, if the counsel for the prisoner were obliged to plead all errors in the acte d'accusation, before going into the facts, that would, of course, compel the Court to decide that point by itself, and would relieve the summing up of that particular point. That, however, is a small matter; it only takes that particular portion of the difficulty away.

4753. The Bailiff. The only advantage, almost, of the proceeding au Grand Criminel is that, if there is an application for a pardon or, as there used to be, for a commutation of punishment, all the proceedings can be sent to the Privy Council. In other cases, that cannot be, unless you make it the duty of the Judge to take notes: and, if you do that, you will alter, to a considerable extent, the mode in which the evidence is taken; because it must be taken more slowly, and that would interfere with that mode of taking evidence which many people here think to be highly desirable.

4754. (To the Contrôle.) What is the interval, generally, between the judgment and the execution of the sentence?

4755. The Contrôle. The sentence is executed immediately.

4756. Without time for a pardon?—Certainly, without time for a pardon, except in cases of death. In cases of death, there is a certain interval given between delivering judgment and its being carried into effect.

4757. During which interval a pardon may be asked for?—Yes; but, in cases of imprisonment or other corporal punishment, it is inflicted immediately.

4758. In the case of whipping or the pillory is it so?—Whipping has not been inflicted of late years: but, I believe, in practice, it has been inflicted upon the very day that the man has been tried, though not invariably so. That day week would be the usual course now, I think.

4759. The Bailiff. Whipping is quite within the power of the Court now; and I have suggested it, in one case, within this twelvemonth.

4760. Mr. De Courcy. I was threatened with it myself by the Court in private.

4761. When was that?—In 1826.

4762. The Contrôle. There was the case of a boy, not above three or four years ago.

4763. It was the practice to execute such sentences immediately, was it?—Yes; I fancy now that it would be deferred.

4764. The Bailiff. I believe whipping has been accustomed to be a public punishment. should recommend it to be done privately.

4765. The Commissioners had, in Jersey, some evidence that, according to strictness of law, sentences were obliged to be executed as soon as pronounced?—That was the practice here.

4766. Mr. Jeremie. I believe what opened the eyes of the Court was the affair of Pecqueur. He was flogged; and, after his having been flogged, the Privy Council remitted that part of the sentence. I remember that case very well. He was flogged according to the usual system; that is to say his punishment was ordered one minute, and the next minute the bordiers attended here with their halberts and took him off to the place of execution; the Procureur, the Contrôle, the Greffier, and, I believe, all the law officers of the Crown, holding the Queen's commission, except the Bailiff, attended the execution. After his having been flogged, the week following, that part of the sentence was commuted; and, since then, I believe, the opinion has generally prevailed to give a week. When a man is sentenced to be hanged, it is on the Saturday; and, I believe, in the notes, you will find he is executed on the Friday following. They give in that case a week.

4767. The Contrôle. That was the old practice. In the last case, further time was given.

4768. Mr. Jeremie. That was upon application. I am speaking of the law. It is true the Court has sometimes put it off upon application; but, I think, the Commissioners can take, as the general rule, that all punishments are executed immediately after they are ordered.

4769. When you say they commuted this sentence, we suppose you mean they remitted that part of it, not that they substituted any other?—No; they remitted a part of the sentence. He was condemned to be transported to the penal settlements, and to be flogged besides. The Executive remitted the flogging, and ordered the transportation; but, as this man had been flogged in the interval, he had both punishments.

4770. (To the Contrôle.) Do the Court ever exercise the power themselves, after passing sentence, of remitting a part of the sentence?—No; I think not.

4771. Was not there something of that kind in Percy's case?—That case was this. A man of the name of Percy was condemned, in the Court of Police, to one month's imprisonment, part of which was to be on bread and water. During his incarceration, his medical attendant came to the Court and declared upon oath; I rather think there was another medical man also heard; but one medical man certainly declared, upon oath, that it would be dangerous to his health to inflict that part of the punishment of bread and water. He was a man of intemperate habits; and his health was impaired; and the medical man stated that it might be dangerous to his life to carry that part of the sentence into execution: and, I believe, that part was omitted.

4772. (To the Bailiff.) Supposing it turns out, after sentence, that medical reasons render the carrying out of the sentence improper; is there no power at all, without sending to the Crown, of commuting it?—I am not prepared to answer that.

4773. The Contrôle. It has been done, on one or two occasions. I have known it refused: but, on very peculiar occasions, where medical men have made strong statements on the subject, as in Percy's case, it has been granted.

4774. The Bailiff. Upon a person's health being in danger, whether the Court has the power to open the prison doors and let him out, I cannot give an opinion. In cases of debt, or cases of contempt, I apprehend the Court has power to moderate the punishment.

4775. (To the Contrôle.) Is there any record kept in the Acte of Court of what actually was done in the case of Percy?—Yes.

4776. The entry was put in, and is as follows.

Le vingt-deux Février, mil huit-cent quarante-quatre, devant Monsieur le Baillif, présens Hilary Olivier Carré, Thomas W. Gosselin, et Harry Dobrée, Ecrs., Jurés.

Antoine Power Percy, du Comté de Suffolk, en Angleterre, ayant été ce jour produit devant la Cour par Mr. Thomas Brehaut, un des Connétables de la paroisse de Saint Martin, étant accusé d'avoir sans aucune provocation quelconque attaqué deux soldats, sur la grande route, en la dite paroisse, et d'avoir frappé l'un deux avec un bâton qu'il avait en main, dont s'ensuivit meurtrissure et effusion de sang : la Cour, après avoir entendu des témoins dignes de foi, ouies les conclusions du Contrôle de la Reine, a condamné le dit Percy à un mois d'emprisonnement dans la prison publique, dont les premiers quinze jours seront au secret au pain et à l'eau. Mais, subséquemment, sur la déclaration de Gladstane Carey, Ecuyer, Chirurgien, que les habitudes et la santé du dit Percy étaient telles que sa vie serait en danger, s'il était gardé au pain et à l'eau, la Cour, ouies les conclusions du dit Contrôle de la Reine, a remis cette partie de la sentence."

4777. The Contrôle. I think there are one or two other cases, which can be found. I recollect applications having been made, and I recollect applications being refused. I think there is a case where a man was in solitary confinement, and the doctor declared that air was necessary o him, and he was allowed one or two hours a-day to walk in the court yard.

4778. (To the Bailiff.) Should you consider you had the power of altering the punishment awarded within any limit of time?—In England, the sentence may be altered within the same session.

4779. Mr. Carré. It is put in execution here the moment it is pronounced.

4780. The Contrôle. Technically, it is vox missa the moment it is pronounced.

4781. The Governor has a limited power of imprisonment; has not he?—Yes.

4782. For how long?—For twenty four hours. It is by an Order in Council.

4783. Judgment is given, not upon the different chefs d'accusation, but as one general decision, is not it?—Yes. In one or two cases, the Court have motivé their decision.

4784. What is the technical form in which the sentence is recorded?

4785. Mr. MacCulloch. In cases in which a party was found Guilty of the whole of the offences charged, it used to be the practice to register the sentence as follows. "A. B. amerci envers les officiers de la Reine en la cause qu'ils ont encontre lui à se voir adjugé pour avoir" (setting out the whole acte d'accusation) : "et est le dit A. B. condamné à" (such a punishment). But, if found Guilty only of part of the offence charged, the sentence was registered as follows. "Sur l'action des officiers de la Reine contre A. B., à se voir adjugé pour avoir" &c. (setting out the acte d'accusation) : "après preuve d'avoir commis" (stating the offence proved). "Est le dit A. B. amerci envers le dits officiers de la Reine et est condamné à" (such a punishment).

4786. The Contrôle. The modern practice has been that the second form has been universally followed: but in one case, not long ago, the decision of the Court was motivé.

4787. Has there been, do you think, any modification in the practice since there has been a Judge from England presiding on the bench?—I think there have been points of technical order better put than they were before.

4788. As to the way, for instance, in which witnesses are examined, whether longer or shorter?—No; I think not. I think, there has been a little more regularity, as to proceedings au secret, but no fundamental change certainly.

4789. Mr. Jeremie. It would be right to say that, when a prisoner is condemned here, he pays costs, when he is "amerci;" but, when the Crown is "au silence," the defendant gets no costs.

4790. (To the Contrôle.) What is the amount of costs which a prisoner would incur in that way?

4791. The Contrôle. In cases au Criminel Ordinaire, something under 5*l.* I do not think they can exceed 5*l.* in the Procès Ordinaire; about 5*l.* I should say. In cases au Grand Criminel, the costs would be double.

4792. Are not his goods confiscated au Grand Criminel?—Yes, generally they are; but, au Grand Criminel, the Court may pass a minor sentence without confiscation. The lowest degree of punishment involving confiscation is banishment for seven years.

4793. Does the Court inflict costs where there is confiscation?—Yes; the sentence runs always with costs. It is a superfluity; but it does run so. There is nothing to prevent the Court from inflicting au Grand Criminel, and there are many cases where the Court has inflicted, a lesser sentence than that, where confiscation would not ensue.

4794. He gets no costs if he is acquitted?—No; and the costs which I have mentioned are the costs he has to pay. Those are, of course, independently of the costs of his own defence.

4795. What is the process for recovering costs?—An account is sent to the prisoner, followed by a summons and a prise des biens; on which he is sued in the same way as on any other debt.

4796. Have debts to the Crown a preference here?—No. There are particular privileges as to suing in a particular way; but that applies to all cases of costs. Costs are very seldom recovered. I should say that the average is not more than two prosecutions a-year in which costs are received. The average, for the last ten years, I think, would not give that even.

4797. The Procureur. In practice, his own costs are always borne by the party accused; though I find in Terrien, book xii., chap. 42, these words :—"Car le Roy doit justice et doit estre content de la peine corporelle ou pecuniaire qui luy est adjugée. Aussi au contraire le Procureur du Roy n'est condanné en aucuns despens, si l'accusé est absous."

4798. Is that allowed?—It is not allowed; but the Approbation says: "Au lieu dudit quarante-deuxième chapitre, nous usons pour les fraix et coustages des Criminels exécutez, que le Prince les porte, et en est chargé; mais qu'estant délivrez sans confiscation de leurs biens et punition corporelle, ils sont portés par les parties mesme, sans aucune charge au Prince."

GUERNSEY.

Charles de Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine, further examined.

4799. What are the legal authorities of Alderney?—The President of the court, who is called the Juge, six Jurats, a Greffier, and a Prevôt.

4800. Is the Judge called the Bailiff?—No; the President of the Court is called Le Juge.

4801. Who appoints the Judge?—The Crown.

4802. By whom are the Jurats appointed?—They are elected.

4803. Is Alderney divided into more than one parish?—No; there is but one parish.

4804. Do you happen to know in whom the right of voting for Jurats is vested in Alderney?—In the rate payers.

4805. By whom is the Greffier appointed?—By the Crown.

4806. And the Prevôt?—No; the Prevôt serves for a limited period. There are twelve officers appointed called Le Prevôté, who serve the office of Prevôt for one year each.

4807. Mr. MacCulloch. They consider it a very onerous office, because they have no prison, and they are bound to keep prisoners as they can. I believe they lock them up in a room and watch them.

4808. (To the Procureur.) Twelve persons, you say, constitute the Prevôte; and one serves every year in the office?—Yes.

4809. Is there any constable in Alderney?—Yes.

4810. More than one?—There are two constables, and two deputy constables.

4811. Are they elected officers?—I suppose they may be all four elected officers; but I am not certain as to the two deputies.

4812. Do the Judge and the six Jurats compose a Court of Justice?—Yes; but they have no criminal jurisdiction; by which, I mean to say that they could not decide on any crime.

4813. Is that taking crime in its technical sense, or do you mean that they could not decide on any offence?—Not upon any criminal offence. When an offence is committed in Alderney, the offender is taken up and brought before the Alderney Court.

4815. By the constable?—Yes; or the assistant constable.

4816. Is that before the Judge alone?—Before a quorum of the Court, composed of the Judge and two or more Jurats.

4817. What takes place then?—The witnesses are examined, and the interrogatory of the prisoner taken.

4819. If it so happens that the Alderney Court should think there is not sufficient evidence, what is the result?—They exercise a discretionary power.

4820. They would dismiss the charge?—Yes.

4821. Their power, therefore, consists in examining, and dismissing or committing?—Not committing; they refer the matter to the Guernsey Court. Then, they give a copy of that acte and a copy of the depositions to the Alderney Prevôt, who takes charge of the prisoner, and brings him to Guernsey. The Alderney Prevôt waits on the Bailiff and one of the Crown lawyers, to apprize them that he has a prisoner, and gives, usually to the Crown lawyers, but to one or the other, the acte of the Alderney Court and the depositions, at the bottom of which is the Interrogatoire. The Bailiff convenes a Cour Ordinaire, where the Interrogatoire and the depositions are examined; and, if the Cour Royale be of opinion that the offence is of a nature to be tried, and that the evidence, as taken by the Court of Alderney, may be sufficient, they order the witnesses to be sent over from Alderney on a particular day; and, on the arrival of the witnesses in Guernsey, they appear before the Cour du quartier; and there the whole matter is commenced de novo. The not having the witnesses, in the first instance, from Alderney has been in consequence of a modern Ordonnance of the Court.

4822. Of the Court of Guernsey?—Yes. It was passed in consequence of a number of witnesses coming over and remaining in the Island a very long time, in a case in which, after examination, it was not thought necessary to commit the parties.

4823. In the case of any small offence, which amounts to a mere contravention of Police regulations, would the parties be brought over to the Court of Guernsey?—In practice, for the contravention of Police regulations, it is not done. I have not known it done for many years.

4824. Do you know what becomes of the people who happen to offend in that way?—I suppose they punish them; but I do not think they have authority.

4825. Mr. MacCulloch. I believe, in practice (I do not know how far it is founded in law), the Court in Alderney consider themselves authorized to inflict a fine not exceeding three livres tournois, that is, four and three pence halfpenny sterling. They do not consider that they are entitled to imprison.

4826. (To the Procureur.) They have no prison, have they?—I think they had a kind of lock-up house in what they call the market. I believe they have none now. Occasionally, the thing has been put in this way, though, of course, it is very irregular. They tell a man charged with a trifling offence, if you will leave it to us, and not insist upon being sent to Guernsey, we will condemn you to a slight imprisonment, which I believe they do occasionally; an imprisonment of a couple of days, as it were by consent.

GUERNSEY.

Charles de Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 1st, 1846.

4827. Do you know from whence the jurisdiction of the Judge and Jurats, in Alderney, is derived, such as it is?—No; it is very ancient.

4828. Have they any power of making Ordonnances or laws to regulate the internal affairs of the Island of Alderney?—The States have; but not the Court.

4829. There are also States there, are there?—Yes. I would impress it upon the Commissioners that giving an authority to the Alderney Court, say to imprison as far as eight days, or to fine as far as fourteen livres, would be a very proper thing to do, in my opinion.

4830. You would give them a police jurisdiction?—Yes. I should say that giving them a right to imprison for eight days, and a right to fine as high as fourteen livres, would be a very proper thing.

4831. You say, there are States also in Alderney; are they identical with the Court?—Nearly so: I believe they are composed of the Judge, six Jurats, and the Procureur de la Reine. I do not know whether the Contrôle is considered a member of the Court or not; of course, the Lieutenant Governor and the Douzaine.

4832. The Lieutenant Governor of Guernsey is now the Governor of Alderney, is he not?—Yes: and, in practice, no meeting of the States takes place without his consent. The Lieutenant Governor of Guernsey generally sends a special Commission to some individual in Alderney, to attend the meeting as his representative: and, I believe, he is sworn in to assist the Lieutenant Governor for the day.

4833. How many does the Douzaine consist of?—Of twelve.

4834. Do you know whether the Douzaine is a similar body to that which is called the Douzaine in this island?—I believe precisely so. I do not know whether the whole of their functions are precisely the same.

4835. Do you know the limits within which they have the power of making laws?—I do not. I consider that a great part of their Ordinances are police regulations. There is a recent case in which, after a change had been effected in the laws of inheritance here, the States of Alderney submitted to Her Majesty in Council a plan of certain modifications in the laws of inheritance in Alderney, which was confirmed by the Privy Council. Some of the details which have been adopted in Guernsey were found inapplicable to Alderney.

4836. Have the Cour Royal of Guernsey any power of reviewing those Ordinances at all, or in any way deciding on their validity?—They are never submitted to them for confirmation: but I have known instances of petitions presented to the Royal Court of Guernsey by inhabitants of Alderney, complaining of Ordinances made by the Alderney States.

4837. Do you know what took place on any of those occasions, or in what shape the proceedings came before the Court?—By petition.

4838. Would that be to the Court in its legislative capacity?—Yes.

4839. Mr. Le Retilley. In 1820, I see in a note in a book which I have, "Sur le différens entre la Cour et les Etats d'Auregny, savoir qui a le droit de passer les Ordonnances, la Cour de cette Ile ordonne que, provisoirement, ce droit ne sera exercé que dans les Etats." It appears that these differences had been referred by the Court and States of Alderney to the Cour Royale.

4840. Mr. MacCulloch. In an index of subjects which I have kept, I find: "La Cour d'Auregny transmettra les causes en crime à la Cour Royale. Réglemens des Commissaires 1585; et ainsi jugé 1726. April, 1823, 8th May."

4841. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Are Ordinances passed in Guernsey considered binding in Alderney?—It is sometimes ordered that the Ordinance shall be transmitted to the Island of Alderney to be carried into force there. I believe there is some passage which states that the Court of Alderney is bound by the Ordinances of the Royal Court which affect the mode of proceeding.

4842. Mr. Le Retilley. They are transmitted to the Greffier of the court of Alderney to be carried into effect there.

4843. Mr. MacCulloch. I find in my book, at the date 1757, 14th of June, a jugement in a case on appeal from Alderney, decided by the Royal Court of Guernsey. It would appear, by the note, to have come originally in the shape of a petition to the Cour Ordinaire in Guernsey, and then as an appeal to the full Court. It was on the subject of a Jurat elected in Alderney; and the petition is rejected. In 1826, September the 16th or 19th, an Ordonnance of the Royal Court of Guernsey was registered in the livre des Rentes, to the effect that an Ordonnance of the States of Alderney prohibiting the Banon, that is, cattle being left at large on the Blaye, was confirmed; and a petition of various inhabitants against that Ordonnance was rejected. Here is an Ordonnance, aux Chefs Plaids, of 1785, the 3rd of October, which declares that the Court of Alderney has no power to disallow the actes of the States of Alderney, but may complain against them to the Royal Court of Guernsey. In 1810, June the 5th, the States of Alderney having made an Ordonnance authorising the levy of a duty of 1*s.* per gallon on all spirituous liquors imported into the Island on account of strangers, it is ordered that the States shall give their reasons for having passed such Ordonnance, and, in the mean time, that the duty shall not be levied. On the 16th June of the same year, a few days afterwards, the said Ordonnance was disallowed.

4844. Was that in Chefs Plaids?—Yes; it was by the Court in its legislative capacity.

4845. Mr. Le Retilley. Here is an Acte of the Royal Court of Guernsey in the case of a complaint of the Governor against the Court of Alderney.

The same was read as follows.

"Jeudi, le douzième Décembre, mil huit-cent seize, devant Monsieur le Bailli, présens Pierre de Jersey, Eléazer Le Marchant, Carteret Priaulx, Daniel De Lisle Brock, Jean La Serre, Pierre Le Pelley, et Jean Guille Ecuyers Jurés.

La Cour, aujourd'hui assemblée en conséquence de son Acte du 23e Novembre dernier, pour faire droit sur la plainte de Jean Le Mesurier, Ecuyer, Seigneur et Gouverneur de l'Ile d'Auregny, en date du 13e Novembre, 1816, contre la Cour d'Auregny, et la réponse de la dite Cour, en date du 3e courant, dans laquelle la dite Cour annonce son intention de s'en remettre à sa dite réponse sans être entendu par Avocat, après avoir entendu le dit Monsieur le Gouverneur par ses Avocats, a jugé que la Cour d'Auregny n'aurait pas dû objecter à la licence donnée par le dit Mr. Le Gouverneur à Simon Le Vallée, Cabaretier, pour les raisons insérées dans son Acte du 3e Février, 1816, n'y ayant rien, dans l'Acte de la Cour Royale du 11e Juin, 1812, qui puisse autoriser leur objection, et Monsieur le Gouverneur ayant droit de prendre tous ses titres en donnant la dite licence. Quant aux raisons, alleguées depuis dans leur réponse, fondées sur l'absence de Monsieur le Gouverneur hors de l'Ile d'Auregny à cette époque du 3e Février, 1816, la Cour ne cense pas qu' elles soient de nature à priver Monsieur le Gouverneur de son droit de donner les licences aux cabaretiers: partant ordonne à la dite Cour d'Auregny d'accepter la dite licence de Simon Le Vallée et les autres licences de la même nature.

Sur le second Chef, la Cour juge que la Cour d'Auregny auroit dû et doit enregîtrer les lettres de Monsieur le Gouverneur qui nommoient à la charge de Lieutenant Gouverneur et à l'office de Contrôle du Roi, et qu'elle le doit, dans tous les cas où il s'agit de nomminations publiques, quoique la Cour cense que, dans tous les cas, il seroit plus régulier pour Monsieur le Gouverneur d'addresser ses lettres, nommant aux dites nomminations, directement à Monsieur le Juge ou le Président de la Cour d'Auregny.

Quant au troisième Chef, la Cour juge que Monsieur le Ber, ayant été sermenté par acte de la Cour d'Auregny du 31e Janvier, 1803, et du consentement du dit Monsieur le Gouverneur, Receveur Général des droits et revenus de Sa Majesté, il doit prendre, en donnant les congés de Monsieur le Gouverneur, cette même qualité, aussi long tems qu' il sera conservé dans la dite charge par le dit Monsieur le Gouverneur. Et sera ce présent acte transmis à la dite Cour d'Auregny par le Greffier ou Deputé Greffier du Roi, afinqu' il soit duement enregitré sur les records de la dite Ile et observé."

4846. The Procureur. I have here the printed case, in the Appeal of the Court of Alderney against the Governor of Alderney, in which I find various documents set out upon this subject. Among others, I find the following.

"Orders established in the Island of Alderney by the Honourable Sir Thomas Leighton, Knight, Captain and Governor under Her Majesty the Queen of England, our Sovereign, in the Island of Guernsey, and by Mr. Thomas Wigmore, his Lieutenant, in the said Island, being appointed Commissioners, authorized by the Lords of Her Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council, according to their Lordships' Letters, dated at Greenwich the 21st June, in the year of our Lord, 1585, as well to hear and determine the causes in dispute between John Chamberlain, Esq., holding the said Island of Alderney in fee farm under Her Majesty, and the inhabitants of the said Island, as to examine and correct the abuses and disorders committed in the said Island, as well in the government as in the administration of justice in the said Island." The following is the 10th Article, which is now the law of the Island. Item; "It is ordered that the Jurats of the said Island shall execute and administer justice, in all causes arising in the said Island, according to their privilege, without any hindrance from the said John Chamberlain or of his heirs; and that the said Jurats shall suffer appeals to be made, and shall refer criminal causes to the Royal Court before the Bailiff and Jurats of the Island of Guernsey, as was always the custom; and they shall regulate their judgments and proceedings according to the laws and constitutions used in the Island of Guernsey, and of all proceedings and judgments made and issued by the said Jurats, they shall keep a good and faithful record, as they will answer to the contrary. Concluded and settled in the said Island, the last day of the month of September, in the year of our Lord, 1585."

I find here also the heading of an Ordonnance passed by the States of the Island of Alderney.

The same was read as follows.

4847. "At an Assembly of the States of the Island of Alderney. In presence of John Le Mesurier, Esq., Lord and Governor of this Island, &c. &c. &c. The 4th of December, 1809. Before Mr. Peter Gauvain, Judge; present, Messrs. Thomas Le Cocq, John Le Ber, Nicholas Barbenson, Nicholas Ollivier, Thomas Nicholas Robilliard, and William Joseph Sanford, Jurats, and Messrs. Peter Le Cocq, Samuel Le Cocq, Nicholas Le Cocq, Thomas Simon, Nicholas Le Ber, J. W. Le Patourel, Peter Simon, Peter Gauvain, John Pezet, and Nicholas Gaudion, Douzainiers, representing the rights of the public."

4848. That shows how the States are held?—Yes. These are the proceedings referred to by Mr. M'Culloch as an Ordonnance of the 29th of October, 1785, sent from Guernsey to be registered in Alderney. The Commissioners will find that it annuls an Act of the Court of Alderney of the 11th of May, 1784. This is the translation.

The same was read as follows.

"The Judge having presented to the Court an ordonnance of the Chief Pleas of the Royal Court of the Island of Guernsey, bearing date the third instant, which has been transmitted to him by the King's Registrar in the said island of Guernsey, that it might be registered in the records of this Island: it has been ordered, after the same had been read, that it should be registered upon the said records, and that the Acte of this Court of the 11th of May, 1784, therein mentioned, should be annulled, agreeably to the said Ordonnance; which Ordonnance is expressed as follows."

4849. The Procureur. Then follows the Ordonnance of the Guernsey Court, referred to by Mr. M'Culloch.

The same was read as follows.

"At the Chief Pleas after Michaelmas, held on the 3rd of October, 1785, before William Le Marchant, Esquire, Bailiff, present, Charles Andros, Nicholas Reserson, Peter De Jersey, Elisha Tupper, Peter Falla, John Guille, Eleazer Le Marchant, Charles Mauger, Robert Porret Le Marchant, and Peter De Havilland, Esquires, Jurates.

The King's Procureur of this Island having, on the 1st of June, 1784, presented to the Court a petition from the King's Procureur of the Island of Alderney representing that the States of the said Island of Alderney having passed an Act, dated the 27th July, 1782, to regulate the number of sheep each inhabitant of the said Island might have to graze on the common lands of the said Island, according to the said Act; and that Messrs. Simon Gauvain, Phil. Pezet, and John Simon, Jurates of the Court of the said Island of Alderney, forming the majority of the said Court of Alderney, had passed an Act dated the 11th of May, 1784, by which they had suspended the above mentioned Act of the States of the said Island of Alderney, which the King's Procureur of the said Island of Alderney has represented to be contrary to the rights of the said States, and that the said Court arrogated to itself a right that does not belong to it; and this Court having, by an Act dated the above mentioned day, 12th June, 1784, sent a copy of the said petition to the said Court of Alderney, with an order to reply thereto: This Court, after having received and considered the answer of the said Court of Alderney (the opinions of the King's Officers being taken), has annulled, and does annul the said Act of the said Court of Alderney, of the 11th May, 1784, which is hereby forbidden for the future to suspend or annul any act of the States of the said Island of Alderney, but to have recourse to the Royal Court of this Island, in any case wherein they may think themselves aggrieved by an Act of the said States. And the King's Registrar is ordered to transmit this present ordinance to the Judge of the same Court of Alderney, to cause it to be registered on the records of the said Court, and to cause the above mentioned Act of the said Court of the 11th May, 1784, to be expunged therefrom. (Signed) Joshua Gosselin, King's Registrar. Extracted from the records by me, Thomas Williams, King's Registrar.

4850. Mr. MacCulloch. I will hand in this Ordinance in 1790, which defines some of the duties of the Prevôt of Alderney. It appears to have been upon some representations of the authorities in Alderney through the Crown Lawyers in Guernsey.

The same was read as follows.

4851. (To the Procureur.) What is the principal officer at Sark?—The Seneschal.

4852. What is his office?—He is the judge of the Court of Sark; the only authority there.

4853. Are there no Jurats in Sark?—No: there were for a short time a Judge and four Jurats; but there are none now.

4854. Were the Jurats displaced by an Order in Council?

Mr. Carré. I think, being Presbyterians, they could find no one to take the oath which included the oath of supremacy.

4855. The Procureur. In August 23rd, 1672, by an Order in Council the Jurats were displaced, having refused to take the oath; and it is ordered that the Royal Court of Guernsey shall name a Seneschal. But a subsequent Order in Council of May 19th, 1675, directs that the Seneschal whom the Lord shall present shall be sworn in by the Court of Guernsey.

4856. The same Order in Council was delivered in, and is as follows.

CHARLES R. Trusty and wellbeloved, We greet you well, Whereas it hath been represented vnto us, by our trusty and wellbeloved, Sir Phillip Carteret, Bar^t^. Lord of the Island of Serke, that the Jurates of the said Island, having refused to take the oathes and subscribe the Declaration and receive the sacrement of the Lords Supper in such manner as by Law is directed: You, the Bayliffe and Jurates of our Court of our Island of Guernsey, have, according to the Act of Parliament in that behalfe made and provided, taken from them their civil authority; and whereas the rest of the inhabitants are poore and illiterate, or so auerse to the laws of the Church of England as to be incapable of becoming magistrates in the said Isle, and, thereby, the said Island hath remained, for above a yeare, without any administration of ciuil justice, to the great prejudice of our subjects there: We have thought fitt, and doe, hereby, order and direct that you, the Bayliffe and Jurats of our said Court of Guernsey, do give oath to a Seneschall, and establish such others officers as shall be requisite for the administration of the ciuil justice there, and who shall be named by the said Sir Phillip Carteret, in like manner as the said Sir Phillip doth at S^t^ Owen in Jersey, and other lords of the Islands of Jersey and Guernsey, do appoint in their respective Manners and Fees in the said Isles: and, for so doing, this shall be your warrant. And so We bid you farewell.—Giuẽn att our Court, att Whitehall, the 19^th^ day of May 1675, in the seaven and twentieth year of our reigne.

GUERNSEY.

Charles de Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 1st, 1846.

4857. (To the Procureur.) What does the Seneschal do?—He tries all civil cases.

4858. What is his criminal jurisdiction?—He tries all small offences. He has the right to inflict a fine of three livres tournois, and may also condemn to twenty hours' imprisonment.

4859. In other cases, does he act as a peace officer, and send the prisoners over here?—Yes.

4860. Are there constables?

Mr. MacCulloch. There is a constable and a prevôt.

4861. How are they appointed?—The prevôt, I believe, is appointed by the Seigneur. The constable, I believe, is appointed by the forty tenants at their Chefs Plaids.

4862. Is the whole Island divided into forty tenements?—Yes. There is a Greffier also.

4863. How is he appointed?—By the Lord.

4864. Then, all the officers are appointed by the Lord of Sark?

4865. Except the constable, who is elected for one year.

4866. How can those officers be displaced?—The Jurats in Alderney are precisely on the same footing as the Jurats of the Royal Court of Guernsey; but I am not sure about the officers of Sark.

4867. The Procureur. The only thing I find on the point is this: that in 1676, the 6th August, by an Ordinance of the Court itself, "Seneschal sermenté avec le même pouvoir et emoluments qu'avoient les naguères Juge et Jurés."

4868. Then there were a Judge and Jurats at Sark?—Yes, for a short time.

4869. Is the Seneschal an old officer?—Yes.

4870. Mr. MacCulloch. There is a good deal of confusion about it. Perhaps it will be proper to explain that the island of Sark was totally uninhabited. It was granted in the reign of Queen Elizabeth by letters patent to Hilary de Carteret, Lord of St. Ouen in Jersey, to hold it by the twentieth part of a Knight's service. The tenants were more or less assimilated to St. Ouen in their tenure of land; and so on. The whole is set forth in the letters patent. It would appear that Hilary de Carteret brought over to Sark from Jersey a number of his tenants who settled in the Island. It appears that, soon after that, in 1582, the inhabitants of Sark elected from among themselves a Bailiff and six Jurats. The matter, in some way, got before the Royal Court of Guernsey, I cannot tell how: but there are documents which will show it all. There was a long discussion about it; and finally the act of the inhabitants was disallowed. The Court deciding they had no right to do so. After that, I find, in 1583, April 24th, five Jurats were established, the Seigneur to act as Judge. After this, comes the appointment of the Seneschal in the room of the Judge and Jurats.

4871. The Procureur. There is also a Vingtenier.

4872. You have no officers called Vingteniers have you in this Island?—We have; but they are exclusively confined to militia affairs at present.

4873. Mr. Le Retilley. We had those officers: but they have been dropped for more than a century.

4874. (To the Procureur.) As to Herm and Jethou, they are in fact part of Guernsey, are they not?—Yes.

4875. Are there any constables in them?—There was one term in which a number of persons were appointed; but there are none at present. There is a little place which is an Island at high water, called Lihou, which is a part of the parish of St. Pierre du Bois.

---

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., further examined.

Robert Mac Culloch, Esq.

4876. There is a proceeding here called Cause en adjonction, is there not?—Yes.

4877. Will you explain to us the nature of it?—It is a mixed proceeding, the object being to obtain damages on the part of an individual, and, at the same time, to cause the offending party to be condemned to pay a fine to the Crown.

4878. Will you state the particular offences to which it applies?—To cases of libel, slander, and assault and battery.

4879. Is there a distinction, in your law, between libel and slander, the one being applied to written slander, and the other to spoken slander?—Yes; we use the word libel when slander has been put down in writing and published.

4880. What is your term for spoken slander?—Calomnie, diffamation, injure.

4881. The word that would answer to slander would be diffamation, would not it?—Yes.

4882. In what mode are proceedings en adjonction commenced?—The first step is a summons served on the party complained of. The form of the action is as follows. "A. B." (Plaintiff) "adjourné, instance de C. D." (Defendant) "à ouir sa plainte et déclaration, d'avoir eté, le dit A. B., grièvement injurié, calomnié & diffamé, &c. &c. (as the case may be);" "le dit C. D. ayant," [done or said so and so] "et le voir obtenir l'adjonction des officiers de la Reine pour en avoir réparation condigne avec dépens."

4883. In a case en adjonction for libel, is there any difference from a case for defamation?—No; they are the same. In the case of an atrocious libel against public functionaries, the Court would authorize a proceeding au Criminel Ordinaire, on the part of the Crown lawyers, the same as a proceeding for theft or any offence of that kind.

4884. In other cases is it, not a criminal but, a civil remedy?—Yes.

4885. Could not a common libel be proceeded on in a purely criminal shape?—I conceive it might: but I do not think the Court would authorize it, except in a very aggravated case.

4886. You think the Court would not sanction a purely criminal proceeding, unless the libel were of a very aggravated character indeed?—Yes; or unless it were on an officer of the Court.

GUERNSEY.

Robert Mac Culloch, Esq.

October 1st, 1846.

4887. Suppose it were an attack on an officer of the Court, in his private character: do you think the Court would sanction a proceeding purely criminal?—I think it would.

4888. On account of the dignity of the person injured?—Yes.

4889. The first proceeding is by summons. What follows upon that?—The cause, as we technically call it, is read by the Greffier in the usual course: and, if the party served with a summons appears at Court on the particular day, the most common proceeding is that the witnesses are ordered to be heard; and the Acte states, "sont les dites parties appointées prévenues respectivement; et est permise au dit A. B. adjonction des officiers de la Reine." If the defendant should not appear, a défaut is taken against him, of which a record is made; and the adjonction des officiers de la Reine is permitted.

4890. If the party does not appear, and an adjonction is ordered, what steps are taken?—Another summons is sent, which differs from the former one, inasmuch as, after the words "à l'instance de A. B." (the Plaintiff), the words "et officiers de la Reine joints" are added.

4891. Is this a mere summons, or does it authorize the seizing of the party?—It is a mere summons.

4892. Can a party issue this process of a cause en adjonction without the permission of the Procureur de la Reine?—That subject has been very much discussed. I can state what the difficulty is. The Crown lawyers have considered it their privilege to send the first summons; and no individual member of the bar could do so, without their sanction.

4893. The Procureur. That was the case formerly.

4894. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) In ordinary actions, is the summons issued by the advocate employed in the cause?—Always.

4895. Was the right of the Crown lawyers to issue the first summons contested on the part of the other Advocates of the Court?—Yes.

4896. What was the result of the contest?—That was connected with a dispute upon another point. The Crown lawyers claimed the exclusive right of pleading, one for the plaintiff and the other for the defendant, in all adjonction cases. This involved the right of sending the summonses. In the year 1809, a petition was presented to his then Majesty in Council by the then Advocates, in which they complained of the right claimed by His Majesty's Procureur and Contrôle in the said Island to plead, the one for the plaintiff and the other for the defendant, in actions for slander, libel, battery and suits touching the disturbance of real possessions, to the exclusion of the Advocates of the Royal Court. The petition appears to have been referred to the Royal Court for their answer, and also to the Crown lawyers.

4897. To give the Crown lawyers an opportunity of being heard upon the matter?—Yes, before the Privy Council. The Order states: The Lords of the Committee, in obedience to His Majesty's said order, have taken the said petition into consideration, and also the answer of the Royal Court of the said Island, and the answer of His Majesty's Crown lawyers to the said petition, whereupon it was ordered, by His Majesty in Council, that it be referred to the said Royal Court to decide upon the matter in controversy between the said Crown lawyers and the Advocates of the Royal Court.

4898. The Order in Council was put in, and is as follows.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 6th July, 1809.

By the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council for the affairs of Guernsey and Jersey,

His Majesty having been pleased to refer unto this Committee the humble petition of Peter le Cocq and John Jeremie the younger, Advocates of the Royal Court of the Island of Guernsey, upon the subject of a question at issue between the Crown lawyers and the Advocates of the said Royal Court, touching the right claimed by His Majesty's Procurator and Comptroller, in the said Island, to plead, one for the plaintiff and the other for the defendant, in actions for slander, libel, battery and in suits touching the disturbance of real possessions, to the exclusion of the Advocates of the Royal Court, and praying relief: The Lords of the Committee, in obedience to His Majesty's said order of reference, have taken the said petition into consideration, and also the answer of the Royal Court of the said Island, and the answer of His Majesty's said Crown lawyers to the said petition, and are thereupon pleased to order that it be referred to the Royal Court of the said Island of Guernsey to decide upon the matter in controversy between the said Crown lawyers and the Advocates of the Royal Court.

4899. Did the Royal Court come then to a decision?—Yes; I find here an argument on the subject, in writing, which is without date, but which appears to have been about that time; I presume 1809 or 1810. It appears to have been written by Mr. Jeremie, the father of the late Sir John Jeremie and of Mr. Advocate Jeremie: in it there are several authorities referred to upon the question. Upon the 9th of December, 1819, the Cour Ordinaire rejected the claim of the Advocates, and confirmed the previous practice. From this decision there was an appeal, on the part of the Advocates, to the full Court, aux jugements, as we call it: and, on the 13th of November, 1821, the previous decision of the Royal Court was confirmed, and the right claimed by the Procureur and the Contrôle of pleading, the one for the plaintiff and the other for the defendant, was established, with this modification: "La Cour, après avoir oui les parties et leurs avocats à longue et mûre delibération en tout ce qu'ils ont voulu dire et alléguer pour le mérite de la cause, a par jugement confirmé la dite sentence et le droit clamé par les dits Procureur et Contrôle du Roi, de plaider, l'un pour le plaintif et l'autre pour le défendeur, dans les dites causes, en y ajoutant la modification suivante: qu'il sera loisible à chacune des parties d'employer, de plus, un des avocats de la Cour Royale pour plaider pour elle, tant sur le fond que sur toute question préliminaire, lorsque elle le jugera à propos, et lequel avocat de l'une et de l'autre des parties parlera avant les deux Officiers du Roi."

4900. With us the leader opens the cause, and the other counsel act with him; that is not the case here?—That practice does not prevail here. I conceive that the Crown lawyer would always be considered the leader.

4901. A question for instance might arise between two counsel, whether it was advisable to call a particular witness: how would that be decided?—It is very difficult to say which opinion would prevail. The question as to sending the first summons is not decided. The sentence confirms the right of the Crown lawyers to act, but says that the parties may have, besides, the assistance of an advocate; even since the decision, I have known the Crown lawyers claim the exclusive right of serving the first summons. In the case of Sir William Collings, in the action brought by him against the Lieutenant Governor, the summons had been sent by one of the Advocates; and the then Bailiff questioned his right to do so; or rather it would be more accurate to say that he questioned his right to put the cause as we call it.

4902. The summons had been there sent by an advocate and not by the Procureur?—Yes; the question was not adjudicated on, because the Crown lawyers said they did not claim the right in that particular case.

4903. In that case the Crown Officers had refused to send the first summons, had not they?—Yes.

4904. In what year was that?—About a year and a half ago. In 1845, I think.

4905. Was it before the present Bailiff?—No; it was while Mr. Guille was Bailiff.

4906. Is this question as to the right of the Crown officers to withhold a summons still undecided?—I conceive it to be so. I am aware that differences of opinion will be found upon this particular point: I only state my own opinion.

4907. Will you proceed in stating the nature of the proceeding in a cause en adjonction?—Before the adjonction des officiers de la Reine is allowed by the Court, the defendant may be desirous of raising some point of law in the nature of a demurrer; he may say, for instance, that the words are not actionable. I conceive he may get that objection argued by any of the Advocates; he is not bound to go to either of the Crown lawyers for that purpose. If his objection were found good, the act of the Court would state that the action was rejettée.

4908. The proceedings would be commenced by the Crown officers as a cause en adjonction?—Yes.

4909. Then the party summoned would be able to take the objection which you state, namely, that the subject matter of complaint does not fall within the class of cases to which a cause en adjonction is applicable?—Yes.

4910. It would follow, would not it, that he would have a right to employ whom he liked; there is no adjonction, is there, at that time?—No: that question has been raised; I have heard it raised repeatedly, before the judgment of 1821. Supposing the adjonction to be permitted, and the witnesses to be heard, they would then be heard, very much, as in a civil case; they would be summoned in Court and examined vivâ voce, in the same way as in a civil case, or in a criminal procès à l'ordinaire; one of the Crown lawyers pleading for the plaintiff and the other for the defendant, and perhaps an advocate on each side, or only on one side, according to the wishes of the parties. I will put this case: supposing the plaintiff to have one Crown lawyer for him and no advocate, and the defendant to have an advocate, besides one of the Crown lawyers; the advocate who is retained for the defence is bound to speak first. I ought to explain, perhaps, in what way we manage our civil cases. The practice is this: the counsel for the plaintiff states his case: he is then answered by the counsel for the defendant, the witnesses having previously been sworn; then all the witnesses on both sides are heard; after which the counsel for the plaintiff, and again the counsel for the defendant, address the Court. In adjonction cases the course would generally be this: either the Crown lawyer or the advocate retained for the plaintiff would begin by stating the case generally, rather concisely; he would be replied to by either the Crown lawyer or the advocate retained for the defendant. The witnesses on both sides would then be examined; and, supposing the case which I put, of the plaintiff having retained no advocate besides his Crown lawyer, the man to begin commenting upon the evidence would be the defendant's advocate.

4911. So that the rule that the advocate de la partie parlera avant les deux officiers de la Reine affects what follows the hearing of the evidence?—It affects that principally, not exclusively.

4912. The defendant would be heard twice in point of fact?—Yes: or, in the converse case, the plaintiff would be heard twice and the defendant only once. The defendant has always the last word in a cause en adjonction, but by the mouth of the Crown lawyers, not by the mouth of the advocate.

4913. Mr. Jeremie. It is right to say that that judgment was a sort of compromise between the Crown lawyers and the Advocates: and the fact of its being a compromise may give a reason for the interpretation which we put upon it.

4914. The Court might know what was really meant though it was so worded?—Yes. In this Court advocates generally think it a very great advantage to speak last: and in that compromise you see the Crown officers, who generally get the better in all the struggles, wished to speak last.

4915. Mr. Mac Culloch. The reason appears to result from the system, the want of a proper brief. A man who opens a case, in a question of fact, is always very uncertain what he shall be able to prove.

4916. Mr. Jeremie. It is often very difficult to decide who is to begin.

4917. (To Mr. Mac Culloch.) Can a party commencing a cause en adjonction, at any stage of the proceeding, withdraw from it?—I conceive he may. In practice, if the case is abandoned, it is generally done by ceasing to proceed.

4918. Can the civil party, as opposed to the penal party who is the Crown officer, throw the thing up of his own accord?—Decidedly.

4919. You think the plaintiff may stay the proceedings at any stage?—Yes.

4920. What should you call that?—We have no technical term for it. If he does not proceed for a certain time the thing dies a natural death.

4921. Can the Crown officers abandon it without the consent of the civil party?—I should say not.

4923. The substantial amount is to the plaintiff?—Yes; the amount given to the Crown is merely nominal; it seldom exceeds three livres tournois, though I have known larger sums given; I think it often might be thirty livres tournois.

4924. Will you mention some sum which you should consider unusually large damages for the party to receive?—I do not at this moment recollect a larger sum than three hundred livres tournois, which would be about twenty one pounds. I think there are very few beyond one hundred livres tournois, or little more than seven pounds.

4925. With costs?—Yes.

4926. If a party fails is he liable to costs?—Yes. Upon this point I should state that, formerly, not within my recollection at all, I have met with acts of court in which the plaintiff was adjudged to pay a fine to the Crown. I conceive that was one of the reasons for which, originally, the Crown lawyer was adjoined to the defendant. The proceedings in cases of Clameur de Haro and Nouvelle dessaisine are very nearly similar. I should say there is no substantial distinction, with this exception, that a preliminary examination generally takes place before two of the Jurats as commis de la Cour.

4927. Those are both modes of proceeding for trespasses on real property?—Yes.

4928. And have taken a criminal form, probably on the ground that some violence is presumed?—Yes.

4929. Has every other criminal character now entirely disappeared?—Yes. I may state that those cases of Clameur de Haro and Nouvelle dessaisine are generally decided by the Court on the spot: they go and view the place.

4930. Is the preliminary examination before the two Jurats, as the commis of the Court, to view the place?—Yes; and to set down in writing the pretensions of the parties respectively. In the case of a Clameur de Haro, the party who is found to be in the wrong is condemned to a trifling fine, and a "regarde au château," which, in former times, was a night's imprisonment. If the plaintiff does not carry on his cause actively, in all these cases, the defendant may bring it into Court himself, and compel him to go on.

4932. Then the defendant would become the plaintiff in point of fact?—He would in point of form; though still, upon the case coming on to be tried, the plaintiff would be bound to begin and call his witnesses first. I wish to call the Commissioners' attention to a particular passage of Terrien, which would seem to show what the former practice was. It is Book XII., Chapter xxix., page 506. "Il faut icy présupposer que de tout crime, soit public ou privé, competent deux actions. L'une est criminelle dont la fin tend au profit du fisque et à l'interest public. L'autre est ciuile, qui est appelée mixte, pour ce que combien qu'elle descende de crime, toutesfois elle est intentée à fin civile tant seulement, et pour l'intérest de la partie privée. Namque alterum utilitas privatorum alterum vigor publicæ disciplinæ postulat. Car és délicts resulte la vengeance, sçavoir, est la peine quant au fisque, et la réparation du tort et dommage envers la partie privée. Et pourtant l'accusé peut estre condamné civilement et criminellement au regard des deux, à sçavoir est du privé et du fisque. Et comme, en matière criminelle, on adjuge intérest civil à la partie lesée, aussi, on peut infliger à l'accusé amende ou peine pécuniare à appliquer au fisque. Et y a aussi bien vengeance aux biens comme au corps et à la rénommée. Mais, toutesfois, la cause proprement est dite criminelle, quand la fin tend à la vengeance publique, pour faire punir le délict de la peine deuë et naturelle: mais si on tend à imposer moindre peine, combien qu'elle tourne au bien public et non au profit particulier de la partie, l'action n'est dite que civile. L'exemple peut estre donné, d'un clerc, qui, en cas de crime, est puny civilement par le Juge Royal, quand il est mis en amende envers le Roy pour le cas privilegié. Et, generalement la matière n'est point dite criminelle, criminellement intentée, sinon quand la fin d'icelle tend à peine afflictive de corps. Or, comme il y a deux actions descendantes des crimes, aussi y a il deux manières de accusateurs. L'un est le publique, c'est à sçavoir le Procureur du Roy, qui poursuit l'intérest du Roy et de la chose publique: et autre que luy ne le peut faire. L'autre accusateur est privé qui est la partie offensée, ou son plus prochain héritier. L'un tend à punition corporelle, amende honorable, ou pécuniaire envers le Roy, contre le délinquant, selon l'exigence du cas. L'autre demande réparation de son intérest civil, qu'il a souffert à cause du délict commis en sa personne ou en ses biens. Et sont le plus souvent les deux joints ensemble. Car, par le benefice du Procureur du Roy la partie civile parvient à ses fins. Et s'il n'y a partie civile, le Procureur du Roy poursuit seul le procèz. Ce qu'il fait aucunes fois à la dénonciation secrete, ou instigation d'autruy. Mais en ce cas, si le défendeur est absous, il peut avoir son recours de despens dommages et interests contre l'instigateur." Formerly we have traces of there being a partie civile in a case which we should now consider to be a criminal case.

4933. The Procureur. In the case of Mr. De Courcy, I produced a number of cases where the Crown lawyers had actioned the defendant, both being adjoined to the plaintiff. There are a great many proceedings, in ancient times, in which the civil party alone sued for damages, in which there is no record of the Crown lawyers being adjoined to them; they appeared to be purely civil. I may state, in reference to the passage from the 29th Chapter of the 12th Book of Terrien, that it is contained in the Approbation des Loix as approuvé.

4934. Mr. MacCulloch. My objection to the adjonction, independently of that which has been stated, is that the civil party is bound to put himself under the direction of the Crown lawyers, in a matter which affects himself personally.

4935. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Are those causes heard on the days for civil causes or criminal?—Criminal. There must be the Bailiff and at least seven Jurats present; and there is no appeal. They are generally called proceedings "au Petit Criminel." Cases of Nouvelle dessaisine and of Clameur de Haro, and proceedings for the levying of fines, are also called proceedings au Petit Criminel. One of the objections to the cause en adjonction is that the plaintiff may find himself hampered by neither of the Crown lawyers choosing to proceed in the matter.

4936. That is, supposing they had power to withhold the summons?—Yes. Another very serious objection is that the defendant should be compelled to retain one of the Crown lawyers. If he wishes any other advocate he must pay for two. He may have a person whom he may not like; or it may happen that one of the Crown lawyers is very superior to the other. The plaintiff has the choice of the two; he goes to which he likes; and the defendant is bound to take the one whom the plaintiff does not choose to employ. It may happen that he may be, comparatively speaking, inefficient.

4937. Do you also think it objectionable that, where the public has no interest, the civil party has not the means of withdrawing in a case en adjonction?—Yes; I think the civil remedy ought to be perfectly distinct from the other; and the one ought not to prejudice the other in any way. Supposing a party, who is assaulted in the street, makes a complaint through the constable, which is disposed of summarily by the Cour Ordinaire, as a police case: if the party complained of is in any way punished, the civil party, the party aggrieved, has no right to bring an action en adjonction. I consider that in all those cases there ought to be a purely civil remedy, in the nature of an action for damages.

4938. Would you exclude the right of the public prosecutors to institute proceedings?—No; I should let them proceed as they pleased. I should see no objection to this: if, in the course of a proceeding of this nature by the party aggrieved, the Crown lawyers considered the interests of society involved, that they should come in and pray for an infliction of a fine on the party who might be found in the wrong, either plaintiff or defendant.

4939. Why should not they have a perfectly distinct proceeding without coming into the Civil Court at all? Suppose there were a libel on a man, which contained, besides a gross reflection upon his character, a great deal of obscenity, or a challenge to fight, both of which last would be public nuisances, why should the injury which the party suffered from this abuse exclude or be excluded by the right of the public to say we will not suffer our comfort to be disturbed?—That is my view. But some cases may, and do in practice, occur, in which the first knowledge which the Crown lawyers have of a circumstance of the sort is not obtained by them until the action is brought. I know of no instance in this Island, within my practice, in which a civil action has been brought by a party robbed to obtain a restitution of the goods, for example. But the civil interest of the party ought to be protected; and he ought to have some remedy against the evil-doer. In cases of robbery, if the goods have been discovered, the practice is to give them up to the proprietor after the trial is over.

4940. (To the Procureur.) Do you wish to qualify what has been said by Mr. Mac Culloch?—I do not agree with Mr. MacCulloch in saying that the first summons must be had from the Crown lawyers. I was one who opposed the Crown lawyers originally: and, even then, I was of opinion, and have always been, that, as the first summons prays to be allowed l'adjonction des officiers de la Reine, the first summons might be sent by any advocate; but I know that, in practice, it has been claimed by the Crown officers. It was so formerly, but not now.

4941. (To the Procureur.) In the late proceeding, in Sir William Collings's case, no point was actually decided; the adjonction did not go finally, did it?—No. The officers of the Crown refused to be parties to the proceedings, on three grounds. First, because, as officers of the Crown, they could not proceed against the Governor. Secondly, because the Governor was not amenable to the Court. And, thirdly, because there was a distinct order from the Government at home not to proceed.

4942. Was either of the three grounds on which that case depended finally decided?—No; I believe not. I would merely add that, on the point of the Lieutenant Governor not being amenable to the Court, the Crown lawyers relied in a great measure on a decision of the 1st of December, 1783.

4943. The Court refused the adjonction, did not they, in that case, in order that application might be made to the Queen in council?—Precisely.

4944. Of course, the Court, and the Bar, and the Governor, and every body, would be very glad to have those points definitively settled one way or the other?—I have no doubt they would.

4945. Mr. Andros. With respect to the third point, the Procureur refused to proceed, and wrote to the Government, stating what he had done, and received a letter from the Government approving of it.

4946. The Procureur. The order to me was to persist in my refusal.

4947. In the language of the judgment, it was assumed, was not it, that there was a distinct order?

4948. Mr. Andros. It was assumed that the Court could do no more; and it was stated that Sir William Collings was left to take his remedy as he could.

GUERNSEY.

Robert Mac Culloch, Esq.

October 1st, 1846.

4950. The Court was obliged to refuse the adjonction because the Crown officers would not adjoin ?—Just so.

4951. The Procureur. The decision is on the 1st of March, 1845.

4952. (To Mr. Le Febvre, Greffier.) Will you produce the entries in the case of Sir William Collings?

The same were delivered in, and are as follow.

Samedi, le premier Février, mil huit-cent quarante-cinq, devant Monsieur le Baillif, présens Jean Le Marchant, T. W. Gosselin, Thomas Le Retilley, Harry Dobrée, T. F. De Havilland, Thomas Andros et Edgar MacCulloch, Ecuyers, Jurés.

William Francis Patrick Napier, Ec^r^., C.B., Major Général dans l'Armée Britannique, versus Messire William Collings, Chevalier, à ouir sa plainte et déclaration d'avoir été, le dit William Collings, grièvement insulté, injurié, calomnié, diffamé et libellé par le dit William Francis Patrick Napier, le trente Mars, mil huit-cent quarante-quatre, ou environ, le dit William Francis Patrick Napier ayant écrit et envoyé au dit William Collings, le dit jour, trente Mars, mil huit-cent quarante-quatre, ou environ, une lettre dont suit copie. 30th March, 1844. Sir, Major Brainbrigge has informed me that you refuse to contradict the infamous and false charge which has appeared in the Gazette of the 16th, as part of your speech, and which I have pointed out to you. You promised you would contradict it; you now refuse; you have, therefore, forfeited your word as a gentleman; and I am entitled to hold you responsible, as having made use of the language attributed to you in the Gazette. This, sir, is a foul charge, which you have dared to utter, as a Judge on the bench, against me, Her Majesty's representative. My position prevents me from exacting from you that reparation which I would instantly have done if I had been in a private capacity. I shall, therefore, call upon the Secretary of State to enforce the reparation due to me, in my public capacity, for this false and infamous charge. Meanwhile, leaving you with the dishonour of having added to that false charge the breach of your word as a gentleman,—I remain, sir, Sir W. Collings, K^t^. W. Napier, L^t^.-Govn^r^.

La dite lettre étant fausse et calomnieuse, tendant à avilir et déshonorer le dit William Collings, tant comme particulier qu'en sa qualité de Juré Justicier de la Cour Royale de cette Ile, le tout contre son honneur, crédit et réputation, et à son grand préjudice et dommage, et sans aucune provocation de sa part. Et est permise au dit William Collings l'adjonction des Officiers de la Reine pour en avoir réparation condigne avec dépens.

L'avant dit jour, premier Mars, mil huit-cent quarante-cinq, devant Mons^r^. le Baillif, présens, Jean Le Marchant, Thomas Le Retilley, Harry Dobrée, Thomas F. de Havilland, Thomas Andros, et Edgar MacCulloch, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Messire William Collings, Chevalier, s'étant, aujourdhui, plaint à la Cour d'un déni de justice de la part de Charles De Jersey, Ec^r^., Procureur de Sa Majesté, et aussi de la part de Jean Thomas De Saumarez, Ec^r^., Contrôle de Sa Majesté; en ce que les dits Officiers de la Reine lui ont, l'un et l'autre, refusé leur adjonction lorsque requis de la lui prêter dans une cause qu'il a intentée contre W^m^. Francis Patrick Napier, Ec^r^., C.B., Major Général dans l'Armée Britannique, pour obtenir réparation condigne d'une injure calomnieuse à lui faite dans une lettre qui lui fut addressée par le dit Major Général Napier en date du 30 Mars, 1844, laquelle adjonction fut permise par cette Cour, sur l'action du dit Messire W^m^. Collings et par le défaut du dit Major Général Napier, par Acte en date du 1^e^ Fev^r^. 1845, à quoi recours: La Cour, après avoir entendu tant le dit Messire William Collings par son Conseil, que les dits Officiers de la Reine, lesquels ont, l'un et l'autre, déclaré refuser leur adjonction, dans la dite cause, d'autant que le dit Major Général Napier est Lieutenant Gouverneur de cette Ile, appuyant leur refus par diverses raisons de droit et de fait, et, en outre, alléguant avoir reçu un ordre péremptoire du Gouvernement de Sa Majesté, le 20 Fev^r^. 1845, de ne prêter leur ministère au dit Messire William Collings, dans la dite cause; considérant qu'il a été, jusqu'ici, de droit strict que les Officiers de la Reine fussent parties adjoints, l'un à l'acteur et l'autre au défendeur, dans toutes poursuites en adjonction pour réparation d'injures; que le défendeur, en pareilles causes, ne peut être sommé à paraître en justice que par le moyen d'un ajour revêtu de l'autorité et portant la signature de celui des dits Officiers de la Reine qui est adjoint à l'acteur; et qu'un jugement ne peut être donné, en pareilles causes, qu'après avoir entendu les conclusions des Officiers de la Reine: A jugé qu'elle ne peut, dans les circonstances actuelles, procéder outre dans la dite cause, et est sans préjudice au droit du dit Messire W^m^. Collings de se plaindre à l'autorité supérieure du dit refus des dits Officiers de la Reine, ou de demander par autre voie réparation de l'injure qu'il allégue lui avoir été faite par le dit Major Général Napier.

Et se réserve cette Cour de faire telles humbles répresentations qu'elle jugera convenable à Sa Majesté en Conseil, tant sur les circonstances relevant de cette cause, que sur la pratique jusqu' ici suivie quant à l'adjonction des Officiers de la Reine dans des actions pour réparation d'injures.

4953. Mr. Lefebvre (Greffier). In compliance with the wish of the Commissioners, I have to hand in two cases in which several offences were included in the same act of accusation.

The same were delivered in and are as follows.

Samedi, le douze Novembre, mil huit-cent vingt-cinq, devant Monsieur Le Bailiff, présens, Jean La Serre, Josias Le Marchant, Jean De Lisle, Jean Guille, James Carey, Jean Le Messurier, Jean Hubert, Pierre Le Cocq, et William Collings, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Francois D'Auvergne, fils de Jean, natif de Jersey, prisonnier dans la prison publique, amerci envers les officiers du Roi, et est, après preuve d'être, le dit François d'Auvergne, félonieusement revenu en cette Ile avant l'expiration des six ans pour lequel terme il fut banni hors de ce Baillage par acte de la Cour Royale, en date du 23me Octobre, 1824, et avoir félonieusement, la nuit du 5me au 6me Août, 1825, ou environ, soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, forcé et rompu une fenêtre d'une maison occupée par le Sieur Robert Vallack, proche le lieu où se tient la Foire, en la paroisse du Catel, et s'y être introduit et avoir pris, volé et emporté une montre d'argent appartenant au dit Vallack hors d'une chambre dans la dite maison, et avoir, le 6me du dit mois d'Août, ou environ, pris, volé et emporté hors d'une maison appartenant au Sieur Nicholas Tardif à la rue Maze,

At the Court House in Alderney.

Friday, October 2nd, 1846.

John Gaudion, Esq., Judge of the Court at Alderney.
October 2nd, 1846.

John Gaudion, Esq., Judge of the Court at Alderney, examined.

4955. You are the Judge of this Island?—I am.

4956. Will you favour the Commissioners with the names of the officers of the Court?—Mr. Thomas Nicolas Barbenson is the Procureur de la Reine.

4957. Is there any Contrôle here?—The office is vacant, at present.

4958. What are the names of the Gentlemen of the Bench?—Mr. Nicolas Barbenson, Mr. William Joseph Sanford, Mr. John Gauvain, Mr. John Robilliard, Mr. John Mesny, Mr. Lucas Le Cocq.

4959. Is that the full number of Jurats?—Yes.

4960. Have you mentioned them in their order of seniority?—Yes.

4961. What is the name of the gentleman who holds the office of Greffier?—Mr. Frederick Williams. The name of the Serjeant of the Court is John Simon Tourtel ; and of the Prevôt, Thomas Simon.

The Minutes of Evidence taken at Guernsey, on Thursday, October the first, in reference to the Island of Alderney were read over (a).

4962. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). Three or four years ago there was a yearly Prevôt, as Mr. De Jersey mentions : but, upon a representation made to the States that the Prevôt, being named yearly, did not perform his duty so efficiently as a permanent Prevôt would do, the States took it upon themselves to name a perpetual Prevôt, granting him a salary of, I believe, twenty livres a year currency of the island.

4963. (To Mr. Barbenson.) Was that done by the States or by the Court?—It was by the States at a meeting of the Chefs Plaids. We have two Chefs Plaids each year.

4964. At what times of the year?—The first Monday after Michaelmas, and the first Monday after the 15th of January. By an order of the Royal Court of Guernsey they are fixed to two. Before that, I do not know whether there were more than two.

4965. When was that regulation made?—It was by an order of 1711.

4966. When an order, such as you have mentioned in reference to the Prevôt, is made by the Chefs Plaids, does that go any further, or become law at once?—It becomes law at once.

4967. Do you transmit the Ordonnance any where?—No.

---

(a) See page 183.

GUERNSEY.

John Gaudion, Esq., Judge of the Court at Alderney.

October 2nd, 1846.

4968. It is final here, is it?—Yes. At the same time, any inhabitants who wish to complain to the Guernsey Court have full power to do so, or any member of the States who may find fault with any of the proceedings.

4969. Do you recognize their power to annul it, in case they disapprove of it?—Yes; the same as Her Majesty in Council has the power to annul any proceedings of the Royal Court.

4970. Who compose the Chefs Plaids?—The Court, which consists of the Judge, six Jurats, and the Queen's officers, and the Douzaine, and also the Governor. At least it is made known to the Governor, that the Chefs Plaids are to be held, on such a day; but no postponement can be made of the Chefs Plaids.

4971. The Governor attends if he pleases?—Yes.

4972. Does he send any one to attend when he does not himself come?—Yes; he does occasionally; a Lieutenant Governor is sworn in for the day. It has been decided by the Royal Court, in 1801, in the case of General East, that the day of meeting of the Chefs Plaids cannot be postponed. He dismissed the assembly; and the States here made a complaint to the Royal Court.

4973. The Chefs Plaids is not a judicial body is it?—No; legislative.

4974. Purely legislative?—Yes.

4975. Have the Queen's officers a vote in it?—They have not; they give their conclusions.

4976. The Procureur attends, does he?—Yes. No meeting of the Court or States can be held without the Procureur, or one of the Queen's officers.

4977. What do you call this Court?—La Cour.

4978. Mr. Gaudion. We have been entitled Royal Court, in some cases; but there is no authority for it, I believe.

4979. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). The Prevôté serve twelve years. The senior of them is sworn in as deputy Prevôt in rotation, and acts as such for one year.

4980. By senior do you mean senior in point of years?—Yes; the first that was chosen in the Prevôté.

4981*a*. Do you renew them one by one?—Yes.

4981*b*. In case, therefore, there is no death, any gentleman who is chosen into the Prevôté waits eleven years before he serves?—Yes.

4982. The Prevôté consists of twelve people, does it?—Yes.

4983. How are the constables chosen?—The constables are chosen by the Court. They serve as deputy constables for one year, and then as constables for a year.

4984. There is an election of two each year?—Yes.

4985. Mr. Gaudion. The deputy constables serve one year, as such, and become constables at the expiration of the year.

4986. Do you assent to the statement made at Guernsey that the Royal Court have the power of making Ordonnances for Alderney?

4987. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). I should say that the Court has the power of making Ordonnances. It was decided by the Royal Court of Guernsey that the Court of Alderney could make Ordonnances; but those Ordonnances must be sanctioned by the next meeting of the States or Chefs Plaids.

4988. The following Acte of Court was read.

" A la Cour de l'Ile d'Auregny, le trente Juin, 1821, devant Monsieur Pierre Gauvain, Juge, présens Messieurs Thomas Le Cocq, Jean Le Ber, Nicholas Barbenson, Thomas N. Robilliard et William J. Sanford, Jurés.

Messieurs Nicolas Barbenson, Thos. N. Robilliard, et William Jos. Sanford, Jurés, Membres composant le Comité appointé le 26 Mai, 1821, pour soutenir les droits de cette Cour devant la Cour Royale de l'Ile de Guernesey, sur la plainte des officiers du Roi de cette Ile contre cette Cour, sous date du 26e Janvier, 1820, ayant produit un Acte de la dite Cour Royale, sous date du 14e Juin, 1821, la Cour, après avoir entendu lecture du dit Acte, et sur ce, ouie la conclusion du Procureur du Roi, a ordonné que le dit Acte soit enregîtré sur les records de cette Ile, duquel Acte la teneur suit, viz.

Guernesey. Le quatorzième Juin, mil huit-cent vingt-un, devant Daniel De Lisle Brock, Ecuier, Baillif de cette Ile de Guernesey, présens Pierre De Jersey, Eléazar Le Marchant, Carteret Priaulx, Jean La Serre, Josias Le Marchant, Jean De Lisle, Jean Guille, Hélier Carré et Jean Hubert, Ecuiers, Jurés de la Cour Royale en la dite Ile.

Avant que faire droit sur la réquête de Messieurs les officiers du Roi de l'Ile d'Auregny, sous date du 26e Janvier, 1820, et les réponses des Etâts et de la Cour d'Auregny en date du 28e Avril, 1820, la Cour Royale, ayant été d'opinion que la Douzaine de l'Ile d'Auregny serait entendue, a ordonné que la dite requête et les dites réponses lui seront transmises, et qu', en attendant une décision définitive, la Cour d'Auregny sera antorisée à faire des Ordonnances provisoires, qui seront en force jusqu'aux prochains Etats, on Chefs Plaids, et pour qu'elles soient alors reproduites, révisées, et, s'il y a lieu, confirmées, par les dits Etats ou Chefs Plaids.

Extrait des Regîtres de la dite Ile de Guernesey,

WILLIAM SOLBÉ SHEPPARD,

Député Greffier du Roi."

4989. What are the limits of the subjects to which such Ordonnances extend?—It depends upon what the Ordonnances are for.

4990. To what subjects do you apply this power?—Making local Ordonnances.

4991. Mr. Gaudion. They may be put under the head of police regulations.

4992. Laws to regulate the highways?—Yes; and the Blayes. If there is a crying evil, and the remedy is perceived, it is done in that kind of way; but it does not often occur.

4993. What are the Blayes?—A certain extent of land belonging to the manor, parcelled out.

4994. Do you impose penalties for the breach of such Ordonnances?—Yes; by fine.

4995. To what amount?—It depends upon the gravity of the offence.

GUERNSEY.

John Gaudion, Esq., Judge of the Court at Alderney.

October 2nd, 1846.

4996. What is the outside?—It generally does not exceed twenty francs, I should say.

4997. Can you make an Ordonnance against drunkenness in the streets?—Yes. The step is never taken, except in the case of some crying evil.

4998. Suppose a man went about breaking windows, could you make an Ordonnance that if any thing of that sort were done it should be punished?

4999. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). No: there would be no occasion for that; he would be brought forward and sent to Guernsey very likely.

5000. In case the person does not pay the fine, what is the result?—We should arrest his property, if he has any.

5001. This Court would do so?—Yes. In Guernsey, often, the fines are so many livres tournois, and so many days imprisonment; which we cannot do here, because we have no right to imprison. I think that often causes a failure of justice. When a man has no property what can you do with him? He is above the law.

5002. You think the inability to inflict that alternative renders you to a certain extent helpless?—It does. I should say, for example, in the Militia Law, in Guernsey, if a man is fined three livres or six livres, if he does not pay, he has so many days' imprisonment. Here we cannot do that. If a boy whose parents are poor is absent from his duty, he is brought before the Court and is convicted to pay; but he never pays.

5003. Mr. Gaudion. I cannot agree in that quite. If a person is amenable to a fine, and sentenced to a fine, in consequence of having infringed an Ordonnance of the Court, he is sued and may be put in prison as a debtor.

5004. Mr. Barbenson. (Procureur). You cannot put him in prison for a debt, unless it is five pounds.

5005. Mr. Gaudion. That is in a case of civil debt. This is in case of a crime; the law will authorize you to put him in prison unless he pays. A person cannot renounce upon a fine.

5006. (To Mr. Barbenson, Procureur.) You say, in the case of a debt, you cannot imprison unless it were five pounds. No; five pounds currency. That has been decided by Her Majesty in Council.

5007. (To Mr. Gaudion.) You are of opinion that, the moment it becomes a crime, you have the power to imprison in default of payment?—Yes; those who commit breaches against the law. A fine is looked upon as greater than a civil debt; and you cannot renounce, or become bankrupt upon it.

5008. You mean that a bankruptcy does not get rid of it?—Yes.

5009. Have you known any instance of a person being imprisoned for not paying a fine?—I do not know any instance.

5010. Could those fines be recovered before the Cour Royale at Guernsey?—There is no appeal upon an Ordonnance.

5011. Could you not proceed against a person, and summon him to Guernsey for a breach of one of your Ordonnances?—No.

5012. The Guernsey Court, therefore, has no original jurisdiction here, but only in the case of appeal?—That is all.

5013. It was suggested to the Commissioners, at Guernsey, that it would be convenient to give to this Court the power of fining offenders to the extent of fourteen livres tournois, or of imprisoning them for a term not exceeding eight days. What is your opinion in reference to such a suggestion?—I should quite agree with it.

5014. Is that the general feeling of the gentlemen of the Bench?—I should say it is.

5015. Mr. Barbenson (Jurat). It is very necessary in my opinion.

5016. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). I think, in some instances, the Court has fined to a higher amount than fourteen livres.

5017. In the case of a distinct Ordonnance?—No; without an Ordonnance. I do not recollect any case.

5018. Mr. Gaudion. In this Court, we have no authority to punish for offences; but, on trivial cases which it is necessary to correct occurring in this place, they are brought before the Court. The case is examined into, and the witnesses heard; and, if it is found of a trifling nature that would not bear the expense of sending witnesses to Guernsey, the option is given to the party accused. "You have heard the evidence against you; will you submit to a decision of this Court?" They find they have been in the wrong, and they submit; and the Court deals with them according to the circumstances.

5019. In those cases, you think a distinct power given to this Court, not optional in that way, would be an improvement?—Yes; it might correct abuses.

5020. Is the Contrôle a member of the States?—Yes; the States and the Court of Chefs Plaids are the same thing; the same members compose the two.

5021. Have the Crown officers votes?—No; they give their opinion. The opinion of the Crown officers is first heard, upon any Ordonnance which is proposed. They give their conclusions.

5022. Are the States and the Chefs Plaids different assemblies?

5023. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur.) The Chefs Plaids are held twice a-year; and that is not only for passing Ordonnances in Chefs Plaids, but raising taxes for the poor and fixing the wheat rents.

5024. What do you mean by fixing rents?—The value of the wheat rents. There are rents due in the Island, the rate of which is fixed by the Court.

5025. Mr. Gaudion. In default of the party paying in kind after a certain time, he must pay in money.

5026. It is how much money is to be equivalent to a specified number of quarters?

GUERNSEY.

John Gaudion, Esq., Judge of the Court at Alderney.

October 2nd, 1846

5027. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). Yes. They also vote money for any repairs to be made to the public buildings.

5028. How is all this money raised? By rates?—The poor-rates are. There is also an impôt of one shilling a gallon upon spirituous liquors. That is sanctioned of course by an Order in Council.

5029. Does that go through the Royal Court of Guernsey?—No.

5030. The Chefs Plaids and the States are not the same assembly, are they?—They are composed of the same members. There are things passed in Chefs Plaids, which the States are not authorized to do; though I believe the States have oftentimes levied taxes.

5031. Mr. Gaudion. The States and Chefs Plaids are composed of the same members: the only difference is that the Chefs Plaids must be held twice a year on fixed days, and the States meet whenever there is occasion.

5032. Who assembles the States?—Application is made to the Governor. As he resides in Guernsey, I fix the day. If he resided here, I should consult his opinion.

5033. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). The meeting of the States is for special purposes. At the Chefs Plaids any member has a right to bring forward any question he chooses; and, when the business of the day is gone through, or after the Judge has asked any member of the States if they have any proposition to make, then any person present has the right to address the meeting.

5034. There is a Billet d'Ordonnance for the Chefs Plaids is there?

5035. Mr. Gaudion. The States and Chefs Plaids, I have said, are composed of the same members. The Chefs Plaids are held on specific days by law. Any member of the States or Chefs Plaids may propose any alteration of an Ordonnance, or anything he may suggest; and then the public are called on by me, if they have any complaint or any remarks to make; whereas, at the States' meeting, it is for a specific object which must be mentioned previously.

5036. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). The Court and the States are summoned by the serjeant to attend on such a day.

5037. Is that the whole nature of the difference between the two; the time of holding, and the nature of the notice necessary to bring business forward?—Yes.

5038. What is the difference between the Douzaine here and at Guernsey?—The Douzaine here are elected by the rate payers similar to the Jurats.

5039. For life?—Yes; or till, through infirmity, they ask to be discharged. It is they who rate the taxes, fixing the proportion which each is to pay: they do so in conjunction with the Crown Officer. The Crown officer, when he is with the Douzaine, is the President of that body. I wish to point out the difference between the Guernsey Douzeniers and ours. They have no legislative power; whereas here the Douzaine forms part of the States in their legislative capacity. The Douzaine have no vote; they are only consulted. First the Crown officers' opinions are asked; after the Crown officers' opinions are asked, I appeal to the President of the Douzaine to ask the opinion of his Douzaine upon the case submitted to them.

5040. The President of the Douzaine would be the Crown officer, would not he?—Not in the States; that is in their separate capacity, as a Douzaine. The opinion of the Douzaine is asked through the President, who is the senior member; and the opinion of the Douzaine is then made known to me; and I take the opinion of the Court: and whatever the decision of the Court is becomes law.

5041. The votes of the Court decide it?—Yes. The Douzaine's opinion carries great weight with the Court on local affairs.

5042. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). I was going to say that the members of the States are twenty one in number; though four Jurats are sufficient to concur in any vote.

5043. How many does the Douzaine consist of?—Twelve; and there are two Crown officers, so that four Jurats may decide anything they please.

5044. (To Mr. Gaudion). The Constables have no voice in the States, have they?—No; the Constables with us are merely what may be termed police officers; they have no power.

5045. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). In Guernsey, I believe the Douzaine have so many votes in the States.

5046. When you speak of the public being asked if they have anything to complain of, do you mean the Douzaine?—No; the public who are in the Court. It is an open Court.

5047. They in fact stand in the same position as the Douzaine, except that the Douzaine are expressly asked and the public merely generally?—The public are not asked upon the question which is mooted before the Chefs Plaids at all: it is only, if the inhabitants have anything to represent for the good of the Island, the States would take it into consideration.

5048. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). In the actes of our Chefs Plaids it is said that the Douzaine are there representing the public.

5049. The Douzaine form part of the Chefs Plaids do they?

5050. Mr. Gaudion. Yes. Seven are a quorum. There must be a Judge and two Jurats, and seven Douzeniers, at least, to form a quorum with one of the Crown officers.

5051. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). In the case of a mere quorum, of course, the Judge and one Jurat might decide anything. That, I think, is a great fault in our constitution. I do not mean to say, supposing the whole of the Douzaine and the Queen's officers were of one opinion, the whole Court would go against them; but, I think, the Queen's officers and the Douzaine ought to have some vote in the States.

5052. If the Douzaine had a voice, of course, the Douzeniers would outnumber the Jurats?—The Douzeniers would not ask a thing of that kind.

5053. You would propose that there should be some one to vote on the part of the Douzaine?—It is not that I wish to take any power from the Court; but, having something to do with the Douzaine, and being a member of the States, it appears right that we should have some vote. In Guernsey, the Queen's Procureur has a vote, and the Contrôle has a right to speak, as Crown officer.

5054. (To Mr. Gaudion.) In the States or Chefs Plaids, do you always vote, or do you wait till there is a balance?—Unless there is a balance, I have no vote.

5055. Do you agree in the opinion which has been expressed, that Ordonnances passed in Guernsey are binding in Alderney?—It has only been Ordonnances respecting Fast days, or anything for a general purpose: otherwise the Guernsey Court has no power to legislate for us.

5056. Mr. Barbenson (Jurat). I have seen many Ordonnances come from the Royal Court; and we have been obliged to register them.

5057. Mr. Gaudion. I hope they will not attempt it, while I sit here.

5058. (To Mr. Gaudion.) What Ordonnances should you consider to come within your expression of Ordonnances for a general purpose?—There was a law made in 1812, or 1813, a local law in Guernsey to suppress smuggling from this Island to the mother country. In that Ordonnance, Alderney was mentioned: and it was a very proper law; but I maintain that the Guernsey Court has no power whatever to legislate for this Island.

5059. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). If you examine the register you will find fifty or a hundred instances of it.

5060. Suppose the Guernsey Court were to make an Ordonnance regulating your streets?—They would never do that.

5061. Mr. Le Cocq. I think the Guernsey Court has no power to make our local laws; we may be considered to be the most competent judges of what is proper for us.

5062. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). I believe the Royal Court of Guernsey has taken upon themselves to do many things which they have no right to do. I believe, the Bailiff of Guernsey, Mr. Brock, sent an Ordonnance some time ago, requiring it to be registered: and the Court resisted it; but the Judge was requested to write to Mr. Brock upon the subject.

5063. Mr. Gaudion. We framed a regulation of our own on the subject.

5064. Is it understood that the Jurats may retire from their offices?—There have been instances of a Jurat resigning through infirmity, and age. It passes through the States; and the application is sent to the Royal Court of Guernsey who decide upon it.

5065. What salaries are received by the officers of the Court here?—There is only the Procureur, who has a salary. He receives a salary of forty pounds a year from the Crown revenues of the Island. For the want of a salary for the Contrôle, I am sorry to say, we have no likelihood of having that officer here. No man in our small population will dedicate a few years of his life to learn the law and make himself efficient to perform that office.

5066. Have you any advocates?—We have none now. The Procureur was an advocate; he succeeded me.

5067. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). It would be highly necessary that there should be a Contrôle. The public suffer from the want of one.

5068. What is the inconvenience which is produced?—Mr. Gaudion. In the case of parties having civil cases, there is only the Procureur on one side, and the defendant is debarred from having a defender. The Greffier has no salary; whereas in the other Islands that officer has a salary.

5069. Has the Greffier any fees from criminal causes?—When he extracts documents to be sent to Guernsey, he has his fees, which are paid by the States from their own revenue.

5070. Has the population increased since the last census?—No; the boys and girls as they rise up leave the Island. I do not think that the population has increased.

5071. Have you any cause en adjonction?—Yes.

5072. Is it tried here, or do you go to Guernsey?—The cause is entered in this Court, and is then sent by this Court to Guernsey; it must be proceeded with within a year and a day after. Supposing now we had advocates here, such a cause must be patronized by a Crown officer.

5073. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). Some years ago, in the year 1815, I think, the Court or the States applied to the Royal Court for a change in the law respecting a cause en adjonction, that the Court of Alderney might have some power to judge in those cases; and there is a petition to that effect upon the records. It did not come within the competency of the Guernsey Court to make any change; but still they might have recommended it to Her Majesty in Council. I would beg to say that I have known two cases here, lately, which were commenced before this Court, and the parties, for want of money, have been obliged to drop them. It is attended with great expense going to Guernsey; and they could not afford to go: therefore they have been debarred from having justice done them.

5074. Mr. Gaudion. It would be desirable that this Court should possess such power in adjudicating a cause en adjonction, because there are some little cases occurring in our small Island of defamation of character and so on, which, on account of the expenses, cannot be proceeded with.

5075. They could bring a civil action in this Court for the injury done them in such a case, could not they?—Not for defamation: there is no civil action for it.

5076. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). It might be said that a person should have a right to appeal to a superior authority, that is the Royal Court; but, in criminal cases, there is no appeal; and, if any change were to take place in that part of our law, I do not know whether appeals ought to be sent to the Royal Court of Guernsey.

5077. If any gentleman who was defamed might bring a civil action for damages for defamation, you would get rid of that difficulty?

5078. Yes; in which case there might be an appeal to the Royal Court, as in the case of any other civil action.

GUERNSEY.

John Gaudion, Esq., Judge of the Court at Alderney.

October 2nd, 1846.

5079. Or, if it were an action which was injurious to the public, such as a provocation to a breach of the peace, it might be brought as a purely criminal case?—Yes.

5080. Mr. Gaudion. In the cases, which the Procureur alludes to, I think the evil would counterbalance the good, for this reason: before you can fine a person, in a civil case, you must have evidence; and, according to our system of law, no evidence can be carried from this Court to that of Guernsey, unless the evidence is taken in writing. Consequently, if you adjudicate in this Court between parties for defamation of character, and decide that case upon vivâ voce evidence and the party appeals to Guernsey, that evidence must go to that Court.

5081. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). But the party may not wish to appeal.

5082. Mr. Gaudion. Anything of that kind, I humbly suggest, should be by Writ of Error. On a point of law, it might be done; but, if you give a right of appeal upon a question of that kind, you allow too large a latitude.

5083. That goes into the question of whether you should have any appeal at all upon matters of fact from any Court which decides the fact?

5084. Mr. Barbenson (Procureur). I should say, at all events, let the amount be limited. I think there would be great difficulty in letting the Court of Alderney decide any question of that kind. We know what the Court is now: but we do not know what we may have been some centuries back, or what we may come to in future.

5085. The following list of the Judges of Alderney was put in by the Greffier.

Monday, 5th October, 1846.

(Notes taken by Mr. Ellis in the absence of the short-hand writer.*)

GUERNSEY.

Notes taken in Sark by Mr. Ellis.

Ernest Le Pelley, Esq., Lord of Sark.

October 5th, 1846.

5086. Mr. Ernest Le Pelley (Lord of Sark). (Evidence of Thursday, October the first, read to him from my notes.) Shows me a copy of Order of Council of Charles II., May 19th, 1675, produced before the Commissioners on that day.†

5087. The imprisonment inflicted by the Seneschal may be three times twenty four hours, and not twenty four hours, as stated in the evidence of Mr. MacCulloch; but the fine of three livres tournois is right.

5088. The Prevôt is appointed by the Lord, sworn in by the Sénéchal. He also acts as Her Majesty's Procureur, as the person to bring forward cases. He gives conclusions as l'officier de la Reine. He has also the custody of persons in the lock-up house near the church. The constable is appointed by the Chefs Plaids, with a veto by the Lord, and sworn in by Sénéchal. He never has permanent custody of prisoners. He takes persons into custody and brings them before the Sénéchal. After the prisoner has been convicted, or if he is to be sent to Guernsey, the Prevôt takes him. The constable, if late in the evening, puts him in the lock-up house; but he must have an order from the Sénéchal. I cannot say whether I could refuse to accept the resignation of their offices from the Sénéchal, Prevôt, or Constable. I cannot turn them out; but I could complain to the Cour Royale of Guernsey. They might admonish; I think they could discharge. I say this of the Sénéchal, Prevôt, and Constable. A Constable is vingtenier the first year, and constable the next. They are both peace officers. A vingtenier is first appointed by the Chefs Plaids: the other is a thing of course; but there is a formal appointment. Constables are generally taken from tenants and sons of tenants. The tenants are jealous of having any one else. There is no salary at all; some fees. The vingteniers and the constables have no fees at all, criminal or civil.

5089. The tenants are the holders of the forty indivisible tenements of Sark. They form the Chefs Plaids with the Lord, Sénéchal, Prevôt, and Greffier. They pass Ordinances, for instance, for roads; lay rates in Chefs Plaids which support the poor and are appropriated to the purposes of Island. The constable serves only two years, one as vingtenier the other as constable. No one has a voice in Chefs Plaids if not a tenant. The officers may, if tenants. The Lord has a veto. He is tenant also. He never does vote. The Sénéchal is President.

5090 An Order in Council of Greenwich, 1583, is recited, in the Act of Thomas Leighton appointing the five Jurats and assigning their duties, which, in matters of crime, extend to "toutes matières et actions de forfait excés et injures par emprisonnement, ou amendes n'excédent la somme de soixante sols et un denier tournois, pourvu qu'il n'y ait matière de crime, auquel cas, les dits Jurez seront tenus envoyer par le Prevôt de la dite Isle leur corps avec la cause à la Justice de la dite Isle de Guernsey pour y procéder comme sera expédient, et de ce qui sera fait et passé devant eux en garderont et donneront fidelle records."

5091. A Greffier is appointed by the same instrument.

"Le Clerq de la Cour fera registre, et gardera fidelle et loyall records de toutes causes qui seront passées par devant Justice, et pour ses debvoirs prendra le tiers des mêmes amendes, à sçavoir de cinq sols et au desoubs, et des defaultes, toutesfois et quantes qui seront levées et recueillies." Also some fees for his signature and copies.

5091. The duty of the Prevôt is also laid down, both as Procureur and for arresting, summoning and levying, with fees.

5092. I have been here seven years. Only one prisoner was sent to Guernsey in that time. That was a Jersey man. He came over in a steam-boat, made a noise, and struck the constable. There has not been a criminal case before our own Court for two years. Two civil cases, one for injure (they call it adjonction), the other a debt. The effect of the Order of Charles is to get rid of the Jurats; but it leaves the jurisdiction as before.

5092. No person, not born in Sark, can reside above six weeks without the leave of the Lord. That is by an Order in Council of James the first, 9 James First, 1611, 12th August, which prescribes not to "make any long abode," unless they take the oath of allegiance, and unless license procured of Lord in six weeks.

5093. At the census of 1841, I think the population was 800. It is fewer now; there were more strangers then and miners. I think about 700 now. In summer our intercourse with Guernsey is daily, in winter less; once a week certainly.

5094. We do not recognize the power of the Guernsey Court to make laws for us: but, if the minority were dissatisfied with an order of our Chefs Plaids, they might complain to the Cour Royale of Guernsey, who would hear the complaint. I retract that. I do not think minority could go against majority. I do not admit the Cour Royale could annul; but, I think, the Lord might complain of Chefs Plaids for refusing to pass Ordinances, and the Chefs Plaids of Lord for exercising his veto. I think, on such a complaint, the Cour Royale could compel the Chefs Plaids to pass the Ordinance; but I do not know what means of compulsion would be employed; and I think that, on complaint of the Chefs Plaids, the Cour Royale might order the Lord to withdraw his veto. I do not know whether that would be compulsory. I suppose it would go to the Privy Council. Mr. MacCulloch says my veto is absolute. Also, if the Chefs Plaids passed an Ordinance contrary to a known superior law, then the complaint would be to the Cour Royale, and they might declare it null. The veto has been exercised but once in the last fifty years.

5095. We pass Ordinances for shutting public houses. The Lord licences them to sell liquors, to be renewed annually at St. Michaels.

Aux Chefs Plaids, tenus le 3e Oct. 1827, en présence de Pierre Le Pelley, Ecr., Seigneur de cette Ile de Serk, et dépendance, et par Monsr. Jean Falle, Sénéchal, Messrs. Le Prevôt, le Greffier, les Connétables, et les habitans présens.

Vu que plusieurs pères de familles négligent leurs femmes et enfants, et s'adonnent à l'ivrognerie, et que les cabaretiers leur donnent à boire mal à propos, en leur faisant de longs crédits, et continuant à leur donner de la liqueur, lors qu'ils sont déjà ivres, ce qui tend à démoraliser l'Ile et à réduire des familles en besoin; et vu la difficulté de faire des réglements à ce sujet: les Chefs Plaids présens prient Mr. le Seignr. de cette Ile, en qui réside le pouvoir de donner et d'ôter les licences, afin de mettre les cabaretiers en leurs gardes, de ne point donner des licences à l'avenir pour plus d'une année, et de ne point les renouveller, s'il y a des plaintes bien fondées contre eux, et en les continuant toujours, s'ils obtemperent aux vues des habitants présentement expliquées, le laissant à lui à en juger: et à ce a été présent Pierre Le Pelley, Ecr., Séignr. de cette Isle, lequel a consenti au vœu des habitants, et a promis d'y veiller.

Aux Chefs Plaids, tenus le 20 Octr. 1779, par devant Madme. Le Pelley, Veuve de Monsr. Pierre Le Pelley, et tutrice de ses enfants, en son vivant Seigneur de cette Isle de Serk et dépendance, Monsr Henry Le Mazurier, Sénéchal, le Greffier, le Prévost, les Connétables et les habitants.

Le dit jour, les Ordonnances, cy au dessus mentionnées, toutes renouvellées.

L'Ordonnance concernant les ouefs et oisseaux est renouvellée.

Celle concernant la chasse de l'Isle. Aussi celle pour les liqueurs étrangères. Et ceux qui vendront sans licence ou congé du Seigneur ou de ses successeurs seront mis à £50 d'amende, un quar. au Roi, l'autre quar. au Seigneur, l'autre moitié aux pauvres de cette Isle de Serk.

5096. There are forty five or forty six indivisible tenements. Only forty give a tenancy. In consequence of the division of estates, application was made to James the First, which precluded further division. Some five or six had been separated from the forty; and some belonged to the Lord and had been sold by him. I have the permission of the Crown to sell my Seigneurie, not subjecting the person to the approbation of the Crown; but it must not be to an alien. I cannot sell the land to an alien.

5098. The rates are on realty and personalty both. We farm the impôt on spirits to the Guernsey Harbour Master. The amount of duty per gallon is laid by Guernsey. They give us so much a year; we pay the full impôt price. It ought all to go through the Guernsey Custom House; landing it here at once would be smuggling, or even landing from Guernsey. We are bound to take our spirits from Guernsey.

5099. Thomas Godfray. I am the Prevôt of the Island. I think I have been Prevôt for twelve to fifteen years. I acted as Greffier and deputy Prevôt. Since the prison has been built, I have been at the expense of the prisoners. I have been at the expense while the parties were in prison. I should like to know who is to pay. I cannot say how much it costs; it depends upon the number. I give them to eat and drink. I do not know whether I have had any these two years or not. If I took five shillings a year I might gain or lose. I have only a proportion of les menues amendes. If the Sénéchal fines any one, and assigns part to the Queen, I take all to myself. I offered Her Majesty's Receiver, in Guernsey, to give him all the fines for the Queen if he would pay me a salary. He refused. The Greffier and I divide the Chefs Plaids fines. I have done as my predecessors have done. We want a gaoler. I do not know how to pay him. I have hired a man to assist me. I have never paid anything to him. When prisoners are ordered to Guernsey by the Sénéchal, the Court of Guernsey has ordered me to have twelve shillings for the freight of the boat. If I do not freight a boat, but go as a passenger, I get only sixpence there and sixpence back, which is the fare. I get nothing and lose nothing. I have nothing for my attendance on the Court.

Shews Actes of Court before the Seneschal.

5100. There are several causes en adjonction. We try them out; but the parties may always appeal to the Cour Royale of Guernsey at any time. All the civil actions are here. There is a criminal case, the 14th of August, 1841, an accusation of theft by a domestic servant. She confesses.

Le 14e Août, 1841. Devant Monsr. Philippe Guille Sénéchal; Sarah Green, fille mineure, native d'Angleterre, ayant été, ce jour, produite devant la Cour par le ministère de Sieur Thomas Vaudin et Jean Hamon, connétables, étant accusée d'avoir volé et emporté plusieurs effets de la maison des Demoiselles Vigoureux, où elle était Domestique: La Cour, après avoir entendu l'aveu de l'accusée, la déposition par serment des dites demoiselles Vigoureux, de Sieur George Le Masurier, et de Veuve Susanne Le Feuvre, a trouvé l'accusée coupable d'un crime au de-là de sa compétence d'en juger. Mais, vu son âge, sa contrition, et soumission aux Demoiselles Vigoureux, auxquelles elle a publiquement demandé pardon, pour éviter une plus longue exposition publique, ruineuse à son caractère, et dans l'espoir que la sentence limitée de cette Cour suffira pour la mettre sur ses gardes et la rappeller dans les bornes de ses devoirs, l'a condamnée à trois fois vingt quatre heures de prison au pain et à l'eau.

The Court finds the case to be above its competence, but, in consideration of the age and contrition of the offender, condemns her to three days' imprisonment on bread and water. I dare say she might have appealed to a superior Court. I do not recollect any case giving so long an imprisonment either before or after.

5102. Another; 11th September, 1841; charge of Incest; parties absent; prise de corps.

Le 11e Septembre, 1841. Devant Monsr. Philippe Guille, Sénéchal, sur l'information donnée à la Cour, que George de Carteret, fils d'Abraham, natif de cette Ile de Serk, se serait rendu coupable du crime d'inceste avec Emilie de Cartaret, sa fille mineure, lesquels sont présentement absens de cette Ile: La Cour, après avoir entendu des témoins dignes de foi, et ouïe la conclusion des Officiers de la Reine, a décerné prise de corps contre le dit George de Carteret; et est ordonné au Prevôt de la Reine ou député, aux connétables, et à tous officiers publics et autres de cette Ile, de faire toutes les diligences possibles, pour se saisir de la personne du dit de Carteret à son retour, et l'amener en justice; et, pour prévenir qu'il ne s'évade hors cette Ile, est expressement défendu à tous maîtres de navires, barques ou bateaux et autres, de le transporter ou faire transporter hors cette Ile; et défendu à toute personne quelconque de le loger, cacher ou recéler, sur peine aux contrevenants d'être châtiés suivant l'exigence du cas. Et sera ce présent acte publié et affiché au lieu ordinaire, afin que personne n'en prétende cause d'ignorance.

Afterwards, being seized, he was brought before the Sénéchal, ordered to be sent to Guernsey, and constituted a prisoner meanwhile.

Le 19e Octobre, 1842. Devant Monsr. Philippe Guille, Sénéchal, George de Carteret, fils d'Abraham, natif de cette Ile de Serk, à été produit devant la Cour par le ministère des connétables, ayant été saisi en vertu du décret de prise de corps, décerné par cette Cour, en date du 11e Septembre, 1841, contre le dit De Carteret à cause d'accusation de crime d'inceste avec Emilie De Carteret, sa fille mineure: Vu le long temps qui s'est écoulé depuis l'émanation du dit décret, et après avoir oui la niance de l'accusé, Monsr. Le Sénéchal a renvoyé la cause devant la Cour Royale de l'Ile de Guernsey; et est ordonné que le dit De Carteret soit placé sous la garde et custodie du Prevôt de la Reine en cette Ile, pour être produit devant la dite Cour Royale à la première occasion; et sera le dit accusé constitué prisonnier dans la prison publique jusqu'à son départ de cette Ile.

Le 29e Octobre, 1842. Monsr. Le Sénéchal a reçu un Acte de la Cour Royale de l'Ile de Guernsey pour être enregistré sur les Records de cette Ile, dont la teneur suit.

A la Cour Royale de l'Ile de Guernsey, Le 22e Octre., 1842. Devant Jean Guille, Ecr. Juge, delégué, présents Jean Le Messurier, Ecr., Messire William Collings, H. O. Carré, Fréderic Mansell, Thomas W. Gosselin, Thomas Le Retilley, et Harry Dobrée, Ecrs., Jurés.

George De Carteret, fils d'Abraham, de l'Ile de Serk, ayant été, ce jour, produit devant la Cour par le Prevôt de la dite Ile, vertu d'acte de la Cour de la dite Ile de Serk, du 19e courant, accusé comme est porté au dit acte, à quoi recours: La Cour, après avoir entendu un grand nombre de témoins dignes de oi, et ouies les conclusions des Officiers de la Reine, a déchargé le dit De Carteret honorablement de tout soupçon de la dite accusation: et, vu que des procédures juridiques ont eu lieu à Serk, la Cour a ordonné que le présent acte sera transmis au Sénéchal de Serk, pour être enregistré sur les records de la dite Ile. Extrait des Registres de la dite Ile de Guernsey.

Signé. JEAN NAFTEL, Dep^te^. Greff^r^. de la Reine.

Thus he was tried and acquitted at Guernsey; and the Act of the Cour Royale was sent here to be registered, and was registered 29th October, 1842.

5103. There are also the Chefs Plaids, 20th January, 1679, where the Letters Patent of James the First are registered. August the 12th, 9th of James the First.

James, (the first), by the Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c., to our right trusty and right well beloved Sir George Carewe, Knight, Baron of Clopton, Governor of the Isles of Guernesey and Serk, and to the Governor of the said Isles for the time being, and to our welbeloved subject Amice de Carteret Esquier, Bailiff of the said Ile of Guernesey, and to the Bailiff of the said Isle of Guernsey for the time being, and to our welbeloved subject Philipe De Carteret Esquire, of St. Ouen, and Lord of the said Isle of Serk and to our loving subjects the inhabitants of the said Isle of Guernesey and Serk, and to all other our loving subjects to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Whereas the said Isle of Serk, being parcel of the possessions of the ancestors of the said Philipe de Carteret, Lord of the said Isle of Serk, was not partable amongst the sonnes of the said ancestors, but descended only to the eldest sonne; and whereas the Lords of the said Isle of Serk have, of late, granted away some parcells of the said Isle to others to hold of them the said Lord, which never the less cannot change the ancient forme of descende of the same; and whereas, because the possession of the ancient undertenants of the Isles adjacents have bin and doe yet continue partable amongst all the sonnes and daughters togather, though in severall portions, the inhabitants of the said Isle of Serk have an affection to that form of descent and would, as much as in them is, bring their said lands so lately purchased to the like descent, which is both against lawe and all soe to the great dommage and daunger of the said Isle of Serk, in respect that the said Philipes De Carteret, Lord of the said Isle of Serk, and his heirs, are by covenants, in their letters Patents contained, bound to people and inhabite the said Isle of Serk with number of men with provision of armore and other necessaries for the defense of the said Isle of Serk, which charge of men, to be from time to time so furnished, as aforesaid, for the defense of the said Isle of Serk, hath been used to be borne by the tenants and occupiers of the lands lying within the said Isle, according to such rates and proportions as by covenant and agreement betweene the Lord of the said Isle and the said tenants and occupiers have been agreed upon in that behalf, in respect whereof it is found very necessary that the lands lying in the said Isle of Serk, and now remaining in the tenure or occupation of the severall tenants and occupiers thereof, should, as much as may, be kept whole and entire and not to be divided or parted amongst brethren or others coheirs, but that the same, as much as may be, doe always remain and continue inpartable and undivided, without any other charge then such as by reason of their severall tenures they are bound to performe for the occasions aforesaid; and whereas allsoe it is a matter of great consequence and necessitie to restrain, by all good and wholesome ordonnances and provisions, the incombring and over charging of the said land with extraordinary and new charges, whereby the ancient servises, tenures, and duties, originaly and foundamently charged upon the said Isle of Serk, for the preservation, safety and deffence of the same, and for the common good of the Lord and tenants thereof, should be hindred, deminisched or abated; and for as much as neglect of good and timely provisions, in a case of so great importance, would prove very prejudiciall to our service, therefore that in pro of time by often partitions and extraordinary charges layed upon the said lands there would remaine only a number of poore men, unable to defend the same: Knowe ye that We, having had consideration of the premises and greatly desiring the safety quiett and wealth of the said Isle of Serk and of the said Lord and tenants thereof, and to the intend that all our good and loving subjects of the said Isle may, by commandement and direction from ourself, willingly bind themselves to the observations of that wich may be most for their own binefite and good, and enhable them the better to performe the services, tenures and duties where with they are all ready charged, as is aforesaid, of our especiall grace, certain knowledge, and meere motion, have willed, ordained and appointed, and by these presents, for us our heires and successors, doe signify and declare to all our loving subjects, as well of the said Isle of Serk, as allsoe of the Isles of Guernesey and Jersey, that no lands or tenements situal lying or beeing within the said Isle of Serk or any parts thereof shall or ought to be partable or parted amongst any sonnes or amongst the sonnes and daughters togather by force or by reason of any desend of inheritance of or from any ancessors or ancessor w^h^ hath or shall at any time hereafter dye seased of any state in fee simple or fee taile or other state of inheritance of any lands tenement or heriditance within the said Isle of Serk, but that all lands, tenements and hereditaments lying or being within the said Isle of Serk ought and shall, from time to time, descend and come wholy and directly to the eldest sonne and other heires of the sonne in such sort as the rest of the Signorie of the said Philipes De Carteret in the said Isle of Serk and alsoe in the Isle of Jersey doth or aught to doe: and we doe further, for us, our heires and successors, of our especiall grace certain knowledge, and meere motion, declare and signify our mind and pleasure to be that all and every tenant, owner, farmer or occupier of any lands, tenements or heriditaments in Serk aforesaid for the time being shall forbear and utterly cease to rise, sept, or impose, upon any his or their said lands, tenements or heriditaments, any other charge, payment or incombrans then such charges, payments, services and duties as they are bound to perform by their or any other of their tenures of their or any of their said lands to the Senior of the said Isle or otherwise for the defence or preservation of the same: and, for the more safety of the said Isle of Serk and for the better settling of loyal and obedient subjects therein, being a place of importance and subject to danger, of our especiall grace, certain knowledge, and meere motion, we do will and ordaine by this presents that noe strangers borne out of this Isle of Serk shall att any time be here after suffered to dwell, inhabite, remaine, continue or make any longer aboad within the said Isle of Serk, unless every such strangers shall, at such time as he shall be there unto required by such persons as we shall authorise and appoint in that behalf, take the othe commonly called and knowen by the name of the Othe of Alegeans to us, our heires and Successors, according to the forme of the Statute made in the theird year of our Reigne of England, and onlesse the licence or consent of the Lord of the said Isle of Serk for the time being be, within the term of six weeks, procured and obtained in that behalf; and therefore we doe, by this presents, charge and command that none of the inhabitants of the said Isle of Serk doe att any time here after receave into his or their houses any strangers not borne in the said Isle of Serk, either as their servante, undertenant or otherwise, to make aboade with them, but only such who shall, whensoever they shall be thereunto required, as is aforesaid, take the said Othe of alleageans and also procure the consent of the said Lord of the said Isle, as aforesaid, upon peine of our indignation and heavy displeasure to be inflicted upon such as willingly neglect our Royal Commandement herein. And we doe by this present authorize and command our well beloved subject, Robert Slowley, Judge of the said Isle of Serk, and the Judge of the said Isle of Serk for the time being, to accept and take the said othe of alleageance of all and every such stranger or strangers borne out of the said Isle of Serk and comming to make his or their aboade there, any lawe, statute, coustume or restrain to the contrary not withstanding. And further we are well pleased and, for the more ease and quiet and contentment of all our subjects, the inhabitants of the said Isle of Serk, we do by this presents, for us, our heires and successors, grant, that it shall and may be lawful to and for all and every the inhabitants of the Isle of Serk and all other, att all time and times, att their wills and pleasures, to bargaine, sell, convey, let, lease, demis or assigne by writing or writings, sealed with the seal granted to Hélier de Carteret and to his heires, Lords and possessors of the Sinory of the Lordship or fee of Haubert de St Ouen, whose heires the said Philip de Carteret is, any lands, tenements or hereditaments, parcells of this said Isle of Serk, for such states, during such termes, as the tenants, farmers and occupiers of the said Isle of Serk heretofore have been used, or at this present may bargaine, sell, convey, let, lease, demise or assigne the same lands, tenements or hereditaments to any person or persons there, under the seal or seals of the said Isle of Guernsey and Jersey or either of them; and that all every such bargaines, sales, convenances, demises, leases and assignments, sealled with the said seal of the said Philipe de Carteret and of such of his heires as aforesaid, shall be as vailable, effectual and strong in the lawe as if the same had been made or granted under the seal or sealles of the said Islands of Guernezey or Jersey or either of them. And we doe further straitly charge and command you, the said Lord Carewe, Governor of the Isles of Guernezey and Serk, for the time beeing, and you, the said Amice de Carteret, Baillif of the said Isle of Guernezey, and the Bailiff of the said Isle of Guernezey for the time beeing, and you, the said Philipe de Carteret, Sinior of St Ouen, Lord of the said Isle of Serk, and your heires beeing Lords of the said Isle of Serk, that you and every of you do, from time to time, doe your best endeavour to cause these our letters patents and our good will and pleasure there in declared to be from time to time duly executed, performed, and put in use, within the said Isle of Serk, according to the true intent and meaning of these presents, as you and every of you answere to the contrary att your perill, although expresse mention of the true yearly valus or of the certainty of the premises or of any of them or of any other gifts or grants by us or any of our progenitors or predecessors to the said Philipe de Cartaret, Seignor of St Ouen, Lord of the said Isle of Serk, heretofore made, is not made in this presents; any statute, act, ordinants or provisions or restraint to the contrary heretofore had, made, published, ordained or provided, or any other thing, cause or matter whatsoever in any wise not with standing. In witness whereof we have caused these our lettres to be made patents. Witness ourself, at Westminster, the tweldth day of August, in the ninth year of our raigne of England, France and Hirland, and of Scotland the five and fortieth.

Wednesday, October 7th, 1846.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 7th, 1846.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine, further examined.

5100. Have you any document to hand in to the Commissioners?—I have here a list of the salaries of the public officers. The salary of the Bailiff is 300*l.* a year; of the Procureur, 200*l.*; of the Contrôle, 100*l.*; of the Greffier, 40*l.*; of the Prevôt, 14*l.*; the sergeant, 50*l.*; and the gaoler, 13*l.* a-year.

5101. The Receiver General is not a criminal officer, is he?—No.

5102. Attached to the prison is there any separate establishment, as a house of correction?

Mr. Carré. There is not; there are no means of hard labour.

5103. (To Mr. Carré.) Are you obliged, when you think simple imprisonment not sufficient, to make the imprisonment solitary?—To make a portion of it solitary on bread and water.

5104. The Procureur. I think that a house of correction is very much wanted. That is the general opinion.

5105. Looking at the Approbation des Loix (Lib. xii. chap. 5) we find that certain fees are to be paid to the gaoler on prisoners going in and coming out. " Les prisonniers en cette Isle sont commis en la garde du Portier du Château, lequel en doit estre responsable, et délivrer en justice par le Prevost, lorsqu'il en sera requis; et prent le dit Portier un sol sterlin d'entrée et un sol d'issue pour chacun prisonnier, qui par ordre de Justice est renvoyé au Château, tant pour crime, dette, que punition, et aussi prent deux deniers sterlin pour chacun jour que le dit prisonnier est au Château." Are those fees paid now?

Mr. Le Febvre (Greffier). Yes; the fee at present is 2*s.* 6*d.* on going in, and 2*s.* 6*d.* on coming out.

5106. Is that the case with criminals as well as debtors?—Yes.

The Contrôle. The reference in the Approbation is to Castle Cornet; a new gaol has been built since that.

Mr. Carré. The fees mentioned in the Approbation have been altered since the new gaol was built. I believe the Order in Council approving of the building of the new gaol also fixes the fees which are to be paid.

5107. When was the new prison built?

The Contrôle. In 1810 or 1811.

5108. (To Mr. Carré.) Can a prisoner be detained for non-payment of the fees?—No. The prisoner must go out on the day fixed by the sentence. The fee is paid by the Receiver, or at least advanced by him; he might be entitled, perhaps, to an action against the prisoner for it.

5109. The Procureur. The Receiver pays all: but, when a prisoner is condemned to costs, he is required to pay if has the means.

5110. The Contrôle. The expense now is 11½*d.* a-day. There is a judgment deciding that the Crown cannot recover against a prisoner the expense of his maintenance.

5112. Is that where there is a confiscation?—In any case.

5113. The Bailiff. I have here an Order in Council of the 18th of May, 1803; it was to authorize the building of the gaol, which appears to have been built in 1811, "Praying that your Majesty would be graciously pleased to permit them to erect a prison in the town of St. Peter Port, at such place as shall by them be found fit and convenient for securing the persons of criminals, debtors, and others, such prison to be under the same rules and regulations as are, and have ever been used, in the prisons at Castle Cornet, viz., that the porter of the castle, or gaoler, and the executioner shall be named and appointed by any of the Governors of this Island for the time being, and their salaries paid out of your Majesty's revenue in this Island. Secondly, that the maintenance of prisoners committed for crimes, who are unable to provide themselves, shall also be paid out of the said revenue." Then here is the Ordinance containing the prison rules, of the 16th of May, 1818. The sixteenth Article says, "Il sera payé au geolier, comme par le passé, savoir; A l'entrée de chaque prisonnier pour dette ou pour crime 2*s.* 6*d.* A la sortie 2*s.* 6*d.* Chaque fois qu'un prisonnier pour crime sera produit en Cour 2*s.* 6*d.* Pour paille lorsque changée 1*s.* 6*d.* Pour chaque jour dans la prison 3*d.* Idem dans sa maison 6*d.*" The sums opposite the items are not the present sums; nor are they the sums in the Approbation.

5114. (To the Bailiff.) Are the prisoners in gaol supported out of the revenues of the Crown?—Yes. We have what is called a hospital, in which persons are sometimes placed. We have a discretionary power in putting certain classes of people there, which would be superseded if there were a house of correction.

5115. Mr. Carré. The discretion is exercised in this manner. If a person is taken up for disturbance of the public peace, the officers of the hospital are authorized to detain him there for a fixed period; for six months, or even twelve months.

5116. (To Mr. Carré.) To that extent is it used as a prison?—It is used as a prison by the Court. I do not believe the officers of the hospital are bound to detain a prisoner: but they are authorized to do so; and the constables take up parties and place them there: but there is no law to bind them to keep there.

5117. Whence do you derive the power to put a person there?—We choose our own prison.

5118. Mr. MacCulloch. The party confined must be a pauper, and incapable of maintaining himself without parochial assistance.

5119. This is apparently a punishment for crime. It appears, therefore, that you inflict one specific punishment on a man if he is a pauper, and another if he is not.

5120. Mr. Carré. It is not considered exactly as a punishment. Supposing a person is constantly in a state of intoxication and unable to maintain himself, requiring the assistance of the parish officers, though an able-bodied man and able to labour, in such a case he is put in there.

5121. Where he is a notorious rogue and vagabond you mean?—Yes.

5122. Supposing you had a treadmill here; what power should you have to put a man upon it?—We should get over the difficulty, perhaps, in the same way as it has been got over in the case of transportation.

5123. (To the Bailiff.) How long have you been Bailiff?—About a year and a half.

5124. (To Mr. Carré.) How long have you been on the Bench?—Fifteen years.

5125. (To the Bailiff.) I observe that you differ from the practice in Jersey, in this respect, that the Bailiff or Deputy Bailiff here, as the presiding Judge, begins by stating his own view?—Yes.

5126. Will you state whether you find in general that differences arise, or do the Jurats agree with you?—In the majority of cases the Jurats agree with me.

5127. (To Mr. Carré.) Do you agree to that?—I think they do, decidedly so.

5128. The differences of opinion from the opinion of the presiding Judge, would be an exception?—Rather an exception than otherwise.

5129. Was that the case, also, when the Bailiff was a person who had not been brought up to the bar?—I should say that, in a large majority of instances, it was so.

5130. You practised at the bar here, did not you?—I did.

5131. How is the Deputy Bailiff appointed?—He is appointed by the Bailiff for the time being.

5132. Of course, the office nominally expires at the death or resignation of the Bailiff?—It does absolutely. As soon as possible, after the death of the Bailiff, the Court assemble, after having signified to the Governor their intention to do so and for what purpose, and elect, out of their body, a magistrate, who is termed Juge délégué.

5133. He is practically the Bailiff till the new appointment?—Yes.

5134. Can the Juge délégué appoint a Deputy also?—He has no right to do so.

5135. Has the Lieutenant Governor a veto upon the election of the Jurats?—I do not believe that any such right exists.

5136. Has he neither a veto nor the right of suspension?—No.

5137. Does not Warburton say so?—Yes, he says so; but I think it is an error.

5138. The Contrôle. I think there is something upon that point in the Réglemens of the Commissioners in 1607.

5139. Mr. Carré. I believe that power was assumed and exercised by Sir Thomas Leighton, but without any authority that I could ever find; and it fell into disuse after some period. It certainly did not exist before his time.

5140. You cannot find any law which sanctions Warburton in saying that, when a Jurat is chosen, he is not to be sworn till the Governor is made acquainted with his election and approves of it?—I have searched, and cannot find any ground for it whatever: and it certainly was not practiced till Sir Thomas Leighton's time.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

5141. He was Governor at the time of the Approbation, was not he?—Yes. It is not mentioned there. The Governor has a right to be present at the election of Jurats. All the ancient laws which state how the Jurats are to be elected say nothing about the right of the Governor to any veto.

The Bailiff. It is not mentioned in the Précepte d'Assize.

5142. (To Mr. Carré.) Is not another of the Jurats, Mr. Andros, an English lawyer?—Yes; he was a solicitor in London.

5143. The present Bailiff is an English barrister, is not he?

5144. The Bailiff. I was Recorder of Dartmouth and Judge of the Borough court of Wells.

5145. Is there any other gentleman, who has been bred to the law, upon the bench?

5146. Mr. Carré. I think not. Mr. Le Retilley was deputy Prevôt for many years.

5147. (To Mr. Carré.) Are you engaged in any employment except judicially?—No.

5148. Are any of the gentlemen on the Bench engaged in trade?

5149. Mr. Harry Dobrée. I believe I am the only one.

5150. What is your business?—I am a general merchant, in partnership with my father.

5151. Have you any thing to do with the spirit trade?—Yes; I am concerned in the spirit trade.

5152. Have you anything to do with the sale of beer or ale, either wholesale or retail?—No. The business my father and myself carry on here, as regards the wine and spirit trade, is confined exclusively to exportation, with the exception of a few private gentlemen who occasionally draw their supplies from us.

5153. You do not supply any public houses?—No; we have no connection whatever with public houses or shops of any sort.

5154. Is not Mr. Mansell a brewer?

Mr. Carré. He was. He has given up the business several years since. He gave it up at the time he was elected.

5155. Has he any connection in the trade?—He has a son in the trade.

5156. When the question of licensing houses is before the Court, does Mr. Mansell sit?—Certainly.

5157. (To Mr. Le Marchant.) Are you in any business?—I have been a merchant. I have retired from business.

5158. (To Mr. Le Retilley.) Are you in any business?—No.

5159. Is Sir William Collings in any business?—He was a general merchant. He has been long out of business.

5160. (To Mr. Gosselin.) Are you in any business?—No, I am not.

5161. Have you been in business?—I have been, but for a very short time.

5162. What was your business?—General merchant.

5163. You have stated in writing to the Commissioners that you think it unreasonable that gentlemen on the Bench should not have the means of retiring when they ask for it.—I do. I ask the same privilege that the douzeniers have of retiring at the age of sixty.

5164. The Commissioners understand, from your communication to them, that you were elected against your consent?—I was elected to the office of Jurat, in 1832, against my will. In 1838, I petitioned Her Majesty in Council for leave to resign. My petition was transmitted to the States for their consideration of the subject; and they rejected my application.

5165. They advised Her Majesty to reject it probably?—They rejected it in the first instance; and the matter dropped.

5166. Has it often occurred that gentlemen have been elected against their will?

5167. Mr. Le Marchant. It has sometimes occurred. I was elected very much against my own wish, when I was out of the Island.

5168. Mr. Jeremie. That was the case with Mr. Andros.

5169. When was Mr. Andros elected?—He was sworn in, the 14th of January, 1843.

5170. Mr. Gosselin. I have now acted nearly fifteen years as Jurat of the Royal Court; and, being elected for life, I have no prospect of being allowed to retire: but, as douzeniers and officers of the militia are permitted to resign their situations at the age of sixty, I would ask, as a matter of justice, for the Jurats, that they, at the age of sixty, may likewise be permitted to vacate their offices or not, according as they feel disposed.

5171. Mr. De Havilland. I do not know whether the Commissioners have looked at the article of the Reglémens of the Commissioners of 1607 respecting a Jurat not being a brewer. It appeared to me that it had reference only to the cause which was then before the Court; that is to say that, if he was a brewer, he could not judge in that cause. It does not appear to me to be a disqualification generally.

5172. (To Mr. De Havilland.) Have you been in business at all?—I hold no other situation, nor have any other calling, than that of the Bench in this Island. But I hold rather an essential appointment, which is that of actuary to the fund at Madras for the provision for the families and children of the whole of the officers of that army.

5173. Does that take up much of your time?—Sometimes it does.

5174. Do you find it interfere at all with your duties, as a Jurat?—No; I do not.

5175. Were you a member of the Indian army at any period of your life?—I have been a member of the Indian army fifty four years. I was with it for thirty two years.

5176. (To Mr. Carré.) In Jersey a great many gentlemen who have filled the office of Jurat have succeeded to that office after filling other offices. They have been constables for a certain number of years; and the usual mode of obtaining the office of Jurat was first of all serving some subordinate office. Is that the case in this Island?—It is by no means necessary; it is not made obligatory by any law.

5177. Is it often a preliminary step?—It is very often.

5178. Mr. Gosselin. I have served most of the parochial offices.

5179. Mr. Le Retilley. I believe almost every one of us has served the parochial offices. I had been deputy Sheriff thirty years.

5180. Mr. Carré. I was at the Bar, and have not served them; but most of the Jurats have.

5181. So that the electors look among those who have filled the parochial offices for their Jurats?—Yes.

5182. Mr. De Havilland. They have the means of becoming better acquainted with them from their holding those offices.

5183. (To Mr. Edgar MacCulloch.) Are you in any business? -No.

5184. Have you been so?—No.

5185. (To Mr. Metivier.) Are you, or have you been, in business?—I have never been in business in Guernsey. I have been a merchant abroad for many years.

5186. (To Mr. Carré.) Is it the case that any of the gentlemen on the Bench are related to each other?—I am related to no one but Sir William Collings and Mr. Mansell. Sir William Collings is my mother's brother. I am connected with Mr. Mansell only by alliance.

5187. Is that the case to a considerable degree upon the Bench?

5188. Mr. Le Retilley. I have no relations upon the Bench.

5189. May we take it that there are several cases of family connection among the Jurats?

5190. There are.

5191. (To Mr. Carré.) Do not occasions sometimes arise, in which it is necessary for gentlemen who sit upon the Bench to choose whether they will cease to act in a public capacity in one way or the other. There was a great public meeting, for instance, pending the trial of certain gentlemen of the Militia. That meeting took place between the mise en accusation and the trial, did not it?—I do not recollect the date at which the public meeting happened.

5192. Mr. Maillard. The meeting was held the 2nd of July, 1844.

5193. Did not the Jurats find themselves compelled to abstain either from attending that meeting or from the trial?

5194. Mr Carré. I, for one, abstained from attending the meeting officially. That is to say, I was present at the meeting to see what was going on; but I only went as a matter of curiosity.

5195. Do you recollect whether any gentlemen who were Jurats took part in the proceedings of the meeting?—I did not see any. I heard that the Bailiff, Colonel Guille, was called forward.

5196. I see the name of Mr. Collings here; is that the present Sir William Collings?

Mr. Jeremie. No; the name is Joseph there. This is Sir William Collings.

5197. There is a gentleman also of the name of Andros: is that the Jurat?—No; that is his brother, who was there.

5198. Did Mr. Guille take the Chair upon that occasion?—No.

5199. In point of fact, were the members of the Court all there?

Mr. Carré. I do not know indeed.

5200. Mr. Le Retilley. I think the only one of the Jurats who was on the platform was Colonel Guille.

5201. Mr De Havilland. I was there as a matter of curiosity.

5202. (To Col. De Havilland.) Were you there at the close of the meeting?—I rather think I was.

5203. Do you recollect Colonel Guille proposing three cheers for the loyal Militia?—I do not recollect that.

5204. (To Mr. Jeremie.) Do you recollect whether Mr. Guille did so?—I was there, the greater part of the time; and I did not see any one of the Jurats there, except the Bailiff, Mr. Guille.

5205. (To Mr. Jeremie.) Did he take a part in the proceedings?—No; he was on the platform. I did not know he was there till all was over. Just before the meeting dispersed, he certainly called to mind the services of the Militia. As to seeing any of the Jurats there, I do not think there was one.

5206. He proposed a cheer for the Militia, did not he?—Yes; he proposed a cheer for the Militia.

5207. One gentleman proposed a cheer for the Bailiff and the Royal Court, did not he?—That might have been so; but I cannot recollect.

5208. Mr. De Courcy. Such was the case; I recollect it, I was there; but there was no reply.

5209. Mr. Carré. I think it right to add that many of the Jurats, on the occasion of that meeting, considered that there was a great deal of impropriety in the meeting, and looked upon it as rather an unconstitutional act.

5210. Do not you think that the Jurats might sometimes be driven to choose between abandoning their public duty, as heading a constitutional meeting of the inhabitants, or being placed in rather an embarrassing situation as Judges?—I should think it was their duty generally to abstain from such meetings. But it would depend very much upon what was the object of the meeting, whether there was any question of law depending upon the object of the meeting. If it was a question respecting any improvement in the law, I do not know why the magistrates should abstain from going. In general, I think the Jurats of the Court abstain from attending such meetings.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 7th, 1846.

5211. Mr. Mellish. I was constable, at the time of the meeting: and the Bailiff did not come forward or take any part in it; but he was called for by the public. It was after he was called for by the people that he came forward.

5212. After he was called for did he propose three cheers for the Militia?—Something was said about the Militia afterwards. There was a medley of matters; and they cheered together.

5213. Mr. De Havilland. This meeting was simply for a declaration of our loyalty to the Queen. If my recollection is correct, the Court consulted together, and determined not to go there as a body, but only such individuals as might wish to go.

5214. (To Mr. De Havilland.) If it were merely a meeting to express your loyalty to the Queen, how was it that certain gentlemen disapproved of the meeting altogether?—There was an address drawn up to that effect; that was all that was done.

5215. Was not the meeting in consequence of the proceedings of some gentlemen forming part of the Militia having been impeached?—No. The feeling about the Militia was very great.

5216. Had the meeting nothing to do with it?—I think not.

5217. The Militia proceedings were alluded to, were not they?—At the time the Militia was under a ban; and there was a great feeling in the Island.

5218. Mr. Jeremie. The Island, as the Islanders considered, had been grievously aspersed in the House of Commons.

5219. (To Mr. Jeremie.) Was not the aspersion relative to certain words which had fallen from some gentlemen in the Militia?—No; the inhabitants were considered to be in a state of rebellion, and six hundred troops came here to put it down. That being the case, there was a meeting held by the inhabitants for the purpose of making a declaration that they were, as they had always conceived themselves to be, loyal subjects: and, as in England the manner of getting up of these public meetings was by no means unusual or contrary to any regulations, they thought they might do the same thing here. There is a remark which has fallen from the Lieutenant Bailiff which I will take the liberty of setting right. He has spoken about its being an unconstitutional meeting. Fortunately, we are not in the habit of having many troops sent over here; and that meeting was the most extraordinary that ever was held. Such meetings were never held in the open air. I suppose Mr. Carré meant that it was unconstitutional, because none of the constitutional authorities called for it.

5220. Mr. Carré. I do not think any allusion was made at the meeting to the proceedings which were pending. It was not considered as having any reference to them. It was the manner of the proceeding, and not the matter, to which I alluded.

5221. Mr. Jeremie. The fact is that the meeting was held to express a feeling of loyalty and proper feeling to the Sovereign under the circumstances. The Island had been aspersed by several members of the House of Commons; and they were declared to be in a state of rebellion: and the troops having come here gave a colouring to the state of the Island, and represented it to be in such a state which it really was not. There was no more necessity for those troops than for the French coming here themselves.

5222. (To Mr. Jeremie.) We see the first resolution is, "We, the undersigned, native and other inhabitants of your Majesty's Island of Guernsey, beg leave humbly to approach your Majesty, with the expression of the profound feeling of sorrow which has been caused to us, by certain injurious and unfounded imputations of disloyalty and conspiracies which have recently been cast upon us." Had not that relation to the particular case of those officers which was then before the Court?—No, not at all. The case of those officers came afterwards. The expressions there had nothing to do with the charges against the militia officers.

5223. Mr. De Havilland. Colonel Lane is present, who took a very active part in the meeting, and who, perhaps, could give the Commissioners better information than any one else.

5224. (To Colonel Lane.) You were present at the meeting, were you?—Yes.

5225. Can you state whether the late proceedings respecting the militia men formed a part of the exciting topics at the meeting?—No; the meeting arose from a desire on the part of the gentlemen of the Island, to repel an accusation of disloyalty which had been made use of in the House of Commons, I believe by Mr. Roebuck.

5226. Had those charges any reference to the question of the militia men?—It might have arisen out of the proceedings against the militia officers. The two matters could not be very well separated. That, I believe, gave rise to the observations in the House of Commons: but the meeting had no reference to the charge.

5227. Mr. John Talbot. (Editor of the Star.) I was in daily communication with Sir Thomas De Saumarez, about the time of this meeting: and I can state positively that he made it a positive condition that nothing of a political nature should be introduced at the meeting. It was to be strictly and entirely a declaration of loyalty, without any reference to General Napier, or to any circumstances in which the General was concerned; and many others signed the requisition upon the same understanding.

5228. Were not you rather surprised, then, at a cheer being given for the Court, and that being responded to by the President of the Court calling for a cheer for the militia?—I cannot at this moment state what my feelings were; but so thoroughly was it understood that this was only a declaration of loyalty, that the address to Her Majesty was signed, I believe, by nearly all the clergy of the Island, by the Queen's law officers, and, I believe, by most of the Jurats, as well as by most of the British residents generally.

5229. The Bailiff. Hearing what I have heard of the meeting to-day, and feeling my own position, I should say that the existence of such a meeting would never embarrass my mind. I should think that the meeting would go on very well without me.

GUERNSEY.

Charles de Jersey Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 7th, 1846.

5230. (To the Bailiff.) In any question of party politics, or any question which interested very deeply the Island, would not a gentleman on the Bench either be obliged to give up his character as a Judge, or his character as a politician?—I do not think any man's character as a politician depends upon his attending any one meeting.

5231. Would he not be prevented taking part in some particular questions of local politics?—I do not see how any man could very well feel himself to be in a dilemma in such a case.

5232. Supposing you take the case of some public question, twelve important gentlemen of the Island must either lose their influence in public affairs, or find difficulty in acting as Judges?—I think the loss even of the dozen best men from a public meeting is a very slight evil, and more than compensated by having a dozen men to work on the same subject in a different sphere.

5233. Would there not be a difficulty in their acting in both positions?—I should abstain from acting in both, as a general rule.

5234. Colonel Lane. Whatever Mr. Bailie Guille proposed was independent of the meeting.

5235. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. I am the rector of The Forest and Torteval. I wish to mention to the Commissioners that, about the time of this meeting, the walls of the town were decorated with the most exciting placards against General Napier, reflecting upon his character and conduct; and no means whatever were taken to put them down, or take them away. I brought them under the notice of Mr. Alfred Payne, the then constable.

5236. (To Mr. Dobrée.) Can you state whether those placards, which were about antecedent to the meeting, had any reference to the trial?—I should say they had reference to the general proceedings.

5237. To the proceedings upon the subject of the militia officers?—I should say that they had.

5238. Do you recollect, of your own memory, whether that was so or not?—I could not state it positively; but it is my opinion. It appears to me rather an odd way of testifying our loyalty to the Sovereign to abuse her representative.

5239. Mr. Payne. I was assistant constable at the time, and wish to make an observation.

5240. (To Mr. Payne.) Were you assistant constable of the town parish?—Yes. There were a few badly written placards stuck about the town.

5241. Do you mean ill composed?—No; badly written. There were but a few words in them. Mr. Brooke, one of the Douzaine, called on me, requesting me to keep a look out, and, if I saw any thing, to get them either pulled down, or the walls washed; which I did.

5242. Mr. Mellish. There were some on the Court House, which were taken down by myself. They were all written. There were no printed placards, excepting those calling the meeting.

5243. How many did you take down?—Two.

5244. (To Mr. Payne.) How many did you take down?—I do not think I took down above four or five; but there were considerably more in the other direction. They were all very badly written: I thought they were but of little consequence; and I did not rub them out.

5245. Mr. Mellish. Upon the placard that called the meeting there was nothing, except the notice of the meeting. I have one of them here.

The placard was read as follows.

The native and resident inhabitants of all the parishes of Guernsey are invited to attend a general public meeting, to be held on the New Ground, on Tuesday, July 2nd, 1844, at twelve o'clock at noon, to consider the propriety of adopting an Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty, the Queen, expressive of the devoted and unaltered loyalty of the said inhabitants to Her Majesty's person and Government.—God save the Queen.

Mr. Harry Dobrée, Jurat, examined.

Harry Dobrée, Esq., Jurat.

5246. The Commissioners have had a draft of a letter put into their hands. Will you look at it, and see whether it is in your hand writing?—Yes; it is my writing.

The paper was read as follows.

Sir,—As I find from your letter to me, under date of ——— instant, that some legal quibble or informality precludes, in the opinion of the Court, the possibility of bringing Peter Allez [the words "Peter Allez" are in pencil] to trial, I conceive, that it will not tend to the ends of justice to put Josias Le Pelley on his defence, whilst another as guilty or more guilty individual, judging from the minutes of evidence before me, is by some defect in the law enabled to escape justice. I am further of opinion that (unless you have other evidence to produce than I am in possession of), that much uncertainty and difficulty would exist in obtaining a verdict for the Crown in this case, from the numerous relations and friends of the accused, who would be found amongst the witnesses you would have to produce; and, being of opinion that the interests of the Crown would be better served by the abandonment of an uncertain indictment than by a verdict of nonsuit, I hereby desire that you do not for the present carry on the suit against Le Pelley.

5247. This paper appears to be a sketch of a communication proposing to withdraw some prosecution?—I am quite ready to give an explanation of it. That paper was written, to the best of my recollection, at the house and at the request of my brother, the Rev. Daniel Dobrée, the Rector of The Forest, who at that time was threatened with an indictment for perjury, in consequence of the failure of an accusation brought by himself and others against three officers of the militia, Messrs. Mansell, Rougier and Le Pelley. We both of us, that is to say, my brother and myself, considered it urgent that he should, if possible, avoid the scandal and disgrace of such a proceeding.

5248. What do you mean by failure?—They obtained a verdict of acquittal. This was written after the verdict of acquittal.

GUERNSEY.

Harry Dobree, Esq., Jurat.

October 7th, 1846.

5249. Will you look at the paper again? Does it not appear to contemplate the verdict as being still in suspense?—

Mr. Dobrée looked at the paper.

Yes; I see I was wrong.

5250. Might it not have been after the investigation before the Cour du Quartier?—I know that the thing had been under consideration in some form or other. I would say, in consequence of the apprehended failure of the indictment, my brother, at that time, was threatened with an accusation for perjury; and we considered it urgent that he should avoid such a proceeding. I felt myself quite at a loss to know what advice to offer on the subject, till, on his assuring me or expressing to me his conviction that the Lieutenant Governor (and I believe, though I am not quite positive, the name of Sir James Graham was added), that either he or they were ready to do everything in their power to serve him, we agreed, if that were the case, that the best thing that could be done would be to obtain, either from the Home Office or the Lieutenant Governor, a letter to the authorities here to stay proceedings. In the same manner, I would add, as has been subsequently done in the case of Sir William Collings versus General Napier.

5251. That was a Cause en Adjonction, was not it?—Yes. I mean to say that instructions were received from the Home Office to stay proceedings in the case, or to render them impossible by forbidding the Crown officers to take part in the proceedings. The paper now shewn me, to the best of my belief, is a sketch of the letter which we thought it would be desirable, if possible, to obtain. I would only add, that several words and names have since been added and interlined.

5252. Some appeared to be in pencil, and some in ink. When you speak of interlineations, do you speak of both of those?—I believe I do. I would wish to add that I felt more at liberty to advise my brother in this matter, as, in all the cases in which he has unfortunately been mixed up, I have abstained from taking any judicial part whatever in the proceedings.

5253. In saying that, do you include the prosecution of those gentlemen, Messrs. Mansell and others?—I believe I did not sit. In the explanation which I have just given touching that letter, I have no note or copy of it whatever; but, to the best of my knowledge, those were the circumstances under which I wrote that draft. It was done at my brother's house one evening, when I accidentally went for some other purpose.

5254. By whom was it proposed that this letter should be written?—As far as I recollect, my idea was that my brother was threatened at the time with an accusation for perjury; and that letter was written, either with a view to stay proceedings against him, or to stay proceedings against a third party whom it was proposed to bring to justice. Fearing to involve my brother still further, I advised him as much as possible to stay those proceedings.

5255. By whom was it intended that this letter was to be signed?—I forget by whom it was to be signed; by some superior authority; the Governor, most likely, was to sign it.

5256. Of course it could not be a letter which Sir James Graham should sign?—No.

5257. Was it to be a letter of instructions from the Governor to the Crown officers?—Yes.

5258. To whom do you conceive the letter was to have been addressed?—To the officers of the Crown, I suppose.

5259. Do you recollect who suggested the danger of the indictment for perjury?—No; but it was one which I personally felt. My belief was, and is still, that the whole of that charge of conspiracy was totally unfounded and frivolous, and that all those connected with it would involve themselves in difficulty and disgrace by taking any further part in it; and I wished to endeavour to get him out of it.

5260. Of course, the Commissioners are not investigating the propriety of the conduct of any individual, but simply the position in which any gentleman is placed upon the Bench under various circumstances which may arise?—The public impression then was throughout the town that all those parties would be open to an indictment for perjury.

5261. Do you mean by the word frivolous, incredible?—Yes; unfounded, visionary, imaginary.

5262. And false?—I will not make use of the word false; because I do not go the length of saying that some of the parties did not believe in the existence of the conspiracy. At the time that note was written, sufficient had come out to leave the impression on my mind that my brother and some other parties would be open to an indictment for perjury, if they persisted.

5263. Had you seen the evidence at that time?—No; nor do I think I had heard of it except by public report.

5264. You thought it necessary to warn your brother in consequence of public report?—Yes.

5265. Are you quite sure that you did not allude to any language expressed by any member of the Court?—No; I think not.

5266. Are you confident of it?—No; at this distance of time I will not be positive. My memory is bad. It is now a year and a half ago. I am the more willing to hold that idea from the fact that, being personally acquainted with the gentlemen who were accused, many of them, we had some conversation on the subject: and my then feeling was, that Mansell, and Rougier, and Le Pelley, were as incapable as myself of entering into any conspiracy of the sort.

5267. Do you recollect whether anything passed in conversation upon the risk of your brother losing his ecclesiastical preferment by it?—I believe, that in his private parlour at the rectory, I held out to him, or expressed a fear, that he would run some risk in his ecclesiastical capacity, should such a conviction be brought home against him. Of course that is a matter of ecclesiastical law, upon which I do not profess to be well informed: but I conceive that a clergyman accused publicly of perjury, though not convicted, would be liable to ecclesiastical censure: and

I do recollect, I think, calling my brother's attention to that fact, as an additional inducement to him to stay any further proceedings, if possible.

Harry Dobreé, Esq. Jurat.

October 7th, 1846.

5268. Your brother did appear at the trial, did not he?—I believe he did.

5269. And has not been prosecuted?—Not that I am aware of.

5270. Do you wish to add anything else?—No.

The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. The observations which my brother has just made, oblige me to make certain remarks in answer. My brother has said that the accusation brought against the accused party was brought by me. If the Commissioners look at the indictment, they will find that it was brought by the Lieutenant Governor, and that the Queen's officers compelled me to be an unwilling witness. When I was brought forward as a witness, and compelled to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, I was summoned to a meeting with my brother.

---

The Rev. Daniel Dobrée examined.

Rev. Daniel Dobrée.

5271. Was this after, or while you were giving your evidence?—After the secret inquest.

5272. After you had given your evidence au secret?—Yes; or part of it, at all events. I was summoned to a meeting with my brother at Mr. Utermarck's house, the father of Mr. John Utermark, the Contrôle: and every endeavour was made by my brother and Mr. John Utermarck's father to cause me to withdraw from or to shake the testimony I had given, and altogether to get out of the matter. Among other inducements, they told me I should be inevitably convicted of perjury; that I should lose my ecclesiastical preferment; and that I should be disgraced for ever. I told them, as far as my memory serves me: "Gentlemen, I have but one story to tell, and that is a true one. I have no doubt that General Napier, and moreover that Sir James Graham, will preserve me (not serve me, but preserve me) from unfair play, if a charge of perjury is brought against me: and I have no doubt that the same God that protected me during the whole time of the natural cholera, when all the low Churchmen turned their backs, will protect me also during the political cholera."

5273. Was any thing said in reply to this?—They rather seemed to deter me, and to exhort me most strenuously to keep out of the way: in fact, that I was cutting my own throat.

5274. The prosecution did fail in fact, did not it?—It was never brought forward. The accusation was never brought against me.

5275. The prosecution against Mr. Rougier and others?—Yes; it did fail. Allusion has been made to the accusation of perjury against me. With the permission of the Commissioners, to morrow, I will put in Mr. Dampier's letter to me, as evidence, in which he totally exculpates me from it. I would have brought it to day; but I was not aware that this part of the prosecution would be gone into. My brother was perfectly right in saying that he was not present during the inquiry au Secret. I wish he had been; for, had he been there, he would not have allowed me to be bullied and insulted by Sir William Collings in the manner in which I was. I went to London; and I was told that I should have fair play, and should be protected. I came back again voluntarily; and, under every disadvantage, I gave my evidence. What that evidence was worth it is not for me to say; but I ask you gentlemen, as English Judges, in what court in England, in what court of justice in the world, are the Crown witnesses shut up in different rooms, locked up, and the witnesses for the defence allowed to sit behind the prisoner? Can you wonder that an acquittal took place after that? General Napier's witnesses were kept shut up in the private rooms of the Court by themselves, while the greater part of the witnesses for the defence were allowed to stay behind the accused.

5276. Was this tried à l'Ordinaire?—Yes.

5277. You were stating something which took place at Mr. Utermarck's, the father of the present Contrôle; will you continue your statement upon the subject?—I believe, as far as my recollection serves me, that my brother wished me to get General Napier to stay proceedings against the accused.

5278. Mr. Harry Dobrée (Jurat). That is correct; but it was at my brother's own house, a day or two after the meeting which has been alluded to.

5279. (To the Rev. Daniel Dobrée). Do you recollect such a conversation?—I do.

5280. You say you did not accede to the proposition at Mr. Utermarck's. Did a meeting take place with your brother at your own house afterwards?—Yes; he came to my house. I repeated to him then and there that I had but one story to tell, and all the universe could not induce me to alter what I had said.

5281. To what was that in answer?—To their wish for me to refuse being a witness, and to abstain from appearing.

5282. What means had you of refusing to appear as a witness?—I might have gone away.

5283. Was it proposed to you to go away?—It was proposed that I should not appear. I had no personal feelings against the accused; they were most of them perfect strangers to me; and those I did know I had only a casual acquaintance with. I had no private malice, nor any inducement of any kind, to appear against them; nor should I have done so, unless I had been compelled to do so by the Queen's officers. My brother has stated that what I said in evidence was visionary and imaginary: but what can any man tell who is not present when the matter takes place. I took this document to General Napier; and I said to General Napier "So and so has taken place; I have no concealment from you; I will not go one inch backwards or forwards from what I have said. I have but one story to tell." And I gave him the letter which I now hold in my hand.

5284. Do you agree with your brother's statement that you proposed the writing of that letter?—No; I neither proposed nor entered into it.

5285. That appears to be the only point in which your account differs from that of Mr. Harry Dobrée?—I do not admit we agree. This I have no doubt was done from the kindest

GUERNSEY.

The Rev. Daniel Dobrée.

October 7th, 1846.

motives; but my feelings were that, having made such a statement, and being convinced of the truth of it, I would not go back a single inch to avoid anything which might occur.

5286. In that case, how was it worth your while to take the paper at all?—He gave me the paper, and said, that was what he wished to have done; and I said "I will not do it." I never asked the General to write the letter at all.

5287. (To Mr. Harry Dobrée). Was that letter written at Mr. Daniel Dobrée's house, or did you take it with you ready written?—It was written at his house on his table.

5288. (To the Rev. Daniel Dobrée). Do you agree in that?—I think it was: I cannot be positive.

5289. Mr. Harry Dobrée. When I went to my brother, I had no idea of writing a letter; but urging him, as I did, to drop the proceedings and get rid of it, he said: "My dear fellow, what can I do? I am so advanced in it that I cannot drop it." I said "That is very true." And it was on his assurance that he was sure that the Governor was ready to do everything he could to serve him, that I said: "Then the best thing you could do is to get him to write a letter, something of that kind, to procure the proceedings to be dropt." He said: "The Governor wished him well, and would do any thing to serve him or to help him." From what he said, I hoped he would have the power to carry that letter through for the sake of my brother and his family and every body connected with him.

5290. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. My brother has made use of some rather strong expressions; that he wished me to give up the prosecution for the sake of myself, my family, and every body connected with me. If all I have said is visionary, how came young Frederic Mourant to write to his brother in England, who is a clergyman at Norwich, and tell him precisely the same thing that he told me. Had I the influence to make that unfortunate boy write to his brother at Norwich and tell him almost precisely the same thing that he told me?

---

Mr. James Barbet, the Queen's Sergeant, examined.

Mr. James Barbet, Queen's Sergeant.

5291. Are you the Queen's Sergeant?—Yes. I had the charge of the Court on the day alluded to, especially the witnesses. The course pursued was not the ordinary one of having them all remain in Court; but, at the request either of the Crown lawyers, or of the counsel for the prisoner, I cannot now recollect which,——

5292. The Contrôle. It was at the request of Mr. Falla, the counsel for the prisoners.

5293. Mr. Barbet. At his request, all the witnesses without distinction were taken into an adjoining room.

5294. All together?—Yes. There are no means of separating them here. They were then called in, one by one; and, after each had deposed, he remained in the Court. After a while, I was told that some who had not been examined were loitering about the door.

5295. They had got out of your room?—Yes; I instantly went to the room and found some two or three missing.

5296. Were they witnesses for the Crown or for the defence?—Both. I told those who were present that they were not to leave the room, that some were already gone. I then locked the door till I could collect the stragglers. When I had got them I let them in. I did not lock the door; but I appointed some one to help me watch the room. On my going in Mr. Dobrée did protest against having been locked up.

5297. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. After being so locked up, and kept from eight o'clock till five in the evening without refreshment, I was brought in here. The first thing I saw was several witnesses for the defence sitting right behind the accused.

5298. Mr. Barbet. They did not return into the room, when they had been examined.

5299. (To Mr. Barbet.) The witnesses for the prosecution are examined first, are not they?—Yes.

5300. Then those witnesses for the defence could not have been examined when Mr. Dobrée came into the Court?—I have no knowledge of the circumstance at all.

5301. The Contrôle. The witnesses were made to retire upon the first trial; they were not made to retire upon the subsequent trial.

5302. Mr. John Waterman. The sergeant of the Court has declared to you that the witnesses were all locked up in the room adjoining at the Court house; it is quite false. While the Crown witnesses were locked up, the defendant's witnesses were in court or where they pleased.

5303. (To Mr. Waterman.) Of which trial are you speaking?—On the second day. On the trial of Mr. Rougier, Mr. St. John Mansell, and Mr. Le Pelley. They were all tried on the same day; two on one count and one on the other.

5304. Mr. Barbet. I am satisfied that the witnesses for the prosecution and for the defence were in the room. I believe Mr. Jones, who is a member of the town Douzaine, was a witness for one of the prisoners. He will state whether he was in the room.

5305. Mr. John Jones. I have this moment come into the Court house; and, hearing what was stated, I mentioned to the sergeant that I was one of the witnesses in the case for the prisoners. We were all required by the Court to leave the court room. I was, for a considerable time, in a room there together with Mr. Dobrée and Mr. Waterman and his wife also.

5306. Was this at the trial when the parties were acquitted, or at the first investigation?—It was at the trial, when they were acquitted.

5307. (To Mr. Carré). The Commissioners understand the practice of the Court is to order all the witnesses out, if it is required, and to let them in as they are examined. If the contrary took place, it was an irregularity which should not have taken place?—Certainly; it is the first time that this has come to the knowledge of the Court.

5308. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. I protested against it to the Queen's Procureur at the time.

5309. Mr. Harry Dobrée. I would wish to make one observation touching the project for a letter, which has been exhibited. A gentleman's name has been brought into the discussion, the name of Mr. Utermarck, the father of the present Solicitor General. It is due to him to state why his name appears. He is a first cousin of ours, and has always been looked upon in the light of an elder brother; and I was induced to request my brother to meet him at his house in hopes that, from the influence which Mr. Utermarck, the father, has always had over us, he would join his influence with mine to induce my brother to adopt any course which would put an end to the situation in which I thought he was placed.

Mr. James Barbet, Queen's Sergeant, October 7th, 1846.

5310. (To the Bailiff.) It has been stated that a Jurat would be removable on being appointed Bailiff. Is that so?—He vacates his office.

5311. (To Mr. Carré.) The Lieutenant Bailiff officiates for the Bailiff in his absence, does not he?—Yes.

5312. In case of his so officiating, does he lose his vote as Jurat?—Yes; he is placed in exactly the same position as the Bailiff; and it would be only in case of an equality of voices that he would have any vote in the judgment given.

5313. Is there more than one gentleman appointed as Lieutenant Bailiff?—No. The Bailiff's commission gives him power to appoint more; but it is not generally done.

5314. The Bailiff. There was a time when the Bailiff was an officer, not resident in the Island, and there was then a Lieutenant Bailiff, who occupied precisely the place of the Bailiff.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine, further examined:

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

5315. The Procureur. With respect to the election of the Jurats, the Royal Commissioners of 1607, in page 46 of the printed book, express themselves thus: "We do order that the Governor, or his Lieutenant, being first made acquainted therewith, the said Bailiff and Jurats, with the constables and douzaines of every parish, who are the most trusted with all other public causes of their several parishes, upon eight days' warning at the least, given by the Bailiff, being assembled, shall have voices in the said election; and whosoever is nominated by the greater part of them, the Bailiff shall pronounce and declare him to be lawfully chosen, and thereupon shall cause him to be admitted in such manner and form as heretofore hath been accustomed."

CLAIMS OF THE PARISH OF ST. PETER-PORT.

St. Peter Port's Claim to a Third Part in the Election of Officers.

Item.—They complain against the Bailiff and Jurats that, whereas, of time out of mind, this said town and parish of St. Peter Port did stand, in all elections of public persons and other affairs that do concern the state of the Isle, for the third, even as the said parish sustained the third part of all public charges in subsidies and taxations; the said Bailiff and Jurats have lately, in the proceeding to public elections, deprived the same parish of her ancient preferment and advantage, reducing her to the same order and degree that the lesser parishes of the Isle holdeth, although their said town and parish affordeth ten times more able and sufficient men every way, and continueth still in her accustomed charge. The complainants' desire, therefore, is to be restored to their ancient privileges and pre-eminence above all other parishes.

Having made diligent inquiry touching these privileges claimed by the said parish, we have been informed by the more part of the Jurats and by the greater part of all others with whom we have conferred hereof, that there was never any such privileges or pre-eminence allowed to the said parish. Likewise, we find by some ancient customs and orders, which we have seen, written and recorded to have been done in the time of King Edward III. and of King John, that, in those times, the customs of choosing the Jurats, in both the Isles of Guernsey and Jersey was per ministros domini regis et optimates patriæ. Moreover, we find in the precept of assize, made by the oaths of twelve sworn men of every parish, in the year 1331, that the inhabitants and dwellers in this Isle, they and their predecessors, have used to choose and elect their Jurats of themselves, such as were the most notable, discreet, wise, true and rich men of the said Isle, without attributing or mentioning any dignity or pre-eminence therein, due to any one parish more than to another. And whereas the foresaid parish, to obtain the said privilege, as a principal argument, allege that they sustain the third part of all public charges in subsidies and taxations, we think that no sufficient motive or reason to induce the same; but rather are of opinion that they are more favoured than burthened thereby; for, as the general report and fame goeth, the inhabitants of their parish are, in worldly substance, more worth than the inhabitants of any three of the other parishes in this Island; so that if they were valued and esteemed in their payment according to their own wealth and worth, as others of this Island are, they should sustain a far greater part in all subsidies and taxations than now they do; whereupon we are induced to think that there is no such privilege in election of officers due unto the inhabitants of the parish of St. Peter Port, and therefore (the rather because all inovations are dangerous in every commonwealth), and being desirous to reduce the same as near as we may, to the ancient use before expressed, and to avoid all disorderly tumults, indiscretions and confusions which do usually accompany the greatest multitudes in elections. With the consent of the Bailiff and Jurats, we do order that the Governor or his Lieutenant, being first made acquainted therewith, the said Bailiff and Jurats, with the Constables and Dozens of every parish, who are the most trusted with all other public causes of their several parishes (upon eight days warning at the least, given by the Bailiff,) being assembled, shall have voices in the said election, and whosoever is nominated by the greater part of them, the Bailiff shall pronounce and declare him to be lawfully chosen, and thereupon shall cause him to be admitted in such manner and form as heretofore hath been accustomed.

5316. This is the law which now regulates the election of Jurats, is it?—Yes.

5317. The Bailiff. The whole of that order of the Commissioners bears upon the point, adis consistent with the Précepte d'Assize, and also with the law, as stated in the placita de quo warranto, before the Justices in Eyre, in the 2nd of Edward the Second, 1308, published by the Record Commissioners, pages 825 and 826.*

* The following is the passage referred to. "Et Communitas veniunt et dicunt quod ipsi et eorum progetores insulani hic, à tempore quo memoria non existit, semper usi fuerint habendis duodecim juratis de seipsis, qui eligi debent per ministros domini Regis et optimates patriæ, cum opus fuerit, scilicet post mortem unius eorum alter fide dignus, similiter si quis eorum convictus fuisset à casu de falsitate, loco suo debet alter substitui."

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 7th, 1846.

5318. Mr. MacCulloch. In the extent of Edward the Third, under the head of "Les perquisitions de la Cour de toute l'Ile," is the following. "Les perquisitions de la Cour de toute l'Isle vaut communement, tous les ans, en toutes choses qui en issent et en procèdent cent livres tournois, aucune fois plus aucunefois moins; c'est assavoir que les cours doyvent estre tenues par le Bailiff, esleu de la partie de nostre Sire le Roy, et est accoustumé qu'il soit des tenans résidens en la dite Isle, pour ce qu'il est tenu de respondre devant les Justiciers estant en la dite Isle de tous cas touchant la couronne, et ce en la présence de xij. jurés, ou de vij. au moins, pourtant que tous cas escheants ès dites Cours doyvent estre jugez et recordés par la circonspection d'iceulx Jurés et avec ce tous les marchez d'icelles cours taxez. Et ainsy icelluy Bailiff ne peut faire aucun jugement ou record sans la présence d'iceulx Jurez, par ainsy qu'ils ayent reconnoissance de tous les cas là escheans, à faire droit jugement et vray record. Laquelle cour, c'est assavoir, de chattel, debtes et transgressions, doit estre tenue de sepmaine en sepmaine, et pour estrangers de jour en jour, sy necessité est, et d'héritages de xv. jours en xv. jours. Somme cent livres tournois."

5319. (To Mr. Lefebvre, Greffier.) Will you now furnish the Commissioners with the oaths which are taken by the different officers of the Court?

The same are put in and are as follow.

Vous jurez et promettez, sur la foi et le serment que vous devez à Dieu et sur les Saints Evangiles de Jesus Christ, que touchez de votre main dextre, que vous exercerez bien et fidélement la charge de Baillif de cette Ile de Guernesey; que vous maintiendrez l'avancement de la glorie de Dieu, l'honneur de Sa Majesté, notre Souveraine Dame, Victoria, par la grâce de Dieu, Reine du royaume uni de la Grande Bretagne et d'Irlande, Défenseure de la Foi, et qu'à Sa dite Majesté vous serez vrai et loyal sujet; que vous garderez et maintiendrez bien et loyalement et de tout votre pouvoir toutes les loix, libertés, usages et anciennes coûtumes de cette Ile en la compagnie des Jurés de cette Ile, et exécuterez et accomplirez les regards, records et jugemens faits et déclarés par les dits Jurés, et que, si par erreur ou autrement vous faisiez aucune défaute ou trépas à l'encontre, vous vous redresserez incontinent selon l'avis et bonne opinion des dits Jurés; que vous ne ferez sceller aucunes lettres qui ne soient droites et juridiques, et que, de toutes ventes, obligations, sentences ou termes de rôle qui seront faits par devant vous, vous en baillerez justes relations et records. Vous promettez ainsi.

Ainsi Dieu vous aide.

Dieu sauve la Reine.

5320. Serment du Lieutenant Baillif.

Vous jurez et promettez, sur la foi et le serment que vous devez à Dieu, que bien et fidélement vous exercerez la charge de Lieutenant Baillif comme à telle charge appartient, et conformément aux devoirs qui sont imposés au Baillif de cette Ile, dans le serment qui vient de vous être lû.

Ainsi Dieu vous aide.

Dieu sauve la Reine.

5321. Serment des Jurés.

Vous jurez et promettez, sur la foi et le serment que vous devez à Dieu, et sur le peril et damnation de votre âme et sur les saints Evangiles de Jesus Christ que touchez de votre main dextre, que vous exercerez bien et fidélement la charge et office de Juré de la Cour Royale de cette Ile de Guernesey; que vous maintiendrez l'avancement de la gloire de Dieu, l'honneur de Sa Majesté, notre Souveraine, par la grâce de Dieu, Reine du Royaume uni de la Grande Bretagne et d'Irlande, Défenseure de la Foi, et en ses pays et dominions tant aux causes ecclésiastiques que temporelles suprème Gouverneur; qu'à Sa dite Majesté vous serez vrai et loyal sujet, tant au fait ecclésiastique qu'au temporel, renonçant aux faits et ordonnances du Pape et à toute puissance et jurisdiction foraine; que vous maintiendrez justement la république de cette Ile, et garderez et entretiendrez de tout votre pouvoir les loix, libertés, coûtumes, et autres usages de droit accoûtumés en cette Ile; que vous assisterez et aiderez, avec le Baillif ou son Lieutenant, en la compagnie d'autres Jurés vos frères, en cours ordinaires, à votre tour, et en cours extraordinaires, toutes fois et quantes qu'en heure due en serez requis à rendre bonne et loyale justice entre Sa dite Majesté et ses sujets, et de partie à partie, tant au petit qu'au grand, et principalement aux veuves, et orphelins, sans aucun supporter ou favoriser par don, promesse, amour, acception de personne ou autrement; que vous n'assisterez à sceller aucunes lettres qui ne soyent droites et juridiques, et que de toutes ventes, obligations, sentences ou termes de rôle qui seront faits par devant vous, vous en baillerez justes relations et records. Et si, paraventure vous aviez erré, fût par ignorance ou autrement, vous promettez de vous rectifier et de vous ranger à la plus saine opinion de vos frères. Vous promettez ainsi.

Ainsi Dieu vous aide.

Dieu sauve la Reine.

5322. Serment du Procureur et Contrôle.

Vous jurez et promettez, par la foi et le serment que vous devez à Dieu et sur le peril et damnation de votre âme et par la Sainte Loi et Evangile de Dieu contenues en ce Livre qu'avez touché de votre main dextre, premièrement que vous maintiendrez l'avancement de la gloire de Dieu, l'honneur de la Majesté de notre Souveraine Dame, Victoria, par la grâce de Dieu, Reine de la Grande Bretagne et d'Irelande, Deffenseure de la foi, &c., et en Ses Pais et Dominions, tant aux causes ecclésiastiques que temporelles suprème Gouverneur; qu'à icelle Majesté vous serez vrai et loyal sujet, tant aux faits ecclésiastiques que temporels, renonçant aux ordonnances et faits du Pape et à tout pouvoir et juridiction foraine; que vous serez obéïssant à Justice et aux actes et ordonnances d'icelle et en verrez l'exécution, et que vous maintiendrez justement la république de cette Isle, et garderez et observerez les loix droits et anciennes libertez, et usages accoûtumez selon droit en cette dite Isle; que vous poursuivrez et deffendrez les droits et causes de Sa Majesté la Reine de tout votre pouvoir justes et droiturières, tant en meuble qu'en héritage, et si, aucunement il advient qu'il y ait en vous aucune faute en votre charge, soit par ignorance ou autrement, vous promettez d'être redressé par Monsieur le Baillif et la Justice, et généralement, vous promettez d'exercer droitement, sans fraude ni déception l'office et charge de Procureur et de Contrôle de la dite Majesté en cette Isle, ainsi qu'à telle office appartient, comme vrai et loyal, en la dite charge, est de dire et faire. [redacted]

Dieu sauve la Reine.

5323. The Bailiff. With respect to the office of Bailiff, there is a power belonging to the Bailiff adversely to the Court of suspending a judgment. In case of a judgment being given by the Jurats which he does not approve of in point of law, he may suspend it. And it appears to be understood that it may be suspended for not more than forty days. Tracing that historically, I find in Terrien, Lib. x. ch. 1, page 404: "Si le Justicier apperçoit que les Jugeurs desvoyent par ignorance ou par malice, jaçoit ce que tous en un se consentẽt, il le doit delayer jusques aux autres Assises, esquelles il se doit tenir au conseil de la greigneure et plus sage partie." Aux autres Assizes implies the lapse of forty days: in Normandy the assizes being holden from forty days to forty days. This is commented on in the corresponding chapter of Mr. Le Marchant's Book. "Par les Articles 7, 9, 10, et 11, lorsque les opinions sont différentes sur une cause, si le Bailiff ou autre Juge qui préside juge que la pluralité des assesseurs ait opiné contre droit, il peut d'office remettre la cause jusques à la prochaine Cour, pourveu que la cause ne requierre telle expédition que le délay d'icelle apportast notable dommage; mais, si tous les assesseurs s'accordent en une opinion, le Juge ne peut différer de donner jugement sans dire la raison pourquoy."

The subject also came before the Commissioners in 1607. It is in the Réglemens, pages 31–32.

The general Complaint of the People against His Majesty's Justices of the Isle of Guernsey, the Bailiff and Jurats especially.

4. Item. They complain that the Bailiff taketh this liberty, that when a matter hath passed the opinions of the Jurats, if they please him not, he will argue upon the said opinions, and labour by all means possible to get them changed, and persuade the said Jurats to his purpose; which if he be not able to do, the said Bailiff will sometimes break up the Court and keep the sentence unpronounced, whereby much injustice is wrought. Their humble suit is for remedy,—that the Bailiff, after the parties or their advocates have pleaded a cause, do but summarily propound unto the Jurats the substance of the plea in the presence of the parties, and then, either in the presence or absence of the said parties as to the Court shall seem best, take by order the Jurat's opinion, from one to the other; and according to the plurality, to pronounce sentence immediately; or else, if the cause rest it doubtful or the greater number of opinions is manifestly repugnant to the law, that the said Bailiff show the points in doubt or of repugnancy, the which be presently noted by the Clerk, and, within se'nnight or fortnight at the most, by a sufficient number of Jurats be resolved, and, according to the plurality of opinions, sentence be pronounced by the said Bailiff, without any further delay. Against the Bailiff for want of justice.

"For so much as we are credibly informed by the Bailiff and Jurats, in their answer which we have received in writing, that the parties who made this complaint intended and meant the same against Lewes Devick, deceased, late Bailiff: and for that all the Jurats, whom we ought to credit herein (before any private person), do attest and affirm that they never found such a fault in the now Bailiff, we think not fit, in any sort, to censure him therefore. Yet, because we think it probable that such some abuse, to the grievance of His Majesty's poor subjects and to the impeaching of common justice, may be offered hereafter, we do order that, after any cause hath been duly and orderly pleaded by the procurators and advocates, or otherwise, if the Bailiff and Jurats please, they also may argue the same, either privately or publicly as to them shall seem best; but when the cause is once pleaded and argued, all necessary delations and formalities by their style of proceeding requisite and anciently accustomed being past, so that the cause is ready to be sentenced, and the Bailiff to that end propoundeth the same to the Jurats, and thereupon receiveth their several voices and opinions in open Court, he shall not, from that time, delay to pronounce and give the sentence, above forty days at the most; and then, plainly, fairly and quietly, without gainsaying or opposing himself against any Jurat's opinion, he shall give and pronounce the said sentence for him on whose part the greatest number of their voices concurred and were openly delivered; and as we think it meet that the Jurats should not interrupt one another whilst they are delivering of their opinions, so we require that neither they nor any of them nor any other person whomsoever presume to interrupt the Bailiff, or to offer any interposition of speech unto him, whilst that he is giving and pronouncing of the said sentence or after the same, upon pain of such an amende or a pecuniary mulct to be inflicted and levied upon him that offereth the same, as to the more part of the Jurats shall seem good, saving unto all parties the benefit of appealing so far forth as the laws, orders, and customs of the Isle do or shall permit."

I will observe, as connected with this, that the Bailiff is not the Bailiff of the Royal Court, but he is the Bailiff of the Island. He is the officer of the Crown; and, as an incident to his office, he is the President of the Court, pretty nearly the same as in a county of England the Sheriff's right of presidency in the County Court is incidental to his office of Sheriff. I would call the attention of the Commissioners to an Order in Council of the 21st of November, 1673, which has reference to the office of Bailiff, and to the office of Jurats.

5324. At the Court at Whitehall, the 21st of November, 1673.

Present—The King's Most Excellent Majesty, His Highness Prince Rupert, Lord Keeper, Lord Treasurer, Lord Privy Seal, Duke of Buckingham, Duke of Monmouth, Earl of Ogle, Earl of Northampton, Earl of Bath, Earl of Carlisle, Earl of Craven, Earl of Carbery, Viscount Faucon berg, Lord Bishop of London, Lord Maynard, Lord Newport, Mr. Vice Chamberlain, Mr. Secretary Coventry, Mr. Chancellor of the Duchy, Master of the Ordnance, Mr. Seymour.

Whereas Amice Andros, Esq., Bayliff of His Majesty's Island of Guernsey, did y^e^ 7th of this instant November, humbly offer to His Mat^y^ in Councill severall proposals for regulating his Mat^ys^ Court Royall of the said Island in some particulars, and for the good and quiet of His Mat^ys^ subjects there, which being then referred to the consideration of the Lords Comittees of this Board for the affaires of Guernsey, their Lo^ps^, accordingly, considered and amended the same in some particulars, and did this day report to His Ma^ty^ in Council y^e^ ensuing proposals, viz.:

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 7th, 1846.

1. That the Jurats and other Court officers, in their turns, attend the Bayliff, or his Lieutenant in his absence, in their chambers and from thence to the Bench; and that they doe not depart thence w^th^out leave; and that they bear due respect to him as representing His Mat^ys^ person, and being his chief Minister of Justice there, but especially in the Court, or executing his office. The offender to be suspended untill he has excused himself for it before the Court, if he be a Jurat or officer. If otherwise, to be imprisoned till he hath asked pardon and paid the fine that shal bee laid upon him according to y^e^ nature of y^e^ offence.

2. That no Jurat pleador give councill in any cause but his owne: and, if he presume to doe it, that he loose his vote for the time. Neverthelesse, if a Jurat be not satisfied concerning any point belonging to the cause in hand, and shall desire to be better informed therein, to the end he may give right judgement in it, the Judge shall cause him to receive satisfaction.

3. That the Jurats deliver their opinions, not arbitrarily, but according to the lawes and custome of the Island as near as may be.

4. That none retain more than one advocate to plead or speak in a cause; and that neither the partys nor advocates interrupt one another in pleading: but that the plaintiff first propose his demand, silence being kept in the meanwhile, then the defendant make his answer in like manner, and so forward till the other replies and duplies, if need be; he that breaks this order, if he be an advocate, to be fined at the discretion of the Judge for the first time, to be suspended for a month for the second time, and to be deposed for the third time; if a private person, to be fined and punished as the cause shall require.

5. That no Jurat or Jurats presume to administer an oath, except he or they be authorized to do it, under the penalty of suspension for three months, if for a small matter, or to incur a premunire to be judged by His Mat^y^ and Council if the cause be of greater concern.

6. That upon the election of Jurats whosoever shall endeavour by bribes, feasting, drinking, promises, threats or other indirect means to corrupt or win any of the electors, if a pretender to be chosen, he shall forfeit his right to the said election; if any of the electors, shall forfeit his vote and be fined for every such attempt ten livres tournois. If any other, to be fined ten livres for every such attempt, and farther censured as the cause shall require, the said fines to be applied to pious and charitable uses.

Which said proposals His Majesty was pleased to confirm and approve of in every particular, and did order that they be transmitted to the said Island of Guernsey to be put in due execution, and from thenceforward punctually observed by all whom it may concern.

(Signed) JOHN NICHOLLAS.

5325. The Procureur. The Bailiff's power to suspend a judgment for forty days has been repeatedly acted upon in civil matters; but I know no case in which it has been done in criminal matters.

5326. The Contrôle. Both in Terrien and in the Regulations of the Commissioners, the power is only referred to in connexion with civil causes.

5327. (To the Procureur). With respect to proceedings for penalties for the infringement of Ordonnances, or Acts of Parliament, you say, in your answer, they are entered either by both or by one of the Queen's law officers?—Yes; all actions for penalties for the infringement of Acts of Parliament, or Ordonnances, are entered either by the Queen's law officers or by one of them, or by an informer to whom one of the Crown officers is adjoined.

5328. There is no intervention of a constable?—None. He may be the informer, of course.

5329. Has the Court the power to refuse such an accusation?—No; that accusation is entered without giving any notice of it at all to the Court.

5330. Is it brought before the Cour en Corps?—Yes; but by an Order in Council of December, 1844, if the penalty does not exceed thirty livres, it may be brought before the Cour Ordinaire.

5331. Will you state what takes place under those proceedings till you bring them to the same position as other cases?—The proceedings are in this mode. The first proceeding is a summons, signed by the Crown lawyers, or usually signed by that Crown lawyer who acts. The summons is sent to the person who has infringed the Ordonnance, or the Act of Parliament, to see himself adjudged to the payment of so much, being the amount of the penalty, by such a clause of an Act of Parliament, or such an article of an Ordonnance.

5332. How many days does the summons run?—That summons ought, strictly speaking, to be served on the Thursday; but in practice it is sometimes only served on the Friday.

5333. For the Saturday?—Yes. Then, if the party appears, the witnesses are ordered. There is an acte of Court passed ordering the witnesses; or, if there be an acknowledgment by the party accused, he may be amerced; or, if there be any error in the manner in which the summons is drawn up, the party pursuing may be silenced.

5334. Assuming the penalty is under thirty livres, so that it could come before the Cour du Quartier, are the proceedings the same?—Yes, precisely; except that, under thirty livres, by a new Order in Council, the witnesses may be had the first day.

5335. Under thirty livres the case would be treated summarily?—Yes.

5336. If above thirty livres, the witnesses are summoned for a future day?—If it is above thirty livres, the defendant may plead before the witnesses are ordered; he may plead that the action is badly entered. In short, he may plead any estoppel that he pleases against the action; and, if the Court are of opinion that the action should go on, they may order the witnesses; or, in those cases where the defendant may acknowledge having infringed the Ordonnance or Act of Parliament, they may condemn him. If witnesses are ordered, the cause comes on on a future day; the witnesses are heard vivâ voce; and the judgment is given.

5337. Like a procés ordinaire?—Yes, precisely.

5338. Are the arrangements as to hearing the prisoner's counsel and the examination and cross-examination of the witnesses the same?—Yes. The counsel of the person who is actioned speaks first. The witnesses of the prosecutor are first examined, and then the witnesses of the defendant. Then the defendant's counsel speaks, and is replied to by the Crown lawyers; and judgment is given.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 7th, 1846.

5339. In those cases, do the Crown officers consider themselves as strictly counsel for all parties, as they do in ordinary criminal cases?—I should be loth to say that they do; I should say, not so much so. There they act more like advocates.

5340. They represent one party?—Yes, certainly they do. Perhaps I ought to make this remark. When there is an informer, they certainly act more as they would in a civil case; they consider the informer as their client. In case there was no informer, they would probably also consider the Crown their client.

5341. The informer has an interest in the penalty, has not he?—Yes.

5342. In the great majority of instances is there an informer?—Yes. Perhaps I ought to add that, in several cases in which the informer's name does not appear, there is an informer: but, by the law of Terrien, if the defendant gains his cause, he has a right to insist upon the Crown lawyers naming the informer or paying the costs.

5343. That is in order that he may go for costs against the informer?—Yes.

5344. The passage in Terrien, to which you point, would rather look as if it had reference to all criminal cases?—Yes. Originally there was in all cases, even for the highest crimes, or at least there might be, a partie civile. The Procureur du Roi, as you will find in Terrien, never pays costs.

5345. With respect to the fines, are they generally to the Crown?—Not always. Usually, indeed I may say always, there is a proportion to the Crown and a proportion to the informer; and, formerly, there was a proportion given to the poor of the parish.

5346. Do you recollect any instance of a fine, imposed simply as a punishment by the Court, in which it did not all go to the Crown?—Yes; there was Captain Burdett's case. In that case, and probably in others, the fines have not been all given to the Crown: but in that case, if I recollect right, a proportion of the fine was given to the States.

5347. Mr. De Courcy. That was in 1806.

5348. (To the Procureur). What was the amount of the fine?—One hundred pounds: fifty pounds was given to the Crown and fifty to the States. In that case, if I recollect right, though I only speak from memory, the gentleman to whom the fine was awarded was my uncle; he was Lieutenant Bailiff of this Court.

5349. What was the accusation?—He was Lieutenant Bailiff; and he had been grossly insulted by Captain Burdett.

5350. It was not a case en adjonction?—No. I rather think that, in that case, the fine was altogether remitted to Captain Burdett finally; that is, the Crown, or the then Governor, remitted his proportion; and I should suppose that the States remitted their's.

5351. Is it legal so to divide the fine?—I think in the Queen's Court any fine for any offence ought to go to the Crown. If I gave conclusions for a fine, au criminel, naturally I should give it in favour of the Crown.

5352. Do you think you have the power to give it in any other way?—I should doubt it.

5353. Mr. Le Retilley. All fines must certainly go to the Crown.

5354. (To the Procureur). You think, in the case of a fine for a criminal offence, the Court would have no power to appropriate it except to the Queen?—Certainly.

5355. In the case of an Ordonnance, or an Act of Parliament, it would be stated where the fine was to go?—Certainly.

5356. Something has been said about the Enquête as a mode of criminal proceeding; will you explain that?—We have two enquêtes; I would distinguish them by the grande enquête, and petite enquête. The grande enquête is this. When a crime has been committed and the perpetrator is unknown, the Court has a right to hold an enquête. Sometimes there is an acte of Court made, on the application of the Crown officers; and sometimes there is none. Upon that, orders are given; and all those who are supposed, directly or indirectly, to know something about it, are brought forward before the Court, and are obliged to state what they know.

5357. Does this take place whether the Crown officers have applied or not?—There is always permission given by the Court, either by an acte or verbally, to hold an enquête.

5358. Are the Crown officers made parties?—I cannot say they are made parties legally: they are informed of it.

5359. If we understand you, a grande enquête may take place, either by a formal acte of Court permitting the officers of the Crown to have the enquête, or it may take place by the Court setting itself in motion, only giving information to the officers?—The constable and the officers may bring witnesses before the Court at once, and request the Court to hold an enquête; or, if the Court know anything about the crime committed, an enquête may be held to discover who committed the crime.

5360. The Bailiff. That which the Commissioners have taken as the origin of the proceeding is the result. The matter having been gone into to ascertain whether anything can be found out, the Court, thinking there is ground of accusation against some one, permits the inquiry.

5361. The Procureur. The mode of proceeding will be best shown by an example. A ship was lost near this Island; there was a vast deal of cochineal and other very valuable goods on board. A great quantity floated off; and a great deal was stolen. It was known that cochineal had been stolen, and many other things; but the authors of those robberies were not known. An enquête was held; and, I suppose, probably some forty or fifty persons were examined, in order to find out those who had anything to do with this robbery. This is the grande enquête.

5362. What was done there?—I believe, in that case, the Crown lawyers, at least those who conducted the inquiry, were unfortunate; and they could not obtain sufficient evidence against any one person to try him.

5363. What is the first step taken in point of form? Is it by application to the Court?

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 7th, 1846.

Does the Procureur make a formal demand to the Court for an enquête?—He does in case a complaint is made to him: but sometimes the complaint may have been made to the Bailiff; and then the Bailiff mentions it; and, after the examination of a few witnesses, an acte of Court for the enquête is given to the Crown lawyers. It is then said to be octroyée by the Court.

5364. The enquête is always granted upon some evidence of a crime having been committed?—Yes.

5365. The first step is evidence of the fact of the crime being committed. That being established, is an application made by the Crown officers for an enquête?—That is the usual mode.

5366. It is not completely in motion till the Crown officers have got the permission for an enquête?—Certainly not.

5367. Is the evidence received before the Cour du Quartier, or before the Cour en Corps?—It is usually received before the Cour du Quartier; but in cases of great importance a greater number of magistrates attend. Afterwards, the constables are directed to bring all such persons before the Court as they may suppose likely to know something of the case; those witnesses are brought forward, and are called témoins d'enquête. Formerly the oath was different from that taken by the other witnesses; but now it is the same. At the same time they are told that they are not obliged to criminate themselves. The number of witnesses is unlimited. In one particular case I suppose we examined fifty.

5368. Is it not the case that, in all preliminary proceedings, you are not confined in your number of witnesses?—It is so.

5369. Who presides at the enquête?—The Bailiff or his Lieutenant.

5370. With Jurats?—Yes, with two or more Jurats.

5371. Is it au secret?—Yes.

5372. What is the result?—If by the grand enquête there appears proof against any particular individual, the constable has orders to bring forward that individual at a future day. On the day the individual is brought forward, a petite enquête takes place; that is to say, another examination of the witnesses, a certain number of whom are brought forward precisely as though there had been an accusation in the first place; but the second time the witnesses are only examined against that individual.

5373. So that the grande enquête does not forward the case a single stage, but only adds a preliminary step?—Yes; the grande enquête is for the mere purpose of discovering those who may have been guilty of an offence.

5374. The Bailiff. It partakes of the nature of a Coroner's inquest.

5375. An inquiry was had as to an alleged conspiracy against the Lieutenant Governor; was that in the nature of an enquête?—Yes; that was a proceeding by grande enquête.

5376. (To the Procureur.) At the conclusion of the evidence before the enquête, does the Procureur or the other Crown officer make any conclusions pointing the evidence of guilt against a particular individual?—Not at the grande enquête. Neither at the one or the other have they anything strictly to do or to say. Formerly they were not present: now they are present and give their opinion; but they do not draw their conclusions either at the grande enquête or petite enquête.

5377. There is no address made to the Court, saying "the result of this evidence is that it tends to point out A. B. as the person who has committed the crime?"—In private, when the Court consults the Crown lawyers, they give their opinion, just as they do when a person is committed; but, when a person is committed, they are so little supposed to be present, that they are not mentioned in the acte. This appears from Terrien Lib. xii. chap. xxxii.

Des décrets des informations, tant de prinse de corps qu' adiournement personnel & autres prouisions. François, 1539.

Sitost que la plainte d'aucuns crimes, excez et malefices aura esté faite, ou que les Juges en auront esté advertis, ils en informeront bien & diligemment: pour, incõtinent après l'information faite, cõmuniquer à nostre Procureur, et veues ses conclusions (qu'il sera tenu promptemẽt mettre au bas desdites informations, sans aucun salaire en prendre) estre decerné par le Juge telle provision de Justice qu'il verra estre à faire selon l'exigence du cas.

5378. The Bailiff. In point of fact they give their opinions on points of law: but, in the strict sense of the word, they do not give their conclusions.

5379. (To the Bailiff.) The conclusions, in formal and strict sense, never take place except upon the trial?—No; but the habit has grown up here of having the assistance of the Crown officers.

5380. (To the Procureur.) What is the particular form of the decision of the Court in the grande enquête?—I rather apprehend that, generally speaking, when the grande enquête is held, there is no judgment given, because it would be necessary to point out the person who is supposed to be guilty.

5381. Is not that the object of the grande enquête, to discover the particular person?—Yes. But I do not, at this moment, recollect any old decision in which, after l'octroy had been given, a judgment of the Court has been given authorizing any particular person to be prosecuted. If any particular person is pointed out, orders are given to the constable to bring him forward on a particular occasion. That will be done verbally, not by means of an acte of the Court.

5382. The Contrôle. There is no record of the holding of the enquête. In most cases there is an acte of Court ordering an enquête to take place, which is recorded. The enquête takes place; but there is no record of that.

5383. The Procureur. If it is thought that there is no reason to put a man upon his trial, they make no acte. If, on the contrary, they put him on his trial, there is a committal.

5384. (To the Procureur.) Is the evidence preserved which is taken on the grande enquête?—On very important occasions it may have been preserved; but, generally speaking, it is not. I believe that at the Greffe there are one or two instances of it. I can cite one. In the grande enquête

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 7th, 1846.

you hear evidence, as it were, against the public in general, to see who is wrong. I suppose the reason why no acte is made is this, lest the perpetrator should find it out and run away.

5385. The Contrôle. The difference between a grande enquête and a petite enquête is that in a grande enquête there is no accuser, in the petite enquête there is.

5386. Mr. Carré. With respect to the form in which the record of the proceedings is kept, in ordinary cases no record whatever is kept of any part of the evidence; but some cases have occurred in which the Court has required the Greffier to take notes of the evidence, on account of the important subject before the Court; but they form no part of the proceedings. The case of conspiracy referred to was not a regular grande enquête.

The Contrôle. It started with the petite enquête in the first instance.

5387. (To the Procureur.) Is the petite enquête always preceded by the grande enquête?—No.

5388. How does the petite enquête arise?—The constable brings a man charged with a crime before the Court; you examine the witnesses to know whether there is any crime which has been committed by that person.

5389. The petite enquête, then, is in fact nothing more than the ordinary proceedings before the committal of a person?—Nothing more.

5390. Mr. De Courcy. On the 17th and 18th of October, 1826, I was brought up. I do not know whether it was a grande or petite enquête; however, I had the advantage of being shut up here down stairs, for two days, before the Bailiff and two Jurats. It is right that I should observe that all those gentlemen are gone to their long home, except three, that is Mr. Le Marchant, Sir William Collings, and Mr. Mesurier.

5391. (To Mr. De Courcy). You were before the Court, were not you?—Yes; I was sent for, in charge of the Sheriff and the constables, both. On the second day that illustrious personage who has so nobly presided in this Island for a number of years heard there was something extraordinary going on; and he sent for me by his Secretary. The Court did not appear to be so tenacious then of their privileges as they are now; and I was permitted to go to Government House with the Secretary, even without the constable or sheriff with me. During the whole of the proceedings I protested against the illegal act of keeping me there. I said I did not understand their language also, and begged to be permitted to have a person present who would inform me of what was going on. They put a variety of questions to me; but I would answer none till the doors were opened.

5392. Do you happen to know whether witnesses had been examined before you were there questioned?—They were, all in my presence. After I returned from the Government House, I must do them the justice to say they were a little more civil to me. They apprehended there was as high a power as their own. The Bailiff's brother laid hold on me and assaulted me, while I was in the custody of the two officers. On my return I reported the case to the Court; and you will find, by the proceedings of the day, that this person was bound over to keep the peace towards me.

5393. Did you call upon the Crown officers to prosecute?—Afterwards I did; and they would not prosecute; and they told me, moreover, that justice would not be done me if I did; that it would be useless. At the close of the proceedings, when I returned, they gave me to understand that I might go home; and I heard nothing more of it. I want to point out the absurdity of its being stated that an enquête consists of three or four. I would also wish to point out to the Commissioners the degree of relationship which subsists among the members of the Bench. Trial by jury would be very wholesome here.

5394. (To the Bailiff.) In the inquiry into the conspiracy the evidence was taken down in writing. Is it the custom that the evidence taken at the grande enquête au secret is read over to the witnesses?

5395. The Bailiff. As a question of general practice, the evidence is not taken down in writing at the grande enquête. If it is taken down in writing it is an exception; consequently, there is no rule respecting its being read over.

5396. Mr. Carré. If there is any doubt about what a witness has said, it is read over to him.

5397. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. I did ask to have my evidence in the conspiracy case read over to me; and it was refused: I was interrupted every two minutes.

5398. Mr. De Havilland. In that case, it was begun by a petite enquête. The Governor, having been invited here because it regarded his person and because it was a matter of great importance, was not satisfied after the examination of the eight or nine witnesses whose names had been given. He said there was much more to be inquired into. Upon that, the Bailiff said, "in that case, it is better to go into a grande enquête." The Court resolved then that every person who was named in the evidence of any witness should be called; and every one whose name seemed to be connected with it was called by the Court. I don't recollect any application made by Mr. Dobrée to have his evidence read to him.

5399. The Bailiff. With respect to the case of Burdett, it does not appear from the record of the case that there were any conclusions of the Crown Officers.

5400. The Greffier. It is never done in this form of action. They are in fact given in; but they are not mentioned in the record.

Henry Tupper, Esq., (Advocate) examined.

Henry Tupper, Esq., Advocate.

5401. The Commissioners have very different answers to the first question of the second series, with respect to the age at which a person is considered responsible to the criminal law. May it be taken that the law upon the subject is unsettled?—I take it that the law is quite unsettled upon that point: and it depends upon the discretion of the Court whether the individual brought before them evidences such discretion as would warrant a belief of his criminality.

GUERNSEY.

Henry Tupper, Esq., Advocate.

October 7th, 1846.

5402. The Bailiff. I believe that the unsettled state of the law is confined to the age before puberty.

5403. (To Mr. Tupper.) Is there any legal definition of what is meant by doli capax, or is the capability of committing crime a question for the Court to decide?—It rests in the discretion of the Court. If there were an absence of all idea of right and wrong, I should conceive the Court would not consider the person doli capax. But, after the age of twelve in the case of a female or of fourteen in that of a male, it would be assumed that they were responsible to the law. The counsel for the accused could not plead incapacity of age in that case at all. He might plead mental imbecility as an excuse; but want of age would not be considered an exemption.

5404. There is no distinction between a person of twelve or fourteen and a person of twenty? None.

5405. Under twelve or fourteen years, you consider the question of incapacity from defect of age to be open to the discretion of the Court?—Yes.

5406. The Bailiff. As far as I can judge, when children have been before the Court, I apprehend the presumption is against the criminality of a person under the age of puberty.

5407. The Procureur. In the year 1819, I recollect pleading for a child; and that was the first time, I believe, that the Court ever took it on themselves to declare that a boy under fourteen could be indicted for a crime. Before that, for the first twelve or fourteen years that I was at the bar, I always understood that, by the practice of the Court, no person under the age of puberty could be indicted.

5408. You think it was an established rule of law that no person under the age of fourteen, if a boy, and twelve, if a girl, could be convicted of a crime?—Yes; as the law was then understood.

5409. The Bailiff. I am not aware that any child under the age of puberty has been punished since I have been Bailiff.

5410. Mr. Le Retilley. The case in 1819 was that of a boy, tried au Grand Criminel for house-breaking: it was jointly with his guardian.

5411. The Procureur. I should require the father to give bail that his son should behave well, or send him out of the Island.

5412. Mr. Le Retilley. I know there was a defence set up that a child under the age of puberty could not be put en jugement; but the Court overruled the objection. The boy had been, I think, three or four times before the Court au Petit Criminel, and the Court took it that he was doli capax.

5413. How old was that boy?—Eleven years old: he was banished, I think.

5414. The Procureur. I recollect a case, where the father and the boy were both mentioned in the same acte; and in that case it was ordered, I think, that the father should send the child out of the Island. The date is 29th of June, 1771. In nine cases out of ten, those children rob under the orders of their parents.

5415. May the Commissioners take it that the law is unsettled in its present state upon that point?—Yes.

5416. The Bailiff. I think it would be very desirable to adopt the English rule of law. But it would be a great advantage if the Court of Police had the power of punishing children under the age of puberty for crimes which in other cases would be the subject of a mise en accusation.

Peter Jeremie, Esq. Advocate.

October 8th, 1846.

Thursday, 8th October, 1846.

Peter Jeremie, Esq., (Advocate) further examined.

5417. You wish to make some remarks to the Commissioners as to what was said yesterday on the sending of persons to the hospital, do you not?—Yes; I am directed by the treasurer of the hospital to give this explanation. The hospital is parish property under the superintendence of officers annually chosen by the ratepayers, namely, the treasurer and directors, and another officer, called le procureur des pauvres. When a pauper is brought by the constables, as a vagrant and drunkard, or without the means of subsistence, he is given into the custody of the hospital. The constable pays the institution for maintaining him; and, though it all comes out of the same purse, those gentlemen keep the accounts distinct from the accounts of the hospital.

5418. You mean that the hospital does not permit the Court here to trespass upon their funds?—Yes; or upon their authority. The place where they send paupers who misbehave themselves is distinct entirely from the poorhouse. It belongs to it, it is true; but it is a separate building.

5419. Mr. De Havilland. It is called the house of separation.

5420. Mr. Jeremie. It was built in 1832. In point of fact, it may be called a maison de discipline for those who misconduct themselves. The fact is that there is no house of correction here whatever. My reason for making this explanation is to show that there is no authority on the part of the Court to send there. It is only by sufferance. In the case of a pauper stranger who is taken to the hospital, the constable pays for his maintenance. If it is a pauper belonging to the parish, it falls within the general rule.

5421. Mr. Le Retilley. The Commissioners asked yesterday whether any of the magistrates upon the bench were in business. It did not occur to me yesterday to state that I am a shareholder in the Commercial Bank here.

5422. (To Mr. Le Marchant.) Are you in partnership in the Bank now?—No: my name is on the notes; but it will be taken off at the end of the year.

5423. How long have you ceased to be in the house?—About three months.

5424. Mr. Mansell. I should say that I ceased being in trade the moment I was elected magistrate.

5425. Do you mean that you have no profit derived from the business?—None at all.

5426. The gentleman who has the business now is your son, is not he?—Yes.

5427. He is not your agent or clerk?—No; not at all. I wish to say also that I am concerned in the South of England Steam Company: and I am also a shareholder in the railways.

5428. The Bailiff. My grandfather, who was a brewer, was constituted a prisoner, in the year 1764, for not taking the oath, after he was named Jurat. He raised several points. I collect from his letters that he raised the point of his being a brewer: but, I believe, he found the proceeding before the Privy Council expensive, and it was dropped. In his letter to his attorney he argues on the Ordonnance of the Commissioners of James the First, and insists on its literal interpretation.

5429. In the event of a Jurat retiring, are there not certain fees to be paid?

Mr. Carré. It must be done by the Privy Council; and there are certain expenses of proceeding before the Privy Council.

5430. If a Jurat wishes to be relieved from his duties, the only way is to obtain an order of Council, discharging him, which is in the nature of a law?—Yes.

5431. Probably that would be an expensive proceeding?—Yes. I think, in some cases, the States have caused the petition to be dismissed. There were two cases, lately, of Mr. Peter Dobrée and Mr. Le Pelley, whose application to the States for discharge, on account of ill-health, were considered and allowed; and the States paid the expenses of an application to the Council. I can hand in to the Commissioners the proceedings in those two cases.

5432. The same were delivered in and are as follows.

Monsieur, Beauregard, Guernsey, 3 Août, 1842.

De retour aujourd'hui en cette Ile j'ai l'honneur de vous informer que je me trouve contraint de resigner la charge de Juré Justicier de cette Cour Royale, à laquelle je fus sermenté le 14me Mai, 1831; ma santé ne me permettant pas d'en remplir plus longtems les devoirs. J'ai saisi l'occasion de mon séjour à Londres pour consulter un médecin des plus eminens de cette capitale; il attribue le dérangement de ma santé en entier à l'impurité de l'atmosphère auquel j'avais été exposé dans cette Cour, ainsi que vous le verrez par le contenu d'un certificate que je tiens sous sa main, dont je vous remets ci-jointe la copie. Messieurs S. Hoskins et De Beauvoir De Lisle avaient déjà exprimé la même opinion; et moimême j'en suis convaincu d'après ma propre expérience.

Sous ces circonstances, ma marche est clairement tracée; et je croirais manquer à mes concitoyens si j'hésitais un seul instant à la suivre. Je vous prie donc, Monsieur, de vouloir bien, aussitôt que vous le jugerez convenable, soumettre aux Etats la question qu'il leur plaise accorder ma démission, en conséquence de l'état de ma santé, qui ne me permet plus de remplir les devoirs de la charge, et s'addresser à Sa Majesté en Conseil afin d'obtenir l'approbation Royale.

Il me reste à vous prier de vouloir assurer tous les membres de la Cour et recevoir pour vonsmême la même assurance du regret que j'éprouve en me séparant de mes collégues avec lesquels j'ai toujours agi avec la meilleure intelligence, et des sentimens d'amitié que je conserverai toujours pour eux individuellement.

J'ai l'honneur d'etre, &c.,

A. D. D. L. Brock, Ecr., Président des Etats. P. B. Dobrée.

(Copy.)

Suffolk Place, Pall Mall, 24th June, 1842.

I have been consulted by Mr. Dobrée on account of his health, which is considerably impaired; and the cause, I have no doubt, is occasional confinement in a vitiated atmosphere. If the cause continues to be applied, I am confident that Mr. Dobrée's health will be irreparably injured, and perhaps his life endangered.

5433. Aux Etats de l'Ile de Guernsey tenus le 23 Août, 1842, devant Mons. le Baillif, présens, &c.

Les dits Etats ont délibéré et décidé,

Qu' ils sont d'avis, en acquiescent à la demande de Pierre Bonamy Dobrée, Ecuyer, de supplier très humblement Sa Majesté la Reine de vouloir bien lui accorder sa démission de la charge de Juré de la Cour Royale, et autoriser les Etats à procéder à une nouvelle élection.

Le 1 Décembre, 1835, devant Daniel de Lisle Brock, Ecuyer, Baillif, présens Jean Guille, Jean Hubert, William Collings, H. O. Carré, Pierre Bonamy Dobrée, Thomas William Gosselin, and Thomas Le Retilley, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Monsieur le Baillif ayant présenté à la Cour un ordre de sa Majesté en Conseil, en date du 25 Novembre, 1835, transmettant copie d'une pétition de Pierre Le Pelley, Ecr, suppliant Sa Majesté de lui accorder sa démission de la charge de Juré, la Cour, après avoir entendu lecture du dit ordre a ordonné qu'il sera enregîtré, et est Monsieur Le Baillif prié de faire assembler les Etats le plutôt possible pour les consulter sur la demande de Monsr Le Pelley.

At the Council Chamber, Whitehall, the 25th of Novr., 1835.

By the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee of Council for the affairs of Jersey and Guernsey.

His Majesty having been pleased, by his Order in Council of the 20th inst., to refer unto this Committee a petition of Peter Le Pelley, Esquire, of the Island of Guernsey, for permission to resign the office of Jurat of the Royal Court of that Island, it is ordered by their Lordships that the said petition (copy whereof is hereunto annexed) be, and it is hereby, referred to the Royal Court of the Island of Guernsey, for such observation as they may think fit to make thereon.

C. GREVILLE.

---

To the King's most Excellent Majesty in Council,

The humble petition of Peter Le Pelley, Esq., one of the Jurats of the Royal Court of the Island of Guernsey, Sheweth,—That your Petitioner was sworn a Jurat of the Royal Court of Guernsey on the 2nd of October, in the year 1820, and that he has since that period discharged the duties of that office. That your Petitioner, in consequence of the effect of its duties upon his mind which cannot reconcile itself to their irksomeness, considers himself incompetent to discharge them effectively. That your Petitioner resides, for a considerable portion of the year, in the Island of Sark, where he possesses property and pays local rates, besides being frequently absent from Guernsey in his occasional visits there; and, therefore, not living always in Guernsey, he considers he cannot in justice be called upon to fill a local situation which demands permanence of residence and constant attendance. That, moreover, your petitioner's health is materially affected by the confinement and irksome duties attendant on the office of Jurat, and that to a degree as of itself alone to be sufficient to establish a claim to his discharge. Your Petitioner therefore humbly prays that your Majesty will be pleased to permit him to resign the office of Jurat of the Royal Court of the Island of Guernsey. And your Petitioner, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

Guernsey, Oct. 25, 1835. (Signed) P. LE PELLEY.

Aux Etats de l'Ile de Guernsey tenus le 22 Décembre, 1835, devant Monsieur le Bailiff, présens, &c. Les dits Etats ont délibéré et décidé.

1°. Qu'ils sont d'avis de donner leur consentement à ce que la démission de sa charge de Juré demandée par Pierre Le Pelley Ecuyer lui soit accordée."

5434. Mr. Le Retilley. About the year 1776, certain disputes arose between the Jurats and the Bailiff. Several Jurats resigned their offices, and were afterwards re-elected by the States. They petitioned the Privy Council, before taking the oath of office, that they might be allowed to resign at any time through age or infirmity, without any other formality. The Order in Council amounts to a refusal.

5435. The Bailiff. There is a matter connected with what was mentioned yesterday respecting the notes of what takes place at enquêtes not being usually taken down. In looking into the old books, you will occasionally find that the notes of the evidence taken at enquêtes are recorded. I have here a copy of what took place at an enquête in 1593.

5436. (To the Bailiff.) Which kind of enquête is that?—I suppose, it would be a petite enquête. It is an inquiry which took place at the instance of the Governor, touching certain expressions which had been used towards him: and, though it is rather general in its expressions, there is only one particular case gone into. The judgment of the Court is not very formal; but, instead of dismissing the complaint, they seem to say that he was Not Guilty, which is rather a step in advance. The next entry, in the same book, contains the proceedings of an enquête in the nature of a levée de corps; and there the evidence also is set out. That also is not generally the case. I give those as two instances of the evidence on an enquête being taken down and preserved.

The following entries were read.

5437. "Le viii jour du dit moys et an (Aoust 1597), par devant le dit Bailly ꝑns à ce Nicollas M^r^tin Senior, André Henry, Jean Saumarez, Pierre Beauvoir, Pierre Careye, William le M^r^chand, Jean Effart, Nicollas Martin Junior, & George Guille, Jurez.

Sur ce que Mons^r^ le Gouverneur à informé la Justice avoir entendu de M^r^ Henry Smyth que certains propos ont esté tenus ꝑ aulcune des habitans de ceste Isle tendans à trahison contre sa Ma^té^ et l'Estat de ce Gouvernement, à l'instance des Officiers de sa d^e^ Ma^té^ ont esté faicts convenir ceulx cy après examinez.

M^r^ Henry Smyth, Escuier, a, ce jourd huy, rapporté en Justice, Que, un jour, Mons^r^ estant venu au presbytaire la première fois après son arrivée, là, après quelq^s^ discours tenus avec le dit Sieur Gouverneur concernant les amys qu'estimait avoir en ceste Ville, M^r^ Pierre Careye aurait ramenter son nepveu, Nicollas, n'avoir esté mis au nombre, luy estant bon serviteur et amy. Ce que recitant le dit Smyth à M^r^ William Devyck et à Eléazar le M^r^chand, iceluy le M^r^chand deist, que, sy il en sçavait aultant que luy, il ne l'estimerait tel, veu les propos qu' avait tenus. "Que si la Royne estait morte, il esperait estre ung des premiers qui tirerait le dit S^r^ Gouverneur hors du chasteau ꝑ les oreilles." Ce que le dit M^r^chand luy ayant ainsi déclaré, le dit Smyth, une aultre fois, luy ayant redemandé sy il voulait maintenir les propos qu'il luy avait tenus par devant, luy deist le voulloir faire, et que les tenoit de James Beauvoir qui luy avoit dict les tenir de la bouche du dit Careye.

Le dit Eléazar le M^r^chand ayant esté appellé ꝑo^r^ sçavoir sy il verifieroit dont tenoit les propos ainsy dicts au dit Smyth, dict Que, sur conférence que le dit Smyth tenoit du nombre d' amys que le dit Sieur Gouvernour tenoit avoir en ceste Ville, desquels M^r^ Pierre Careye deist tenir son nepveu pour ung, Que il estimait que le dit Sieur Gouverneur en avait cinq cents en ceste Isle plus, ou à tout les moins aultant bien, affectionnez à son service que le dit Careye. Et que il estait bien changé, sy il se trouvait tell, veu les propos queaultres fois il avait tenus du dit S^r^ Gouverneur. Sçavoir "Que sy il avenait que Sa Majesté décédast, il serait l'ung des premiers qui vouldroict tirer le dit S^r^ Gouverneur ꝑ la Quevichaille hors du Chasteau." Ainsy à entendu et tenait de James Beauvoir qui les luy avait dicts sur la Chausée, il y a viron deulx ans, lesquels disait luy avoir esté dicts de Nicollas Careye.

James Beauvoir, appellé ꝑ devant nous ꝑo^r^ sçavoir sy il avait tenus tels propos qu' Eléazar le M^r^chand dict tenir de luy, et que luy aurait dict les tenir de la bouche de Nicollas Careye. Avant que prester serment voullait sçavoir et congnoistre du dit Eléazar sy il voullait maintenir que luy aurait dict tenir tels propos de la bouche du dit Careye, ce que le dit Eléazar n'a voulu maintenir, encore qu'il l'eust dict au paravant.

Le dit James Beauvoir, enquis par son serment presté touchant ce que dessus en choses tendantes après ou viron, soit de Nicollas Careye ou aultres quelconques en toute ceste Isle, Dict que, aultres fois, il a ouy dire à Nicollas le Cornu, que De la Polle a ouy de Nicollas Careye quelques mauvais propos cõtre la personne de Mons$^{r}$ le Gouverneur.

Item qu'il a entendu de la bouche de Jean Faultrait que le dit Nicollas Careye, estant en sa maison transporté de vin, disait que la mort de Sa Ma$^{té}$ advenante (que Dieu ne vueille) que vollontiers Sire Thomas Leighton, Gouverneur, ne incqueroit pas ou serait long temps au Chasteau.

Jean Faultrait, enquis par son serment sur ce que devant, dict, qu'à jour passé, viron deulx ou trois ans (cõme il luy ꝑeult souvenir), Nicollas Careye le pria d'entrer en sa maison à trois ou quatre heures après midy, ou ayant bien beu, luy disait debvoir de l'argent aux enfans de sa fẽme, dont il luy faschoit n'avoir le moyen de payer, mais qu' il luy estait deub d'aultres debtes qui de ceste cy et d'aultres. Et que la cãe de son mall provenait de ce que le Gouverneur l'empeschoit de faire valloir son bien, toutes fois, avenant la mort de sa Ma$_{té}$ (que Dieu sauve), vollontiers qu'il serait ou gouvernerait toujours à son chasteau.

Le ix$^{e}$ jour du dit moys et an, par devant le dit Bailly (Louys Devyck), ꝑnṡ à ce Nicollas M$^{r}$tin Senior, Jean Saumarez, Pierre Beauvoir, Pierre Careye, Jean Effart, et Nicollas M$^{r}$tin Junior, Jurez.

Enqueste passée, ce jourdhuy, pour cognoistre des propos allégués par Eléazar le M$^{r}$chand et déclarés en Justice; Nicollas le Cornu par son serment presté rapporte que, un jour luy estant avec Nicollas Careye et M$^{r}$ Gregory De la Polle, il ouyt le dit Careye (lequel estait ung peu transporté de vin) tenir des propos de mescontentement du dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur, il y a viron sept ans passés, lesquels ne peult rememorizer. M$^{r}$ Guillaume Beauvoir ꝑ son serment presté dict et rapporte Que, viron le cõmencement du moys de Juing, luy estant au Chasteau où Nicollas Careye estait Prisonnier po$^{r}$ lors, il ouyt dire à M$^{r}$ Pierre Careye au dit Chasteau tels propos "Quel malheur est-ce Icy." Que il avait ouy ung bruict, que le dit Nicollas Careye debvoit avoir dict "Que, sy Sa Majesté estait décédée, il serait ung des premiers qui tirerait le dit Sieur Gouverneur hors de son Gouvernement du Chasteau," chose qui estait pour beaucoup animer le dit Sieur sy il en estait embouché. Lequel M$^{r}$ Pierre Careye voulait que son dit nepveu allast s'en purger vers le dit Sieur tout à l'heure.

Thomas Effart, ꝑ son serment presté, dict et rapporte que lorsque Nicollas Careye estait en prison que Eléazar le M$^{r}$chand vint à luy, et luy deist "Advertissez votre frère qu'il se donne garde," car M$^{r}$ Smyth luy avait dict que tels propos couroyent. Lesquels le dit Eléazar luy deist que luy même tenait de James Beauvoir, les luy ayants dicts sur la Chausée, lequel Effart en advertit le dit Careye.

Jean Le M$^{r}$chand, ꝑ son sermente presté, dict et rapporte que il a ouy dire à Nicollas Careye, cõme mallcontent, qu'il vouldroict estre hors de ce pays et n'y avoir ꝑied de terre à cãe qu' il y avait beaucoup d'Ennemys.

Le xxvii jour du moys d'Aoust, 1597, par devant Louys Devyck, Bailly, ꝑṛs à ce Nicollas M$^{r}$tin Senior, Guillaume Beauvoir, André Henry, Jean Andros, Jean Saumarez, Pierre Beauvoir, Pierre Careye, Jean Effart, Nicollas M$^{r}$tin Junior, George Guille et Lyenard Blondell, Jurez.

Sur ce que M$^{r}$ le Gouverneur, le viii jour du moys ꝑnt, avait informé la Justice qu'il avait entendu de M$^{r}$ Henry Smyth que Eléazar le Marchand, à jours passés, luy aurait dict avoir ouy de James Beauvoir que Nicollas Careye avait dict au dit Beauvoir, viron deulx ans passey, que, la mort de sa Ma$^{té}$ advenante, que il serait ung des premiers qui tirerait le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur hors de son Chasteau ꝑ les oreilles. Information et deube examination par toutes voyes (ꝑo$^{r}$ cercher et cognoistre la vérité de ce) faictes à l'instance des officiers de Sa Ma$^{té}$, et icelles deubement et meurement considérées, il est regardé ꝑ l'oppinion des dits Jurés que le dit Careye n'est trouvé conveincu n'y atteinct de la d$^{e}$ délation faicte à l'encontre de luy.

Le xix$^{e}$ Jour du moys d'Aoust l'an Mille ciuq cent nonante sept, ꝑ devant Louys Devick, Bailly; ꝑnṡ à ce, Nicollas Martin Senior, Guillaume Beauvoir, André Henry, Jean Andros, Jean Saumarez, Pierre Beauvoir, Jean Effart, Nicollas Martin Junior, & George Guille, Jurez.

Enqueste à ce jourd'huy esté faicte, à l'instance des Officiers de sa Ma$^{té}$, pour sçavoir et congnoistre, ꝑ quel moyen, M$^{r}$ Walter S$^{t}$ Johns, Escuier, et Isaac Daubeney, son Pédagogue, sont morts, lesquels ont esté trouvez noyés dans la mer en Erme, le Jeudy, xviij$^{e}$ Jour du dit moys.

M$^{r}$ Pierre Careye, ung des Jurez de la Co$^{rt}$ Royalle, ꝑ son serment presté, dict et rapporte, Que le Jeudy, xviij$^{e}$ jour d'Aoust, 1597, Monsieur le Gouverneur l'ayant faict aller avec luy en l'isle d'Erme pour chasser le Dayn, accompagnez de M$^{r}$ Thomas Leighton, son fils, M$^{r}$ Walter S$^{t}$ Johns, Pierre Careye, fils du dit déposant, et Samuell Cartewright, avec leur M$^{re}$ d'Escolle, M$^{r}$ Isaac Daubeney, et plusieurs des Serviteurs domestiques du dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur. Auquel lieu estans arrivez, Le dit S$^{r}$ avec le dit Careye et plusieurs de ses Serviteurs s'en allèrent à la chasse et laissérent le dit Daubeney avec les enfants, lequel demeura toute la matinée avec eulx, leur faisant dire leurs leçons, suyvant l'exercise qu' ils avoyent accoustumé, jusques à neuf heures du matin. Après quoy, M$^{r}$ Nicollas Blake, leur M$^{re}$ de Musique, les feist chanter jusques à dix heures. Et ce faict, le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur feist faire les prières au dit Daubeney. Et tost après alla disner accompagné des dits Enfans, du dit déposant, de M$^{r}$ Daubeney, du Portier de son Chasteau, de Guillaume le Prevost et de Nicollas le Gros, où, estans encore à table, sur la fin du disner, ses enfans luy feirent requeste qu'il luy ꝑleust leur donner congé de leur aller baigner. Ce que ꝑ deulx ou trois fois le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur leur refusa. Et mesme leur pédagogue, M$^{r}$ Daubeney, leur deist qu' il ne faisait point bon y aller, d'aultant que le Solleill ne donnait point de chaleur. Toutefois, importunans de rechef le dit S$^{r}$ leur pere, il leur donna congé ꝑ condition que quelques gens de jugement allasent avec eulx. Sur quoy, tost après, les dits quatre enfans, accompagnez de leur dit M$^{re}$, M$^{r}$ Daubeney, de Jean Andros, et de Jean Farell, le barbier du dit S$^{r}$ (auxquels il avait donné charge de ne les laisser aller trop avant en mer) ꝑtirent vers la mer. Et q̃ viron une heure après, le dit déposant, estant en compagnie de M$^{r}$ Blake et de Roger Baker, veit venir le dit Jean Andros avec M$^{r}$ Thomas Leighton, lesquels venus à eulx leur deisrent q̃ M$^{r}$ Daubeney estait noyé. Sur ce, à mesme instant, le dit déposant s'en alla vers le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur, lequel estait endormy soubs sa tente, (voire d'ung pesant dormir) d'aultant que s'estoit levé à une heure après minuit, et l'ayant tiré deulx ou trois fois ꝑ son manteau avant q̃ s'esveillant, le pria luy pardonner de ce qu'esveilloit Sa Seignurie, car c'estait pour l'advertir que M$^{r}$ Daubeney estoit noyé (noyé, deist il, hélas); et, cõmenceant à se lever, son dit fils et Jean Andros luy deisrent que M$^{r}$ Walter S$^{t}$ Johns estoit aussy noyé avec luy; où, à l'heuremesme, le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur redoubla ses regrets et doulleurs avec ung tel espouvantement & ennuy qu'il demeura sur la place to$^{t}$ etonné & esperdu. Et q̃ sur ce le dit déposant leur demanda où estoyent les corps. Et ils luy respondirent qu'estoyent en la mer, laquelle les emportait. Parquoy le dit déposant courut to$^{t}$ à l'heure, en la plus grande dilligence qu'il peult, vers le lieu, accompagné de quatre des serviteurs du dit S$^{r}$, où estans arrivez, le dit déposant appella à luy Henry de Calleys et son esquippage qui estoyent là près, dans son batteau, lesquels ayderent à sauver les corps et le meisrent dans leur batteau, dans lequel le dit déposant s'embarqua avec aultres des serviteurs du dit S$^{r}$. Et apportèrent les dits Corps morts au Chasteau Cornet, le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur les accõpaignant dans sa challoppe. M$^{r}$ William Taylor, gentilhõme, Portier du dit Chasteau Cornet, ꝑ son serment presté dict & rapporte que, hier matin, xviij$^{e}$ jour d'Aoust, 1597, viron deulx où trois heures devant le jour, s'estant levé ꝑo$^{r}$ advertir le S$^{r}$ Gouverneur de l'heure qu'il pouvoit estre, suivant la charge que le dit S$^{r}$ luy avoit donnée de l'appeller de grand matin pour aller en Erme à la Chasse; auquel S$^{r}$ ayant parlé, luy demanda sy les enfans yroyent avec luy & sy les esveilleroit, lequel respondit que non. Et que sy on ne les avait desjà appellez, il donnast charge que personne ne les appellast; neantmoins, le dit déposant passant par devant la chambre des dits Enfans, cõme il alloit envoyer le batteau en Ville ꝑo$^{r}$ querir M$^{r}$ Careye & des Mariniers pour aller avec le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur, il trouva M$^{r}$ Walter S$^{t}$ Johns levé à l'huys de sa chambre en sa chemise, lequel luy demanda sy il estoit pas heure d'aller en Erme, lequel déposant luy feist responce que non, & qu'ils n'yroyent point, ꝑ ce que n'estoit le plaisir du Gouverneur quils y allassent; lequel replica au dit déposant que le dit S$^{r}$ luy avoit dict, le soir, que luy et son frère Thomas yroyent àvecq luy. Sur quoy ils s'accoustrèrent & vestirent leurs vestemens, de quoy le dit déposant ayant adverty le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur et que desyroyent aller avec sa Seignurie, leur M$^{re}$ d'Escolle, étant là près, deist au dit S$^{r}$ que sy c'estoit son plaisir qu'ils y allassent, il yroit aussy avec eulx & porteroit leur lyvres pour les y faire estudier. Et que, sur ce, le dit S$^{r}$, considerant que son Cuisinier estoit malade au lict et quil falloit que le garson de la Cuisine allast avec luy, parquoy il n'y auroit qui leur accoustrast à disner, leur permeist d'aller avec luy. Sy qu'estans arrivez en Erme de grand matin, leur dit M$^{re}$ les feist vacquer à leurs estudes jusques à viron neuf heures. Et puis après, leur M$^{re}$ de Musique, M$^{r}$ Blake, les feist chanter la musicq̃ jusques à dix heures, après ce que le dit Gouverneur feist faire les prières à M$^{r}$ Daubeney, quoy faict, se meist à disner accompagné cõme rapporte M$^{r}$ Careye, où, sur la fin du disner, M$^{r}$ Thomas Leighton demanda congé à son père d'aller luy et son frère, M$^{r}$ Walter & les aultres leur baigner en la mer. Ce que le dit S$^{r}$ Gouverneur ne leur voulut octroyer à l'heure à leur première demande, mais, insistans encores ꝑ deulx où trois fois de la prier, leur accorda qu'il sy allasent, à la charge qu'il yroit quelques gens discrets avec eulx pour les gouverner, et afin qu'ils n'allasent trop avant en l'eau. Et furent ordoñez M$^{r}$ Daubeney, leur M$^{re}$, Jean Andros, et Jean Farell, lesquels ꝑties le dit déposant dict ne les avoir reveus jusques à ce que les veis dans le batteau, après qu'ils eurent esté levé hors de la mer.

M$^{r}$ Nichollas Blake rapporte cõme le dit Taylor, et aussy qu'il rencontra M$^{r}$ Thomas Leighton et deulx ou trois aultres qui s'en venoyent pleurants, et disans que son frère, M$^{r}$ Walter St Johns, estoit noyé & son M$^{re}$ d'Escolle, M$^{r}$ Daubeney.

} rapportent tous cõme le dit Taylor.

Jean Andros rapporte cõme le dit Taylor, et qu'après disner Mr. Walter St. Johns le vint appeller pour aller avec luy se baigner, et avec les aultres; lequel se meist en chemin avec Mr. Daubeney et Jean Farell et les dits Enfans. Et, cõme ils alloyent en chemin, que le dit Mr. Walter, faisant plus de haste que les aultres, se desboutonna son pourpoint et le destacha, lequel bailla à Jean Farell à garder et ainsi s'en alla devant à l'Est d'Erme; et entra le premier en l'eau le dit Mr. Walter St. Johns; où incontinent aussi arrivèrent Mr. Thomas Leighton, Pierre Careye, et Samuell Cartewright, lesquels aussy entrèrent en l'eau; sçavoir, Le dit Mr. Thomas Leighton non plus profond qu'a my jambe et le dit St. Johns non plus profond que le genouill; ainsy le dit Mr. St. Johns deist "Je m'en vay nager vers mon frère;" et cõme il se baissa pour nager, la mer l'emporta sy soubdainement, que le dit Andros, qui estoit encores empesché à se deschausser, n'y peult donner remède; toutes fois courut, sy tost quil peult, à une pointe de rocher plus prochaine du dit St. Johns, où en chemin tomba et se bleça et feist grand mal en son pied, tellement que ne pouvant sy bien aller, Mr. Daubeny se despouilla et se jecta en l'eau et nageant fort bien vint au dit Mr. Walter St. Johns et luy deist quil montast sur son dos, ce que le dit St. Johns feist. Et incontinent, le dit Daubeney roulla en l'eau tellement que ne le pouvait veoir et ne se releva plus, Et le dit St. Johns cria au dit Andros quil vint luy ayder, sur quoy le dit déposant se jecta en la mer et incontinent fut intortillé de plises, tellement qu'il roulla à fonds et à peu près fut noyé, et à grand difficulté se peult sauver. Ce qui fut au moyen d'un rocher qu'il trouva en l'eau; ainsy furent les dits Daubeney et St. Johns noyez.

enfans se meisrent en l'eau ainsy qu'a desclaré le dit Jean Andros, et dict que veit Mr. Leighton, qui n'estoit en l'eau que jusqu'á my jambe, et le dit St. Johns non plus avant qu'au genouill; et cõme le dit St. Johns disoit qu'il nageroit vers son frère se meist bas, et la marée l'emporta hors tellement que le dit déposant se meist à aller après pour le querir, et où il n'avoit de l'eau qu'au genouill ne feist que deulx pas qu'il se trouva en grand profonds, et nagea après le dit St. Johns, mais ne le peult atteindre et eult beaucoup de peine à se sauver. Ce qu'il feist à grande difficulté au moyen d'un rocher qu'il gaigna où il se tint. Au reste rapporte cõme le dit Jean Andros.

Jean Bohyer dict qu', estant couru vèrs le lieu ou avoyent esté noyez, il se meist en l'eau jusques à viron cinq pieds de profonds, où il se lança la teste et espaulles dans l'eau et trouva Mr. Walter debout, lequel estoit entortillé dans la plisse, lequel il empoigna et à grand difficulté le tira à terre, où estoyent Mr. Careye.

Jean Jourdan & David Morrice qui veirent cõme il l'amena à terre; où le dit David luy vestit sa chemise & le feist Mr. Careye mectre dans ung batteau qui estoit là près, avec le corps de Mr. Daubeney; et ainsy furent apportez au Chasteau.

Jean Jourdan et David Morrice rapportent cõme l'avant dit Taylor, et qu'estoyent pñs, quand Jean Bohyer tira et leva le corps de Mr. Walter St. Johns à terre, lequel Mr. Careye feist mectre avec celuy de Mr. Daubeney dans ung batteau qui estoit là près; et ainsy furent apportez au Chasteau. Roger Baker, Owen Roberts, et Hewgh Lambert, rapportent cõme le dit Taylor.

Guillaume le Prevost, Nicollas le Gros, Jean Le Marivel, Jean Vauldin, Amos Le Poytevin et Aymes Mutell rapportent qu'ils estoyent tous six dans la challoppe du dit Sr. Gouverneur à Gethou, et que quand ils furent venus ils furent tous estonney des nouvelles qu'on leur en deist. Henry de Calleys, André Marche, Collas Mauger, Jean Herm, Hillaire Godefroy, Robin de Bertrand, Thomas Le Guignon, Michell Nicolle, Samuell des Paulx, et Isaac Roberts rapportent que, allants avec leur saffre pour saffrer amont, Mr. Pierre Careye les appella pour cercher les corps noyez, et quils s'en allèrent au lieu, où ils avoyent esté noyez, qui s'appelle les Mouillierres, où ils trouvèrent le corps de Mr. Daubeney sur une pierre endonthe sur le ventre, ses pieds pendans en l'eau d'ung bord de la pierre, et sa teste de l'autre, lequel ils tirèrent en leur batteau et luy revestirent sa chemise, et leur fut aussy baillé le corps de Mr. Walter St. Johns, lesquels ils portèrent auprès de la Challope du dit Sr. Gouverneur à la Roziere et de là les apportèrent au Chasteau.

5438. The Procureur. There is an enquête in the books of the Greffe concerning wool which is said to have been exported from Alderney, in which the evidence is preserved.

5439. How long ago is that?—Somewhere about the year 1730.

5440. To Mr. Jeremie. With regard to the question how far insanity renders a person irresponsible to criminal law. It would occur in two ways, would not it? A person might be insane at the time he was called on to be tried; and, in another case, a person might be insane when he committed the offence.—I do not know that there would be any distinction. If he were insane, either at the time he committed the offence or at the time he was brought up for judgment, I should suppose there would be no distinction.

5441. When you say brought up for judgment, do you mean brought up for trial?—Yes. I would beg to say that our mode of proceeding is so different from the proceedings in England that many expressions used by us might be used in a different sense from that in which they would be understood by the Commissioners. As a matter of course, if you bring up a man to answer to a charge who is insane, he cannot submit to his trial. He not being in possession of his faculties, you cannot try him.

5442. The Contrôle states, in his answer, that the Court would stay proceedings, if there were ground to suppose the accused had committed the act when he was of insane mind, in order to have that particular fact ascertained by evidence. Is that the mode of proceeding in your opinion?—I have never known an instance of that kind. If a man is brought up for trial and pleads insanity, the question of insanity is immediately entered into; and, whether he was of insane mind at the moment he pleaded or when the offence was committed, the result of the decision would be the same.

5443. You first try the question of insanity?—Decidedly; that is what we call here a prejudicial question.

5444. The Contrôle. Suppose, on the view of the man or otherwise, any thing appeared in the evidence before the Court to give them reason to suppose the man was insane, the criminal proceedings would be suspended for the purpose of testing that particular point.

5445. Mr. Jeremie. When I stated that I did not know of a case, I understood the Commissioners to ask for a case where, upon the preliminary proceedings, an individual had been accused of murder and the Court doubted whether he was of sane mind or not. I do know of a case where, a man being brought up to stand his trial, his advocate put in the plea of insanity, and the Court, finding he was so, as a matter of course acquitted him, but ordered him to be confined.

5446. (To Mr. Jeremie). Supposing the Court, upon the question coming on in the way you suggest, before going into the charge, find the man is insane; what then takes place?—I consider that they ought at once to acquit him, if they declare him insane.

5447. Suppose a man was tried and proved to have been of insane mind at the time of committing the offence, that would not be a stay of proceeding but an actual acquittal, would it not?—Yes. What I say is that, whether a man is found insane at the commencement of the action or when he takes his trial, the result would be the same.

5448. What is the entry made by the Court on that occasion?—The Court finding insanity would make an acte: and I conceive that the Court, as they do when anything extraordinary takes place both in civil and criminal questions, would motive their decision.

5449. The Court making an acte of this sort, what becomes of the person who is found by the Court to be insane?—I conceive, the only thing the Court has to do is to send him to a lunatic asylum. There has been a trial here, in the case of Chapman alias Melmoth, of which I will read the sentence. "La Cour, après avoir entendu les dépositions des témoins des officiers du Roi et celles des témoins justificatifs du dit Joseph James Chapman, aliàs Melmoth, prises à futur et redigées par écrit, est d'opinion que le dit prisonnier est coupable du meurtre de William Brown, mais qu'il était dans un état de démence lorsq'il a commis le dit crime. La Cour est de plus d'opinion, d'après le témoignage, que le dit prisonnier est depuis longtemps sujet à de fréquentes aliénations d'ésprit qui le rendent, comme l'expèrience ne l'a que trop malheureusement démontré, des plus dangereux à la societé. Partant la Cour juge qu'elle ne peut, vu le dit état de démence, porter d'autre jugement que celui qui ordonne que le dit Joseph James Chapman, aliàs Melmoth, ne pourra plus être mis en liberté dans cette Ile, qu' il y sera gardé en prison tout et aussi longtemps qu' il y restera et jusqu' à ce qu' il en soit autrement ordonné par la Cour."

GUERNSEY.

5450. That was a case in which a man was tried and found to be insane. The question the Commissioners were asking was whether there is any mode of proceeding, before trying the crime, to ascertain the man's insanity?—That, I should say, would take place upon the trial. A man is accused of crime; the lawyer puts in a plea that he is insane; the Court would order evidence upon that. They might try that as a prejudicial question: and, if they found that the man was insane, I conceive the only course would be to acquit him.

5451. Two objections may arise; one is an objection to trying him at all, the other to convicting him when he is tried?—Certainly. If a man is found insane, he is irresponsible to punishment, as the act is not his own; and I have always considered that it is a singular form to say that the man is guilty of murder, but that he was mad when he committed the crime. I do not know how a man can commit murder, if he is in that state of mind in which they find him to be. He cannot be guilty of murder and be insane too.

5452. The Commissioners understand there are two modes of proceeding; one in which it would be tried as a prejudicial question, the other in which it would be tried as a defence to to the accusation. What would be done if the Court found insanity in either case?—I should think the Court would acquit him.

5453. What would become of him?—I should say they would give him into the hands of his relatives or his guardian to take care of him.

5454. The Procureur. There are two modes of proceeding. Supposing a case in which insanity should appear before the trial, the mode in which we proceed is this. On the 11th of January, 1770, a girl, named Rachel de Cartaret, was brought up for having set fire to her master's house; and, it appearing that the girl was insane, "il est ordonné que le Prevôt la gardera en chambre ou autre lieu aux frais de ses parens." The second acte in that case was on the 3rd of February, 1770. On that day it was ordered that she should be visited by Messieurs de Sausmarez and Le Serre, surgeons, to ascertain the state of her mind, who should make their report to the Court in a fortnight: "ordonné que Rachel de Cartaret sera visitée par Messrs. de Sausmarez et La Serre, chirurgiens, qui feront leur rapport dans quinzième."

5455. (To the Procureur). The object of that probably was to see whether she was fit to be tried?—Yes. On the 3rd of March, 1770, "Vu rapport des chirurgiens et voisins on cessera toute poursuite."

5456. Would that be tantamount to an acquittal?—No; the proceedings would be stayed.

5457. If the Court had considered that she was insane at the time of the act, and not at the time of the trial, she would have been ordered to choose her counsel, would not she?—Yes.

5458. Upon it coming out that she was insane at the time of the act the order probably would have been different?—The law in Terrien, Lib. xii. chap. xxv. folio 496, Des forcenez, would then come into play; and there would be done that which was done in Chapman's case.

The passage was read as follows.

5459. La Coustume. "S'aucun est hors de sens, et il occit ou mehaigne un homme par sa forcenerie, il doit estre mis en prison, et estre soustenu du sien: ou l'en luy doit pourveoir des communes omosnes s'il n' a de quoy estre soustenu. S'aucun est en telle manière forcené, que l'en doyve douter de sa forcenerie, qu'il ne trouble le pays ou par feu, ou par aucune chose qui soit contraire au commun salut, il doit estre lié et gardé par ceux qui ont ses choses, qu'il ne mefface à nully. Et s'il n' a rien, tout le voisiné doit mettre conseil et aide du sien à refrener sa forcenerie."

5460. The Bailiff. The "communes omosnes" used then to stand in the place of the parish.

5461. (To the Contrôle.) You say in your answer that "Insanity may be made the ground of defence by the counsel of the accused, who must establish it, and that on his establishing it the party would be detained in prison during Her Majesty's pleasure." Is that the law?

5462. The Contrôle. Not exactly so. From the case of Chapman which has just been cited, it appears he would be detained in prison. I rather presume that in the case of a person having no friends or relations that would be done here.

5463. Do you think you have any power to imprison him till Her Majesty's pleasure is known?—Yes.

5464. The Queen might very well say: "I think such or such asylum would be a proper place for the man." According to Terrien that would be improper.

5465. The Bailiff. I think, in the case of Melmoth, he was ordered to be detained in prison until it should be otherwise ordered by the Court. A petition was presented afterwards, praying for permission for him to leave the Island for ever: and, upon that, the Court ordered that he should be given up to his relations.

5466. In strict law would not that be wrong?

Mr. Le Febvre (Greffier). There was an order from the Secretary of State in Melmoth's case; and a messenger was sent over to convey him to England. The Mise en Accusation in Melmoth's case is in the ordinary form on a charge of murder; and the sentence has been already read to the Commissioners. I will now read the subsequent proceedings.

Peter Jeremie, Esq., Advocate.

October 8th, 1846.

Le treizième Août, mil huit-cent trente-un, devant Daniel de Lisle Brock, Ecuyer, Baillif, présens &c. &c. &c.

En faisant droit sur la requête du Révérend John Chapman, père, et du Révérend James Chapman, oncle de Joseph James Chapman, prisonnier détenu dans la prison publique en conséquencee de la sentence de la Cour Royale du 28e Janvier, 1826, priant la Cour pour les raisons contenues dans leur dite requête de vouloir bien mettre le dit Joseph James Chapman en liberté à condition qu'il s'éloignerait pour toujours de cette Ile, et représentant à la Cour qu', étant impossible pour le dit père et le dit oncle de se présenter dans l'Isle pour prendre charge du dit Joseph James Chapman à cause de leurs infirmités, ils avaient autorisé Monsieur Pierre Martin, Député Prevôt du Roi, de le conduire à Southampton et là de le remettre à Monsieur Charles Cook dans lequel ils avaient toute confiance, qui le conduirait à ses dits parens: La Cour, après avoir examiné par serment François Pery Hutchesson, et Jean T. O'Brien, Ecuiers, médecins-chirurgiens, qui ont déclaré avoir visité et connu le dit Joseph James Chapman depuis quelque temps, l'avoir examiné ce jour, et qu'ils ne voyent aucun danger à ce qu'il soit mis en liberté; considérant que par l'acte de cette Cour du douze Mars dernier il avait déjà été permis à ses parens de le faire passer en Angleterre, vu que le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté avait signifié n'y mettre aucun empêchement; considérant de plus qu'il n'est pas en leur pouvoir de le faire entrer dans un asyle destiné à la garde des personnes dans un état d'aliénation mentale, puisqu'il faudrait un certificat directement contraire à la déclaration susdite des médecins-chirurgiens, la Cour, ouiës les conclusions des Officiers du Roi, a permis que le dit Joseph James Chapman serait remis en liberté, et sous les soins du dit Monsieur Pierre Martin qui l'accompagnera à Southampton, où il le remettra aux soins de Monsieur Charles Cook, le tout à condition et sur la défense au dit Joseph James Chapman de ne plus revenir en cette Ile, portée dans la sentence de cette Cour du 28e Janvier, 1826."

5467. Mr. Carré. When a person has killed another, the written law is that he should be put in prison. Sometimes it is ordered that he shall be put in prison so long as he is in the Island. So that the Court confine their application of the law to the limits of the Bailiwick.

5468. The Contrôle. There is another case in which the question of insanity was mooted before trial. It is the case of Champion charged with having attempted to assassinate Mademoiselle de Jersey. By the Act of 10th of March, 1826, the Court direct him to be shut up in the public prison "Jusqu' à autre ordre." That was before the Cour du Quartier. Then, on the 3rd of April, in order to give his friends an opportunity of obtaining the judgment of the Cour en Corps on the facts and the state of his mind, the 10th of April is fixed to hear all parties; when the judgment of the Court is that there shall be no prosecution, but that the Crown officers shall take the necessary steps to appoint him a guardian, and his friends to be responsible to the Court for his safe custody in the Island, with permission to apply to have him sent out of the Island to a proper place.

The following is the entry of the case.

Le dixième Mars, mil huit-cent vingt-six, devant Daniel De Lisle Brock, Ecuier, Baillif; présens Jean De Lisle, Jean Guille, Jean Hubert, Jean Le Marchant et William Collings, Ecuiers, Jurés.

Richard Hicks Champion, fils Joseph, Ecuier, ayant été ce jour produit devant la Cour par le ministère de Nicolas Le Lievre, Ecuier, un des connétables de la ville et paroisse de St. Pierre Port, accusé d'avoir, hier au soir, neuf Mars, les cinq heures, assailli, assommé et maltraité Demoiselle Marthe De Jersey dans l'escalier du Mont Gobel, le dit Champion l'ayant suivie en courant après, l'avoir passée dans la rue en dessous du dit escalier, et l'avoir vue monter le dit escalier, de l'avoir atteinte et de suite frappée d'un bâton sur la tête, en lui disant, "I'll teach you to treat me in that way," ou mots à cet effet, de lui avoir donné plusieurs autres coups par la tête, le dos et l'épaule, qui lui causèrent plusieures meurtrissures, lui percèrent le chapeau et cassèrent le peigne sur la tête, la firent tomber par terre et la mirent en danger et crainte de sa vie, la dite Demoiselle De Jersey n'étant parvenue à s'échapper qu' à peine, et en conséquence de ce que lui même tomba dans l'escalier, et donna par là occasion à la dite Demoiselle de s'enfuir: La Cour, après avoir entendu des témoins dignes de foi, tant sur la susdite plainte que sur d'autres plaintes et faits qui constatent l'état de démence du dit Champion, ayant jugé qu'il est absolument nécessaire pour la sureté publique de s'assurer de sa personne, a ordonné, ouie la conclusion des officiers du Roi, qu'il sera gardé enfermé dans la prison publique jusqu' à autre ordre.

---

Le troisième Avril, mil huit-cent vingt-six, devant Monsr le Baillif, présens Eléazar Le Marchant, Jean La Serre, Josias Le Marchant, Jean De Lisle, Jean Guille, James Carey, Jean Le Messurier, Jean Hubert, Jean Le Marchant, Pierre Le Cocq, et William Collings, Ecuyers, Jurés.

La Cour, ayant ce jour pris en considération l'acte du 10e Mars dernier, par lequel, sur la plainte contre Richard Hicks Champion, fils Joseph, Ecuier, spécifiée dans le dit acte, et après avoir entendu plusieurs témoins dignes de foi tant sur les faits contenus dans la dite plainte que sur d'autres faits qui constatent l'état de démence du dit Champion, il fut jugé qu'il était absolument nécessaire pour la sureté publique de s'assurer de sa personne, et ordonner qu'il serait gardé enfermé dans la prison publique jusqu' à autre ordre: La Cour, afin de donner occasion au dit Champion et à ses parens d'obtenir le jugement de la Cour en corps sur les dits faits et sur l'état d'esprit où il se trouve, a fixé, ouie la conclusion du Procureur du Roi, à Lundi prochain 10e du courant pour entendre tant le dit Champion, ses parens et leurs témoins, que les témoins des officiers du Roi et en ordonner.

Le dixième Avril, mil huit-cent vingt-six, devant Monsieur Le Baillif, présens Josias Le Marchant et Jean De Lisle, Ecuiers, Jurés.

La Cour, extraordinairement assemblée en Corps en conséquence de son acte du 3e du courant pour faire droit sur l'acte provisoire du 10e Mars dernier, et décider tant sur les procédures à faire sur l'accusation portée dans le dit acte contre Richard Hicks Champion, fils Joseph, Ecuier, pour sa conduite envers Demoiselle Marthe de Jersey que sur son état d'esprit: La Cour, après avoir entendu le dit Champion, ses parens, et un grand nombre de témoins produits par les officiers du Roi, le dit Champion et ses parens n'en ayant produit, à jugé, ouie la conclusion des officiers du Roi, que, vue l'aliénation d'esprit du dit Champion constatée par les dits témoins, il ne sera fait aucune poursuite contre lui pour son attaque de la dite Demoiselle De Jersey; mais que les officiers du Roi prendront sans délai les mesures nécessaires pour lui faire nommer un curateur aux biens par ses parens. Et seront le dit curateur aux biens et les dits parens du dit Monsieur Champion tenus, à peine d'en répondre, de le garder, à l'avenir et jusqu' à autre ordre, enfermé en lieu de sureté dans cette Ile, sauf à eux de s' addresser à la Cour pour permission de l'envoyer hors de cette dite Ile, pour le garder ailleurs en lieu convenable. Et entre temps le dit Monsieur Champion continuera en prison.

5469. Mr. Jeremie. A case was decided in January, 1813, which I will read to the Commissioners.

The witness read the same as follows.

Les officiers du Roi à silence envers Guillaume Caré, dit Bonaventure, de la Tréve du Saint, paroisse de Gourrain, dans le département du Morbihau, en France, prisonnier du Château Cornêt, en la cause qu'ils ont contre lui à se voir adjuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix pour avoir, le dit Caré, le 17e Novembre, 1812, étant dépourvu de la crainte de Dieu, à la maison du Sieur Jean Le Retilley, au Mont Durant, en la paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, environ les quatre à cinq heures de l'après-midi, félonieusement tué, occis et meurtri Monsr. Joseph Troussier d'un coup d'arme à feu chargé à balle, et qui lui fit diverses blessures, une desquelles blessures faite par une balle déchargée de la dite arme à feu qui, étant entrée par la côte gauche et pénétrée entre la troisième et quatrième côte et passée au travers des deux lobes des poumons et sortie par la côte droite, causa la mort du dit Monsieur Troussier, lequel décéda environ deux heures et demie après avoir reçu la dite blessure, et leur payer leurs dépens, aux fins d'acte du 21e Novembre, 1812: Après qu'il a paru à la Cour que le dit Caré, dit Bonaventure, étoit en démence lorsqu'il tua le dit Monsr. Troussier; et ce après avoir entendu lecture de la déposition des témoins de dits officiers du Roi, et des témoins justificatifs du dit accusé:—

5470. Mr. Jeremie. In that case, the question was what was the state of the man's mind at the time of the commission of the deed; and they found him insane, after having heard witnesses for the prosecution and for the defence. The Commissioners will see from the following authorities that, though there is a difference as to the time at which the plea of insanity may be brought forward, the result is the same. Here is a case very much like Melmoth's case. It is a decision of the Cour de Cassation upon the 64th article of the Code Pénal, on an appeal from the Cour d'Assizes of Eure et Loire, January 4, 1817. The 64th article is in the following terms. "Il n'y a ni crime ni délit lorsque le prévenu était en état de démence au temps de l'action ou lorsqu'il a été contraint par une force à laquelle il n'a pu resister." The point was decided in the same way as Melmoth's case; and it came before the Supreme Court on a question of law. "Lorsque le jury déclare que l'accusé est coupable d'avoir commis volontairement le crime dont il est accusé, et qu'il atteste ensuite que, à l'époque où ce crime a été commis, l'accusé était en démence, ces deux déclarations ne doivent point être annullées comme étant contradictoires, parce qu'il est évident que, loin d'avoir voulu exprimer qu'ils reconnoissent en lui une culpabilité légale, les jurés n'ont entendu rien autre chose, sinon qu'il était materiellement et physiquement auteur du fait, mais qu'il n'y avoit apporté q'une volonte d'homme en démence, volonté quasi animale, qui, d'après le présent article, comme d'après les plus simples lumières de la raison, est nécessairement exclusive de toute culpabilité légale. D'où il suit que c'était le cas d'acquittement, et non celui du renvoi des jurés dans leur chambre pour y délibérer une nouvelle déclaration, comme l'avait requis le Procureur du Roi." In that case, they pleaded the fact and the law both together; in the case I have been reading they pleaded the facts separately; in this decision they were pleaded both together. What I wished more particularly to draw the attention of the Commissioners to, upon this subject, is with respect to the time at which that state of insanity may have befallen the man: whether it is at the moment of committing the crime, whether it is at the moment of judgment. And very able civilians have gone so far that, even though he be sane at the time of the trial and at the time of the commission of the offence, yet if he is not sane at the moment of the execution they will not execute him, on the principle that the punishment is for the sake of example, and that hanging a man who has no will of his own sets aside all the advantage of example.

5471. (To the Procureur). Do you consider that your law extends further than that laid down in Terrien, which appears to be confined to where a madman may harm or murder another in his fury?—We have no other law than that in Terrien; but, in practice, we consider it extends further.

5472. You consider maiming and murder put as exemplifications of the principle?—Yes.

5473. Not as confining the principle to those two cases?—No; we consider ourselves very much as the Scotch consider themselves, that, though there be no statute, the Royal Court have an authority to punish every crime, though we may not have a positive law or statute on the point.

5474. Mr. Jeremie. There are different degrees of insanity; but there is one where a man is furious and therefore causes greater danger to others than he does even to himself. In that case, the Crown Officers here, I should imagine, could entertain it and order that the person be taken proper care of, though there was no crime brought against him.

5475. That is provided for in Terrien?—Yes.

5476. How far is any person who is under the coercion or restraint of another considered responsible? Take the case of husband and wife: the wife is supposed to act under the coercion of the husband in committing certain crimes. Does that extend to all crimes; theft for instance?—I should say myself that it does not extend to cases of murder and some other cases: but, as to theft and acts which we call "injures," the fact of acting under the coercion of her husband makes the act not her own; and therefore the Court would not hold her responsible. But I do not think, in case of murder or extreme acts like those, she could plead such coercion.

5477. You would confine it probably to offences against property?—Yes, and minor offences against the person.

5478. A wife slapping a person's face in the presence of her husband would be supposed to be acting by the orders of the husband probably?—That would be going very far. If the proceeding were by a cause en adjonction he would be the victim.

5479. A cause en adjonction must be brought against the husband, must not it?—You would bring the action against the husband; but you would put in the body of the action that it is the wife's doing. It would be the husband that would have to pay the penalty; and it would be against him the action would be brought.

5480. The Contrôle. They would both be sued; and both would be brought into Court.

5481. Mr. Jeremie. The husband must pay the penalty at last. Suppose the heirs of the husband and the wife have a distinct interest; the heirs of the wife would not lose a farthing in consequence of her act.

5482. (To the Procureur.) Do you agree with Mr. Jeremie as to the extent to which the responsibility of the wife is limited, by its being supposed that in her acts she is under the coercion of her husband? Is the rule general or confined to particular crimes?—I should say, it could not be a defence in any cases which would be tried au Grand Criminel. In a charge of coining, for instance, a woman was convicted of coining and her husband was acquitted.

5483. The Contrôle. In some cases au Grand Criminel she might be acquitted. In burglary for instance.

5484. The Procureur. We have no written law at all upon that point.

5485. Mr. Carré. For murder I do not think it could be pleaded.

5486. (To the Procureur.) Are the Commissioners right in saying that there is no absolute rule with regard to how far a wife is rendered irresponsible by being under the coercion of her husband; but that she is allowed to show absolute coercion in all cases?—I should suppose so. The only case in which that question has come forward was a case I pleaded when I was an advocate, many years ago, which is the case I have cited.

5487. The Contrôle. The fact is that we should follow as nearly as possible the English law upon that point, with this exception, that coercion would not be so easily presumed as in England. We should follow the principles of the English law with regard to the particular crimes.

5488. (To Mr. Jeremie). As we now understand the rule, it is that, in cases of crime, the wife is allowed to shew by positive evidence that she acted under control of the husband in the matter with which she is charged, with the exception of murder?—Yes; and even then she would be allowed to shew that she acted under the compulsion of the husband; but that would only go to affect the question what was the degree of participation she took in it. The fact is that, in that case, it would not be an actual absolution to her; whereas, if it were for theft and some other cases in which she acted under compulsion, the effect would be different.

5489. With the exception of murder it would be a defence to the charge you think?—It would. At the same time, I must say, there is no written law upon that subject. The very same observation applies, in the same degree as far as the law goes, to the child who acts by order of his father. In the same way, he has no will of his own; and, it is upon that principle, that the wife is supposed to have no will of her own, except in those cases of crime which are supposed to be known sufficiently to any one. In the case of the famous La Valette, who was convicted for high treason by the Court of Paris, his wife went and took him out of prison: any other person who had done such an act as that would have been punished; but the wife was absolved. We would follow the same principle.

5490. There is also another question with regard to how far control is a defence to a criminal charge, where the control is exercised by another party, not the husband. Take the case, for instance, of a person exercising the control of violent threats; how far would that be admitted as a defence?—When clearly proved, all such control would be taken as a discharge.

5491. Would it be so in the case of a third party threatening another where they were quite indifferent persons?—We should not take that as a defence here certainly.

5492. (To the Procureur.) Do you agree that control exercised by a party in the relationship of a father to a child, or a guardian to a ward, or a master to a servant, would be permitted to be given in evidence as a defence to a criminal charge?—It would be admitted in evidence; but how far it would go would probably depend upon circumstances, and also upon the sort of crime committed. I do not think it would be of any use in murder, for instance.

5493. Is it your legal opinion that, in other crimes if proved to a particular extent, it would be a ground of defence?—Yes; a father obliging his child, for instance, particularly if that child were young, to commit a small theft or to sign any particular name on a bill of exchange which was a forgery, that would be admitted to be pleaded as a defence.

5494. Mr. Jeremie. I think it may be said that, if proved, it is a discharge. As matter of course any counsel would plead that in mitigation.

5495. (To Mr. Jeremie) The question is confined to whether it would be a defence to the charge?—I think it would.

5496. But in the case of parties not standing in such relationship, you think it would not?—No. That is a case where the Procureur would come in. The party might plead it; and the Court would take it for what it was worth.

5497. It would not be a defence to the crime?—No, not in the case of a third party.

5498. The Procureur. No case like that has occurred for the last forty years.

5499. Mr. Carré. The question to be considered by the Court then would be how far, in the circumstances of the case, it would be possible for the party under restraint to avoid committing the act. Suppose the case of a young child, just fourteen, who was induced by a parent to commit a criminal act; the circumstances under which he was induced to do so would weigh with the Court, and in some cases might amount to an answer to the charge.

5500. Mr. Jeremie. What the Lieutenant Bailiff has said is just what I was going to say. It is laid down in the 64th Article of the Code Napoléon as a ground of discharge "lorsqu'il a été contraint par une force à laquelle l'accusé n'a pu résister." If a third party is in that position, it is a discharge to the action; but, if he is otherwise, then it is not.

5501. The Bailiff. All I have to observe upon this is that all the opinions which have been given and which can be given with respect to it are mere matters of speculation on the general principles of law, no case having occurred; and, if one did occur, it must be thrown back on the common law of the island.

5502. There is nothing, is there, in Terrien or in the Approbation, which treats of the case of a wife pleading her husband's coercion or of the other cases which have been referred to?

Mr. De Jersey. No; I do not think there is: and, for that reason, I took care to state we had had no case for the last forty years. In point of fact, we have no positive law upon it.

---

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine, further examined.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

5503. The fifth query is: "When a party is charged with an offence, what is the result, if it appears that he was not the actual perpetrator, but was present at the time and assisted the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching or otherwise." The hypothesis is that he is charged with the offence, not with assisting. Is it in your law the case that that difficulty cannot often arise?—It cannot arise upon the first point at all.

5504. You charge the offence, and the fact of assisting; both ways?—Yes. A person indicted for having committed an offence, the proof being that he was present at the time and assisted the actual perpetrator by counsel, watching or otherwise, might be found guilty of the offence.

5505. Suppose a man were aware that another man was going to murder a third; that would not constitute the crime of murder. But, suppose he were to say, while the act was being done, "Make haste, here is a police officer coming." Could he be indicted for the murder?—Supposing he were to assist him by counsel, watching or otherwise, at the time the offence was committed, he might be indicted. The charge would be: "A. B. seul, ou avec son complice ou ses complices." The accomplice, in that view, would be the person actually having committed the murder.

5506. As to the second case: "That he was not present, but instigated or assisted the actual perpetrator before the time of the perpetration:" what do you say?—He would be acquitted. Supposing him to be indicted for the offence itself, and the proof to be that he instigated it before, he would be acquitted certainly.

5507. The Bailiff. If he had supplied the material with which the offence was committed, he would be tried for having so done. I mention that, as an instance of complicité previous, because it is one I have happened to see.

5509. The answer to the sixth question is that he would be chargeable with the principal offence in the first case supposed in question five?—Yes.

5510. In answer to the second part of the sixth question you would say that in the second and third case he would be charged with specific participation?—Yes.

5511. All the gentlemen say, in answer to question nine, that you have no such thing known as constructive presence?—No.

5512. What the Commissioners meant was of this kind, whether the person must be in sight to constitute presence?—We have nothing of that kind at all. The doctrine of actual and constructive presence does not operate at all. It would be the general doctrine of complicity, how far he was an accomplice or not.

5513. Suppose he is charged, by himself or with others his accomplices, with the crime of vol avec effraction, for instance; and it turns out that he is standing at the corner of the street on the look out; he would not be actually present at the crime?—According to our law, he might be convicted certainly. The question would not turn upon presence at all; he would be indicted as an accomplice: and then, the question would be whether the fact of complicity was established.

5514. Your answer then is that the doctrine of constructive presence cannot enter into your law.

5515. The Bailiff. Presence is no part of the definition of an accomplice; and therefore, it is not necessary, where it does not exist really, to supply it by a fiction.

5516. Is it any part of the question of complicity whether the complicity is before or at the time of the crime?

The Contrôle. Yes certainly. In a case of complicity before the crime, he could not be convicted for the crime itself.

5517. The Bailiff. I doubt whether that is so.

5518. The Contrôle. I can mention the case of a person having bought faggots for the committal of the crime of arson; and that person could not be tried for the crime of arson.

5519. The Procureur. In the case of a person having given ladders and false keys, I very much doubt whether the indictment would be quashed.

5520. The Contrôle. The specific way in which he has assisted is put in the indictment; and he is convicted for that: but I conceive that any person indicted for the crime itself, supposing all the proof against him was that he had furnished the means of committing that crime, but had had no participation in the actual committal of it, could not be convicted.

5521. Your expression is, if he had furnished the means but had had no participation. Is furnishing the means not considered as a participation?—No; that must be specially laid; that is my opinion.

5522. The Bailiff. The time is more material to the indictment here than it is in England. It is necessarily so where all the information the accused has is from the acte d'accusation itself, and not from the knowledge of what has been deposed against him. I will suppose a vol avec effraction has been committed here on Monday, and that the act of the party accused was an act of preparation committed in the Island of Herm on Saturday; that he furnished materials and gave them to a person there. If he was charged simply with the original offence of a vol avec effraction in Guernsey on Monday, if he wanted an alibi he would prove himself to have been in Herm on that day. The time and place would be mis-stated; and, his attention being called to a wrong time and place, a conviction under such an indictment would be obviously unfair. The proper way of doing that, I apprehend, would be to say that he committed the vol in Guernsey, in that he, on the previous day, at a different place, prepared the means for effecting it. I suppose the consequence arising from the want of regularity and the want of legal definition of the offence would be matter for the discretion of the Justices at the trial.

5523. (To the Bailiff.) Suppose the objection were, not that he had not committed the vol, but that the way of his committing it was insufficiently described; what would be the proceeding? Would you quash the acte d'accusation and order another?—To that I suppose you would have the same answer as before. I take it, according to the custom usually followed, the man would escape.

5524. The Contrôle. I quite agree with the proposition of the Bailiff: but it appears to come exactly to what I said, that the second case supposed in the fifth question would require you to lay the particular points in which the instigation or assistance had taken place, and that, if you did not do that, the indictment must fail.

5525. (To the Contrôle). The Commissioners understand your answer rather to be, that charging him with the principal crime would be charging him with what he had not done?—No; you may charge him with the crime, provided you add the particular way in which he has instigated or aided its commission.

5526. The Procureur says, in his answer to the second case suggested in the fifth question, that, if the accomplice furnished a housebreaker with ladders or false keys, he might be convicted of the principal offence.

The Procureur. The time and place in which his assistance was given must be stated. The indictment must run, that such a man, with his accomplice or accomplices, committed such a robbery, he, the said accomplice, having given ladders or false keys for the purpose, and knowing the purpose for which they were intended of breaking into and getting into such a house; and, if those facts were omitted from the indictment, though I do not know a single case, I think he would be acquitted.

5527. The Contrôle. Then we are all agreed in our opinions upon that point.*

5528. Does the acte d'accusation state the facts of the case?—Yes; the particular facts affecting each prisoner.

5529. The Bailiff. There is one answer which I have given I should like to have struck out, where I spoke of materials being supplied as being a substantive offence. I had in my mind then a different case; and it was incorrect.

5530. (To the Contrôle.) We find, from your answer to the tenth question, that each person is charged in a single indictment; but that, when the evidence is the same, the evidence is heard collectively?—Yes. That is by consent; because certainly each prisoner might insist upon the whole evidence being gone over again. It is always the practice, in those cases, for the Crown officer to ask the counsel whether they agree to that. I consider that, in strictness, the counsel for the prisoner might insist upon all the evidence being gone over in each case.

5531. So that a man might insist upon being tried altogether alone?—Yes; it is a mere matter of convenience that it is otherwise; and it is supposed, in fact, that the evidence is heard separately.

5532. Would it stand so in the record?—Yes.

5533. The 12th question is with regard to the limitation of time within which a person can be prosecuted?—There is a specific law for that. Terrien, lib. 12, ch. xviii., p. 502. —" L'en doit sçavoir qu' aucun ne peut suyr de meffait qui, dedãs l'an et jour, n'ait esté mõstré à la justice, et dequoy la clameur n'ait esté faite sicomme elle doit. Mais de meurdre peut-on suyr quand certain signe et enseignes en sont monstrees par loyal tesmoignage du pays, par qui l'en sçache certainement du meurdre qui a esté fait. * The following is the provision in the Code Pénal with regard to complicité. " Seront punis comme complices d'une action qualifiée crime ou délit, ceux qui, par dons, promesses, menaces, abus d'autorité ou de pouvoir, machinations ou artifices coupables, auront provoqué à cette action, ou donné des instructions pour la commettre. Ceux qui auront procuré des armes, des instruments, ou tout autre moyen qui aura servi à l'action, sachant qu'ils devaient y servir. Ceux qui auront, avec connaissance, aidé ou assisté l'auteur ou les auteurs de l'action dans les faits qui l'auront préparée ou facilitée, ou dans ceux qui l'auront consommée; sans préjudice des peines qui seront spécialement portées par le présent Code contre les auteurs de complots ou de provocations attentatoires à la sûreté intérieure ou extérieure de l'Etat, même dans le cas où le crime qui était l'objet des conspirateurs ou des provocateurs n'aurait pas été commis." Code Pénal, Lib.ii. corps se doit faire dedans l'an et jour du delict. Mais suite d'homicide et d'autre crime publique ne se prescrit que par le laps de vingt ans: comme il est dit De crime de faux."

5534. Can that be set up by the accused as a defence; or is it the practice not to institute a prosecution, where the crime has been committed so many years before?—If the Crown were to institute a prosecution after twenty years, the counsel might plead that point. But, I conceive, the Crown lawyers would not do it, as the date must appear upon the acte d'accusation. No doubt the Court would allow it.

5535. The Bailiff. With us, the time is much more material than it is in the English practice.

5536. The Contrôle. With regard to the time, every accusation is considered to be necessarily laid within a month of the real time.

5537. Must not you in some cases say at a time unknown?—I have never known a case of it; and I do not think it would be admitted.

5538. Does not the suite d'homicide, mentioned in Terrien, apply to the suit of the party injured, and not to the prosecution on behalf of the public?

The Bailiff. I think suite de meurdre was the same thing as an appeal of murder in England. I think, as suite de meurdre ceased to be put in force, the present mode of prosecution took its place. Suite de meurdre was by loy apparissant, that is wager of battle, termed in Magna Carta, "Lex manifesta." The loy recognoissant was intended as a substitute for wager of battle, and is applicable to all cases formerly triable by wager of battle. This appears from ch. lxvii. of the Coustumier, and from the Brief d'establie, ch. cxiii., which coincides with the reasons given by Glanville for introducing Recognition of Assize into England. There were two kinds of Recognoissance, Brief d'Establie for land, and Brief de Sourdemande, where the Lord made surcharge of services. They were a substitute of Wager of Battle in Normandy as in England; and so received the name of Loy Apparissant. But I do not see but that Enquête might be in case of suite; that is, parties might agree to put themselves on the country. I imagine this always to have been the law in Normandy: that twenty years prescribes the crime.

5539. (To the Bailiff). In matters of Police correctionnelle, is not a year and a day the time of limitation?—No; that is in cases en adjonction. All cases en adjonction are limited to a year and a day, and also cases au Police correctionnelle for assault, petty cases.

5540. The Procureur. In the case of actions upon Acts of Parliament for penalties, the limitations would be provided for by the particular statutes.

5541. (To the Contrôle.) Does this Court possess any Admiralty jurisdiction?—That is a very difficult question indeed.

5542. Are there any instances of its exercising it?—In cases en adjonction, the Court has allowed proceedings for ill-treatment at sea, where this port was the first to which the vessel had come after the ill-treatment.

5543. Was the case of the Danish boy a case of that kind?—No; in the case of the Danish boy, the ill-treatment was alleged to have taken place in this Island. The case would have arisen, if an injury had been committed before he arrived. I can give you one or two cases en adjonction: and I conceive the Court would apply the same principle in a case of crime. Also the Court have held, in a case en adjonction, that, where the vessel belonged to Guernsey, a suit might be entertained here for ill treatment, although the vessel had touched at other ports, on the ground that this was the first English port. There is a case, in 1836, in which a man of the name of Mason was ill-treated at the Havanna; he remained there some days; and from there the vessel went to Rotterdam, and remained there three days, and then came here. The captain was then sued here for ill treatment; and it was ruled that, as the captain was a native of Guernsey, and the vessel belonged to Guernsey, and Guernsey was the first English port where the vessel had touched, the action might lie.

5544. There you had all the requisites?—Yes.

5545. In one case, you said, the fact of the vessel belonging to Guernsey, was considered to draw the jurisdiction, though another incident of its being the first port failed?—I consider the principle is, that Guernsey is the first English port. That is the way in which it applies to Guernsey vessels.

5546. Suppose a vessel lay a month in St. Malo, and then came to Guernsey, that would not intercept the jurisdiction you think?—No; I suppose not, according to that.

5547. In the case of a murder by a native of Guernsey upon a native of Guernsey on board a Dutch ship, if the ship came into this port, should you have any jurisdiction?—There is no precedent; and there is no law applicable to the case at all that I know of. I should incline to the opinion that the prosecution would take place here; but what points would be raised, and how they would be decided, I cannot say; nor have I any analogy to assist me. I do not know a single precedent of a crime committed out of the jurisdiction.

5548. Mr. Le Retilley, (Jurat). In the case of the vessel coming here having touched at the Havanna, I think, the man was not allowed to go on shore with the captain after the crime was committed; so that this was the first port where he could possibly obtain redress. I have always considered that, if an individual who complains of a wrong has had an opportunity to obtain redress in any port, he cannot bring any action here.

5549. The Contrôle. I see, in the case I have referred to, the Jurats were not unanimous: so that there must have been some doubt about it. I see another case, in 1827. George Macpherson, formerly a sailor on board a Guernsey vessel, the "Sophia," actioned the captain for ill treatment, in June, 1825. The captain pleaded to the jurisdiction in abatement, on the ground of having gone to other ports, and also pleaded the prescription of a year and a day. The Court, on the ground that the vessel had only come back to Guernsey in the year 1827, when the action was entered, admitted the action, though it was proved that it had gone to other ports.

5550. Was that a Guernsey vessel?—Yes.

5551. And Guernsey men?—Yes. Those are cases en adjonction; they are not cases at the suit of the Crown. I believe there is not a single case en crime, which can be cited upon this subject.

5552. Mr. Jeremie. I think the only point, in which there has been a clear and precise rule, is with respect to the offences committed on land. Suppose a master ill treats an apprentice at Rio Janeiro, the Court have admitted such an action.

5553. (To Mr. Jeremie.) Suppose a murder in England; how could you have jurisdiction to try a murder in England?—I am talking of assault, or cases of damages. I should say, in the case of a Guernsey ship going into the port of Liverpool, if the master ill treated his apprentice, and, on his arrival here, the apprentice arrested the master and brought an action of damages, this Court would try it en adjonction.

5554. Mr. Carré. I think not.

5555. Mr. Jeremie. In the case of Guernsey vessels that go to Rio Janeiro, when an action has been brought against the master, they have not yet admitted the plea to the jurisdiction to be good.

5556. The Procureur. The jurisdiction of the Court is "de omnibus casibus in dictâ Insulâ."

5557. (To Mr. Jeremie). Suppose the offence occurred between any two natives of Guernsey at Rio Janeiro; do you think the Court would claim to have jurisdiction in such a case?—No; the jurisdiction is supposed to follow the ship.

5558. There is a passage in Terrien, lib. xii. c. xxiv. page 494. "De Recepteurs et Complices de Malfaiteurs. Tous Recepteurs qui receptent les forjurez, les forbains, les damnez, et ceux qui se defuyent à venir à la paix du Duc qui ont esté appelez, doyvent estre mis en la prison du Duc. Et s'ils sont trouvez coulpables ils doyvent perdre tous leurs meubles à la volonté au Duc ou au Bailly. Et s'ils n'ont meubles ils doyvent estre chastiez par longue prison. Les consentans aux larrons en leur larcins et ceux qui les receptent doyvent estre punis en autre maniere. Car s'ils en sont attaints, ils seulent en Normandie emporter autelle peine comme les larrons mesmes: et aussi tous leurs parçonniers et consentans de leurs meffaicts." Do the words Recepteurs de Malfaiteurs mean what we should call "comforting the offender;" if so, they appear to be punishable by loss of chattels and imprisonment?—Yes.

5559. But a person consenting is liable to the same punishment as the thief?—Yes.*

5560. Do you hold that to be law?—Certainly; accomplices are held liable to the same punishment as the larrons. Mr. Le Marchant says at page 196 "Les complices des malfaiteurs et de leurs méfaits, récepteurs de larcins, y consentant ou participant, doivent estre punis, de mesme peine que les larrons et autres malfaiteurs mesme." By "récepteurs des larcins," I take it he refers to receivers of stolen goods. They are liable to the same punishment, as the thief. With respect to the proceeding for comforting the thief, I do not think there is any precedent for it.

5561. What is the difference between the offences which are classed under the head of "peine, punition ou châtiment corporel" and those the punishment of which is only imprisonment? In each case the party, it appears, may be subjected to imprisonment?

The Bailiff. In the one case you may inflict the additional punishment of flogging, pillory, or deportation for seven years. The word imprisonment is included under the word "punition."

5562. (To the Bailiff.) "Félonieusement" you all interpret as something which subjects to confiscation of goods?—Yes.

5563. In the Coustumier and Terrien there are definitions of félonieusement, according to which félonnie seems to imply crimes of violence. You apply it to all crimes liable to be punished by la mort civile, which includes confiscation? †—I believe those views are both true, pretty nearly. I do not think there would be any act of felony at common law which was not an act of violence.

5564. Does that hold vice versâ?—Certainly not.

5565. According to the Coustumier, if beating accompanies any act it becomes a felony?—I think it must be a very violent beating to amount to a felony.

5566. The Contrôle. Every case where there is confiscation is laid félonieusement; but the converse does not hold.

5567. The Bailiff. Every case which is laid félonieusement may be punished with a punishment to which confiscation is incident.

5568. (To the Bailiff.) Then that would be at present a complete definition of felony, that it involved confiscation?—Yes.

5569. Can you distinguish "crime" and "délit" by any general definition of the act?—I am unable to do so. We do not use the word "délit."

5570. Do you use the word "contravention?"—Contravention with us would mean the infringement of some Ordinance.

GUERNSEY.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

October 8th, 1846.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq. (Advocate), further examined.

5571. Question No. 4 of the third Series refers to the age at which a person can give evidence. Are the Commissioners right in saying that, in practice, a person below the age of puberty is incompetent as a witness?—Certainly; totally incompetent both by practice and by positive law.

5572. In practice, is any inconvenience found from that rule?—A very great inconvenience.

5573. Perhaps, in some cases, a failure of justice altogether?—I think that might occur. I have not present to my mind any particular case, in which it has occurred; though it is my impression that cases have occurred within my knowledge.

5574. A witness becomes incompetent in case of a conviction for crime; does that extend to every crime?—That is a question upon which some doubt and difficulty must exist; but, in practice, I have scarcely ever known a question raised upon the subject. However, I ground the answers which I have given on the subject, in my written replies, on the law, as I find it laid down, in Terrien Lib. ix. chap. xxxiv. page 393, which is indirectly approved. This applies entirely to civil cases: but, in practice, we apply the same rules to criminal cases.

5575. Are the rules of evidence the same in civil as in criminal cases?—They are. In practice, we follow this chapter as law in civil and criminal cases. It is, however, quite clear that we have misunderstood some portions of it. What I find as to disqualification on the ground of crime is this, which evidently applied, not to witnesses giving evidence, but to the recognitors, if I might use the word.

5576. The tryers?—Yes; they are spoken of in a great many chapters in Terrien.

5577. What is the text in Terrien which refers to the recognitors?—There are several passages; perhaps, I had better read the chapter. It begins at the bottom of page 393. It is an extract from La Coustume au chapitre. De Jureurs. "Les especiaux amis, ne les ennemis, ne les cousins à l'une partie ni à l'autre, n'aucun de qui l'en puisse par certaine raison avoir soupeçon d'amour, ou de hayne, ou de lignage, ne doivent pas estre receuz au serment."

5578. Does this rule apply to witnesses?—We apply it to witnesses now; but, originally, it did not apply to them. It then proceeds: "Ne ceux qui ont semblable querelle: ne ceux qui l'ont menée ou defendue en cour ou maintenue ou esté conseilleurs. Ne ceux qui sont prochains de la chose demandée; ne ceux qui ne rien sçavent de la chose, dequoy contens est, et qui ne sont du temps ne du lieu dequoy ils en puissent rien sçavoir, ne doivent estre receus. Ne ceux qui sont reprins de parjure, ou de porter faux tesmoin; ou ceux qui sont infames; ou qui sont communément blasmez d'homicide, d'arson, de larcin ou d'aucun autre crime, dequoy il n' est aucun qui les suive." Practically, we apply this to "témoins de certaine."

5579. All parties named here are incompetent as witnesses by your law?—Yes; with this limitation, which will be found in Terrien's own comment. "Mal renommez. Cecy est special en ces deux crimes de parjure et de mescreantise; c'est à dire d'héresie et de mal sentir de la foy, que la renommée suffise pour debouter un tesmoin. Car, en autres cas, le saon ne seroit suffisant; ne mesmes que le tesmoin eust esté accusé de crime, si on ne maintient qu'il en ait attaint et conuaincu, ou qu'il en ait composé par argent." You must prove the conviction.

5580. So that, in all cases, except perjury and the want of religious belief, you must establish the crime by proving the conviction?—Yes.

5581. Do you understand, from that, a disqualification for perjury might be established, without conviction?—I understand that that was the case. I might prove that he had committed perjury, without producing the conviction. At the bottom of the same page we find: "Reproches de tesmoins en terme generaux ne sont recevables, d'estre infame, parjure, homicide, voleur ou autrement; sans specialement exprimer le lieu et temps du delict commis, ou la sentence sur ce ensuyvie, et de quel juge pour sauoir s'il est competent ou incompetent et autres circonstances."

5582. It is impossible to suppose the Chapitre de Jureurs was originally meant to apply to the witnesses, because some of the qualification required would be ridiculous?—Yes; it shows that it applied to the recognitors.

5583. By the law, as it exists at present, parties guilty of the different crimes mentioned would fall within the scope of the passage just read. They would be incompetent; with this, that you may object to persons guilty of perjury, or without religious belief, without proving the conviction?—Yes.

5584. (To the Contrôle.) In your answer, you say conviction of perjury. Is that the modern interpretation?—Yes. I do not conceive, in practice now, an allegation would be sufficient.

5585. Nor proof?—No; that would not be admitted.

5586. Mr. MacCulloch. I doubt whether the Court would permit me to go into proof of perjury now, except by producing a conviction.

5587. In practice, you could not exclude a person's evidence by accusing him of perjury?—I think that would not be allowed now.

5588. How has the change arisen?—It has changed, liked many other points, by time.

5589. It has been found to be inconvenient, and has been altered without an Acte?—Yes.

5590. (To the Contrôle.) In your written answers you follow the catalogue in Terrien, except that you make one variation. You spoke of "other public crime." Did you mean any particular limitation by the word "public?"—No.

5591. You mean generally anything subject to a prosecution?—Yes.

5592. Mr. MacCulloch. I may have made use of the word "public" also. If I have done so, it was to distinguish between a case for which a man would be regularly tried before the Cour en Corps, and a mere police case.

5593. The Contrôle. There is a case in which this law has been set aside. I rather think, in the conspiracy, the counsel offered to prove that one of the witnesses for the Crown had been guilty of perjury; not had been convicted of it, but had been guilty of it. He tendered evidence to that effect, and the Court refused it and admitted the person as a witness.

5594. (To the Procureur.) If a man swears he will do a thing and does not do it; is he held to commit perjury?—Yes. In all our contracts for real property no property belonging to a wife can be validly sold. But, to meet that, the wife takes an oath by which she says, she sells of her own free will, without the control of her husband, and that she will never recede therefrom on pain of perjury. Suppose a man is brought up for a small offence; instead of taking bail in money, we take his caution juratoire: and we have cases, at least we have a case, for I only know one, I believe, about seventy or eighty years ago, where a man who promised not to leave the Island gave his caution juratoire. He afterwards left the Island; and there was an action entered against him for perjury. I do not find the judgment.

5595. At what time is the perjury held to be committed?—At the moment he does that he has promised not to do by his oath. He promised not to leave the Island; and the moment he left it the perjury was committed. In the third volume of Jousse Traité de la Justice Criminelle, Partie Quatrième, titre xxxviii., I find "Le parjure, contre lequel les loix civiles ont établi des peines, est un serment fait en Justice contre la verité, ou le violement d'un serment fait en Justice. Ainsi, 1°. Un témoin qui dépose faux en présence du juge après avoir fait serment de dire la vérité, commet un parjure. 2°. Il en est de même de celui qui affirme une chose fausse en conséquence du serment décisoire qui lui a été déféré par sa partie adverse. 3°. Ou, quand une partie interrogée en Justice par la voie du serment, repond faussement sur les faits sur lesquels elle est interrogée, soit en matière civile, soit en matière criminelle. 4°. Ou quand une partie, à qui le juge a déféré d'office le serment, affirme comme vraie une chose fausse. 5°. Celui qui promet une chose en Justice avec serment et qui viole sa promesse, commet aussi un parjure."

5596. Perjury, then, we understand you, may mean not the taking a false oath, but breaking a true one?—Yes. The limitation of a year and a day would run from the supposed violation. In many cases, if we were not to take this means of requiring the party to take an oath, we must take bail instead of it. In a case en parjure under such circumstances, the action is entered in a milder way, which could only go to a fine in money or an imprisonment.

5597. The Bailiff. The passage in Le Marchant only speaks of false witness; it does not use the more general word of perjury.

5598. The Procureur. Here, often, the decision of causes is left by one party to the oath of the other. In the case of actions for a payment of 50*l.*, one says "I do not owe you 50*l*;" the other says "You take your oath of it." There must be some punishment for a false oath in such a case.

5599. (To the Contrôle.) What crime would you exclude from your answer when you speak of a conviction rendering the party incompetent as a witness?—Misdemeanours, I think, would be excluded. I consider it applies only to felonies.

5600. Do you think that the answer to the question "Whether the offence were punishable by death," would be the test?—Yes.

5601. Should you include larceny?—No.

5602. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Are there not other causes which render a party incompetent? Take the case of a husband against a wife, or a wife against a husband; is there any exception to that?—I conceive not.

5603. Could a wife give evidence to prove ill-treatment of herself on the part of a husband?

The Procureur. I understand the law to be that she is not admissible; and in a case which occurred of that kind the wife was not produced.

5604. Was she tendered and refused?—No; she was not refused.

5605. Mr. MacCulloch. I have often heard the Court en Police refuse to hear a wife complaining of ill-treatment on the part of her husband. This is founded on a passage of the Coustumier, Brief de Mariage encombré, chap. c. It is also found in Terrien Lib. II. Chap. I. p. 16, which says: "Ne peut la femme rappeller ce qu'il" (that is the husband) "fait; ne estre ouye, tant qu'il viue, en derriere de luy; mais ils doyvent estre ouys ensemble de toutes les choses qui appartiennt à elle." That is a wife cannot enter or defend an action without the presence of her husband. Then comes the exception: "Mais elle doit estre ouye en derriere de son mari, s'il la mehaigne ou luy creve les yeux, ou luy brise les bras, ou il a accoustumé à la traiter vilainment." If he ill-treats her, she may obtain redress; but it does not mean to say that she can be heard as a witness.

5606. The Bailiff. You will find that very clearly if you look at the Coustumier, title Brief de Mariage encombré.

5607. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Do you think that a wife not being allowed to be heard is an inconvenience?—I think she might be heard, when she has reason to complain of personal violence to herself; but in that case only.

5608. The Bailiff. I apprehend the limits of the English law to be the proper ones.

5609. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) What are the other causes of incompetency?—There are degrees of relationship. In Terrien, Lib. ix. c. xxxiv. page 393, we find: "Ne peuvent personnes jointes, comme le père, la mère et le fils, la femme et le mary estre produicts ne pour ne contre ceux à qui ils attaignent ainsi près." In the next article, in the Coustumier, we find the brother mentioned: that appears clearly to be law. We also find in Terrien, "Aveugles ne sourds ne peuuent porter tesmoignage; ne personnes conjointes, sicomme sont le père et le fils, et le frère, qui sont prochains du lignage: ne ceux qui sont en non aage ne ceux qui sont attaints de pariure ou de foy mentie: ne ceux qui en sont mal renommez."

5610. Those parties, the father, the mother, son and brother, are still excluded, are they?—Yes. We have gone much farther than that; for we have applied the next passage in Terrien, which I have already read, Au chapitre De jureurs, to the rejection of first cousins. It is clear to me that they were allowed to be witnesses in Normandy, though they could not be jureurs.

GUERNSEY.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

October 8th, 1846.

5611. That you think another instance of a wrong construction put upon the Coustûmier?—In my opinion it is: and, upon that principle, in practice, uncles, aunts, great aunts, nephews, nieces and grand nieces, by consanguinity or alliance, are all excluded.

5612*a*. You take in nearly every relation except second cousins?—Yes; first cousins once removed. Besides those, I conceive, if you take Terrien strictly, you will find it bear out Mr. Le Marchant that, if the presumptive heir should be further off than a first cousin, he could not be admitted as a witness. I have never known the question to be tried here; but that I understand to be the law.

5612*b*. Those cannot be witnesses for prisoners?—Yes. The Crown may call them all, except the wife. It is generally understood that no person who is accused can be bound to declare. I know there are one or two decisions rather to the contrary; but the general practice, I believe, to be as I have stated.

5613. They are not bound to give evidence for the Crown, where they could be rejected if brought on the other side?—Exactly so. In Scotland that was formerly the case: and there was an act of Parliament passed to do away with it.*

5614. The Bailiff. It did not go further than brothers.

5615. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Those are the parties who are incompetent as witnesses, by reason of relationship?—Yes.

5616. In a cause en adjonction, how is it?—Relations on both sides would be excluded. Any persons standing within any of those degrees of relationship to the plaintiff would be objected to and rejected.

5617. It would not extend to the relations of the learned persons who are adjoined, would it?—No.

5618. Is not it the fact that, in a place like this, where parties are so much connected by marriage, the practice is very inconvenient?—I think it is exceedingly inconvenient; so much so that I brought the subject under the notice of the Court about a year ago; and some measures were taken for the purpose of applying a remedy: and, I believe, the thing is nearly in a position to be laid before the States.

5619. That change probably might be considered as tantamount to the alteration of a written law, and would require the sanction of the Privy Council to enable you to make the alteration?—Yes.

5621. In that case, the charge for the receiving would probably allege the theft to have been by the other man?—Yes.

5622. Suppose you were trying the thief; the charge against him would not name the other person. If you excluded the receiver, how would you identify the offence?—It would be rather difficult to do so. This point generally arises in cases en adjonction. Suppose a party to bring the same action against three or four others for having slandered him, those parties would not be allowed to be witnesses one for the other.

5623. Would they be all charged separately?—Yes.

5624. If two men, each of them, called me an opprobrious name, those would surely be separate crimes?—Supposing they all slanderously charged me with having committed a crime on a certain day, they would be charged separately. One of them could not be allowed to call his accomplices.

5625. Suppose one man to charge you with committing a theft at eleven o'clock, and the other at twelve?—That would be a cause semblable.

5626. You would have to establish the fact of the men being charged with slander in order to exclude them?—Yes: you must prove that at the trial.

5627. Suppose you brought a cause en adjonction against me, and I called another who was by to prove that I did not utter the slanderous words; might you say to the witness, "You cannot give evidence, for you also called me a thief?"—I must have brought an action against him.

5628. You must go into evidence to prove the fact, in the case of the action against me, must not you?—Yes.

5629. Suppose I call a person to prove an alibi; would it be an answer to say the witness is a party to the same theft?—If he had been charged. Reputation would not be sufficient.

5630. Then he might say, "I am charged with a theft, but it is not the same." Should you be allowed to go into evidence to prove the identity?—Yes; I should think so.

5631. In your mode, several are put in the same indictment or Mise en accusation. In that case, can one be evidence for the other?—It is generally considered that a man who is under a similar accusation is not a competent witness.

5632. Would a charge of theft upon another man, upon another day, exclude him?—I am not prepared to say that.

5633. Do you go to the length of saying it need not be actually the same transaction?—I do, certainly.

5634. Suppose one were acquitted; could he be evidence for the next man?—Yes. The acquittal gets rid of the incompetence arising from the charge.

5635. Does the exclusion hold both for and against the prisoner?—Yes.

---

* Statute 3 and 4 Vict. c. 59, "An Act for the Amendment of the Law of Evidence in Scotland."

5636. Then it is an advantage to be tried second or first, according as a man may testify against you or for you?—Yes.

5637. You would probably think that an additional reason for trying such persons together, and not separately?—Yes.

5638. Would it be open to one person, where several are charged with a crime arising out of the same transaction, to say, "I insist upon A. B. being tried first; because the facts against him are very slight indeed; he must be acquitted; and I wish to avail myself of the benefit of his testimony"?—Certainly not.

5639. Might that be a ground of application to the Court for the exercise of its discretion?—Yes. It could not be claimed as matter of right.

5640. If all of them were tried together, at the conclusion of the evidence for the accusation might not one of the prisoners say, "I demand to have one of these parties acquitted because there is no evidence against him, that I may use his testimony"?—That would require a special law for the purpose. The rule is now that, when witnesses have been sworn, no further witnesses can be called, except by consent.

5641. (To the Bailiff.) Do you agree to the law as to the exclusion of witnesses, as stated by Mr. MacCulloch?—Yes; I am not quite sure whether I should limit the "cause semblable" quite so much as Mr. MacCulloch does.

5642. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Suppose you want to prove an alibi, may relations prove that?—Yes; they are admitted, except the wife. In Terrien, lib. xii. chap. xxxvi., page 524, "Preuve du faict d'alibi. Combien qu'une negative de faict ne se puisse prouver, quand elle est pure, simple et non determinée (car alors, on croit plustost un tesmoin rapportant l'affirmatiue, qu' à mille tesmoins rapportans la negatiue) toutesfois, si elle contient determination de lieu et de temps, elle se peut prouuer indirectement. Comme si aucun nie avoir tué un homme à certain lieu et à certain jour, il le pourra bien prouver, en prouvant qu'en ce jour là, il estoit en autre lieu, voire si loin qu'en mesme jour il n'eust peu estre en tous les deux lieux. Qui est le faict d'alibi ou d'absence dont parle ceste ordonnance (de Loys xii. 1498). Et en ce cas, les tesmoins ainsi deposans sont preferez aux autres encores plus dignes de foy, d'autant qu'ils rapportent la descharge de l'accusé, mesmement és causes de sang."

5643. Mr. MacCulloch. That does not appear to me to apply to relationship, though that has been the construction put upon it. It relates to cases where blood has been spilt. In some cases a witness who has any interest in the result of a trial is not admitted.

5644. Could that take place in criminal matters at all?—In cases of forgery it might. It is founded upon a passage in Terrien Lib. ix. chap. xxxiv. p. 393, which has already been read.

5645. In what way could a conviction for forgery be used in the defence to an action on the forged instrument?—We have a procedure called "l'inscription de faux." I bring an action against you upon a bill of exchange. You say, you never signed it, it is a forgery. A prosecution for forgery takes place; and the civil proceeding is suspended while the criminal proceeding is carried on. I could not in that case be heard as a witness. In former times, there was a criminal proceeding in rem to try whether the document was a forgery or not, which we have lost all trace of ourselves.

5646. Suppose such a case as this. A man brings an action against me for the amount of a bill of exchange. I say, "It is not my signature." He says, "Prosecute the forger." I say, "I know who signed it, but he died last week"?—Primâ facie, the party producing the bill and claiming upon it would be proceeded against as the forger.

5647. Am I bound to prosecute a man whom I do not believe to be guilty of forgery?—That would be a subject of inquiry by la Cour Criminelle. There would be an enquête at once.

5648. A person bringing an action on a bill is liable therefore to proceedings in which he must prove that he did not forge it?—Yes; it must be shown that he was not the party who committed the forgery. The party attacking the bill is bound to prove that the offence has been committed.

5649. That is to say, not the holder but the party liable on the bill, the defendant in the civil action, is the party upon whom the responsibility of instituting criminal proceedings lies?—Yes.

5650. And, you say, it is understood that he must proceed against the holder?—Yes. He begins by saying "The bill you hold is a forgery." In Terrien Lib. xii. chap. xxviii. p. 504, is a great deal about it.

The passage was read as follows.

Au Style de la Court de Parlement.

Inscription de faux. Aucun n'est receuable à alleguer fausseté en la Cour, s'il ne maintient apud acta en personne, ou par Procureur specialement fondé, la piece produite fausse. Et se doit, en ce faisant, inscrire comme accusateur, et bailler les moyẽs de fausseté dedans trois jours: lesquels sont mis par devers ladite cour, sans communiquer, et par elle jugez s'ils sont admissibles ou non. S'ils sont jugez admissibles, l'accusateur est receu à informer sur le contenu par information secrette non communiquee, sans appeler partie à voir jurer tesmoins, L'information faite est rapportee; et si par icelle les faicts contenus esdits moyens semblent prouvez et verifiez, le Notaire, et la partie et autres coulpables de la fausseté, sont adjournez à comparoir en personne, ou prins au corps, à la discretion de la Cour. Et s'ils comparent, sont enquis, examinez et interroguez. Et s'ils n'alleguent faicts et raisons probables et apparens pour soustenir la piece veritable, est procedé extraordinairement, et le procez parfait, la fausseté déclarée. Et si par l'interrogatoire ils alleguent moyens, raisons et excuses apparens, les dits moyens de fausseté leur sont communiquez, et y respondent: et, sur les faicts hinc inde contestez, est fait enqueste et examen de tesmoins, sur lequel se donne le jugemẽt. Et si les moyens de fausseté ne sont trouvez suffisans pour faire declarer l'acte faux, aucunes fois ils suffisent pour contredire, impugner et debattre la piece. Et en ce cas, ils emportent effect de contredict et sont communiquez à la partie qui baille salvations. Sin autem, lesdits moyens sont rejettez, et la partie condamnée és dommages, et interests, et en l'amende.

5651. Does the passage in Terrien contemplate the proceedings commencing in a civil demand?—I conceive it does.

GUERNSEY.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

October 8th, 1846.

5652. The Bailiff. This proceeding is as nearly as possible the same as in the modern French law. I will hand the Commissioners a book which in a very few lines explains the nature of the proceeding (handing the same to the Commissioners). In France it is primarily a proceeding in rem.

5653. The Contrôle. By the note* to the passage of Terrien cited by Mr. MacCulloch, it appears that the party producing an instrument objected to as forged is permitted to abandon it without any criminal proceedings, unless it is alleged that he has forged it, or that he offered it knowing it to be forged.

5654. The Bailiff. The attack either of the instrument or the supposed forger would suspend the action.

Mr. MacCulloch. The law appears to me to embrace a proceeding both against the instrument and against some party. I know no case in which the instrument alone has been gone against. It has always been, within my experience, a proceeding against some party connected with the instrument.

5655. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Supposing a man should prove the bill to be false, but should fail in establishing forgery against an individual: what effect would that have upon the civil suit?—It would destroy the effect of the instrument in a civil suit.

5656. Would not the Court satisfy themselves with acquitting the prisoner?—If they did, I imagine it would be considered tantamount to declaring the instrument good.

5657. But may not the accused be acquitted, though there may be the clearest proof that the instrument is bad?—Then, I consider, there would be a special finding in reference to the suit which had been interrupted by the criminal incident.

5658. Would that special finding prevent the holder of the bill from asserting its genuineness?—Yes.

5659. Suppose the bill were never presented, but the holder attempted to destroy it. Could the party whose signature had been forged be a witness on the charge for attempting to destroy the bill?—I conceive not. In one of two cases the party was admitted, and in the other he was rejected.

5660. Is the later case the one in which he was rejected?—

5661. The Bailiff. In the later case, it arose incidentally to the civil proceeding.

5662. The Contrôle. In the first case, it was a regular proceeding for forgery; it was the case of Faulkner in 1842 or 1843. There the document had been discounted; but there was no civil proceeding. The person whose signature had been forged was admitted as a witness. The second case is a regular case of l'inscription de faux.

5663. In the case of Faulkner, the party whose name was forged was admitted to prove the forgery, was he?—Yes. I think there are other cases.

5664. Mr. MacCulloch. I think there are some to the contrary.

5665. The Contrôle. In the case of Le Sauvage, the question was this. The name had been written by the party himself: but there was a blank above the name; and Le Sauvage wrote upon it a note of hand. There he was admitted also.

5666. Was that a case where there had been no civil action?—No: there was a civil action brought upon the document; and it was upon that the question arose.

5667. When did the case of Le Sauvage occur?—In February, 1829. There is also the case of Smith; which was a forgery upon the National Bank of Ireland. I know the clerks of the Bank came over. The plate was forged, and the signature of the manager; and he came over to prove that it was not the plate of the Bank, and that the person purporting to sign as manager was a fictitious person.

5668. Mr. MacCulloch. With respect to the 9th of George the 4th, c. 32, a difficulty, which has been already referred to, also arises. The question is whether that Act extends to this Island or not.

5669. The Bailiff. And also whether it extends to such a proceeding or not.

5670. Mr. MacCulloch. Both questions arise.

5671. The Contrôle. The Act had not been registered here before Faulkner's case.

5672. The Bailiff. In the last case, it was decided that the Act did not apply to proceedings in this Island.

5673*b*. To what extent does the practice go?—If an objection is made to an individual, as a witness, on the ground that he has given advice, it is generally left to the oath of the party whether he has given advice or not; and the Court judges according to the circumstances.

5674. That could hardly arise, could it, in a case of criminal proceeding?—No; but it arises sometimes in a case en adjonction. A person, for instance, who has accompanied the party to his counsel repeatedly for the purpose of instructing him would not be considered a competent witness. I think that doctrine has been pushed rather far in civil cases and cases en adjonction. "Aveugles ne sourds ne peuvent porter tesmoignages." I do not see why a blind man should not be a very good witness as to what he has heard, or a deaf man to what he has seen.

5675. Is it considered to be the law here that a blind or deaf person cannot be a witness?—I think it is not followed. I have known deaf witnesses frequently examined here.

---

* The passage in the note referred to is as follows. "Mais le produisant est receu à se desister de l'usage de l'instrument argué de faux: pourveu qu'il ne soit maintenu que luy-mesme a falsifié l'instrument, et qu'il ne soit jà informé de la falsité."

5676. Many objections to the law of evidence appear to have been got rid of. Are there not others in which you are met by the objection that you must go to the Privy Council in order to remove them?—Yes. Objections have not been got rid of by any Ordonnance, but by a series of decisions.

5677. Perhaps it would not be too much to say that your law of evidence is altogether in an unsatisfactory state?—That is my opinion most decidedly. There also appears to be a doubt whether "femmes" can be witnesses in criminal cases, though in practice they are always admitted.

5678. The Bailiff. It appears to me that the whole of these objections might be got rid of. There is only one point upon which I should have any doubt. I would state that the Chief Pleas have taken one step with respect to an Ordonnance for admitting the evidence of relatives beyond the degree of brother and sister. Had we been left to ourselves, that would have been proceeded with: but we thought other proceedings would be necessary, and it was left. My own opinion is that it ought to go further. My only doubt is whether you should not retain the exception as far as it relates to parent and child. And my reason for making that limitation is that I find, with all persons with whom I have conversed, so very strong a feeling upon that subject. The Commissioners will perceive that, inasmuch as the Ordonnance only went to admit the evidence of relatives beyond the degree of brother and sister, the opinion I have expressed is very far from being the uniform opinion of the Court.

5679. (To Mr. Carré.) Would you think it unsafe to carry the limitation further than was proposed in the Ordonnance referred to?—It is generally considered so. My own feeling, from what I have seen occurring here, is that the evidence of such near relations as parent and child and brother and sister is not safe to rely on. And, moreover, that it is putting the parties in a position in which their conviction of right and their feelings of affection are at variance.

5680. Mr. Jeremie. Here, you can admit father and son against but not for each other. I think, if you lay down a rule, it would be well to make it absolute in both cases.

5681. The Bailiff. I would wish to call attention to the circumstance that no part of this chapter of Terrien relates to a witness having evidence to give. I think it only relates to Jureurs, Recognitors and Témoins de certain. These latter were not witnesses, properly so called, but those who came to support the plaintiff in his complaint. They only swore "Je le vu et ouy et suis prest d'en faire l'esgard de la Cour." I have seen and heard, and will abide the award of the Court. Till this had been done the defendant was not called on to plead. But after he was obliged to desrene and bring with him witnesses of credence. The témoins de certain were only the secta of the plaintiff, and gave a sort of certificate of the plaintiff's cause of action. They are the same as the testes fideles mentioned in Magna Charta, ch. xxviii. "Nullus Ballivus de cætero ponat aliquem ad legem manifestam simplici loquelâ suâ sine testibus fidelibus ad hoc inductis." At the time of the Coustumier no witnesses were heard at the bar. That will appear very clearly from comparing the Coustumier, chapters lxix. and cxxiii.

5682. Mr. MacCulloch. When Terrien wrote, it is evident that he applied the phrase "témoins de certain" to witnesses in a cause. That appears from Lib. ix. chap. xxxi., page 383.

5683. You were going on a former occasion to say something respecting the récusation des Juges?—Terrien, Lib. ix. chap. xx., p. 365, refers to this subject. The Approbation says: "Nous usons du dixseptiesme Chapitre. Nous n'usons du dixhuitiesme. Nous usons du dixneufiesme Chapitre et aussi du vingtiesme Chapitre quand à la récusation des juges, s'il y a cause raisonable." The whole chapter is exceedingly vague. In practice, it is held that no Jurat can judge in a cause, if he stands, to either of the parties in civil cases or to the defendant in criminal cases, in the same degree of relationship as would render him incompetent as a witness. That is the general principle: and this principle appears to be more or less sanctioned by an Order in Council of the 19th of May, 1709, which I beg to hand in.

The same is read as follows.

Le xiv^me^ jour du mois de Janvier l'an mille sept-cents neuf, devant Mr. Le Lieutenant Bailly, présens, Messrs. James De Beauvoir, Thomas De Lisle, Wm. Le Marchant, Pierre Martin, Charles Andros, James Careye, Jean Andros, et Daniel De Beauvoir, Jurés.

L'Ordre suivant ayant été produit deuant la Cour; après lecture d'iceluy, il a été ordonné qu'il sera enregîtré, le teneur duquel ensuit mot après mot.

At the Court of St. James, the 19th of May, 1709. Present, The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, in Council.

Upon reading this day at the Board a Report from the Right Honourable the Lords of the Committee for the affairs of Guernsey and Jersey in the words following, (viz.) "Her Majesty having been pleased by her Order in Councill of the 19th of Aprill last to referr to this Committee the humble petition of Lawrence Martin and John Saumarez, of Guernsey, merchants, relateing to a cause depending before the Royal Court of that Island against Michael Falla and Daniell Naftell, touching the disposeall of two prizes taken by the Marlborough privateer of that Island, wherein it so happened that so many of the magistracy were recused as to leave only the Lieutenant Bailliff and one of the Jurates; whereby there was not a sufficient number left to hear and determine the said cause, according to the laws and customs of that Island, and therefore the same was transmitted to this Board: Their Lordships, this day, taking the matter into consideration, and having summoned the Lieutenant Bailiff and four of the Jurats of that island who were in Town, to consider of the most proper expedient in such cases, that there might be no stop of justice for the future, do agree, upon the wholle matter, humbly to report their opinion to Her Majesty, that, not only in this but in all other causes where the partyes recuse the Magistracy, there shall be at least three left to judge the cause; and therefore, if the recusations shall be like to lessen this number of three, then the objections of Cousen Germains, in such case only, shall not be a sufficient recusation, so that justice may go on and the cause come to a hearing to entitle the partyes to appeal to Her Majesty if they think fitt; but, where a full quorum can be had unrecused, then the formes and proceedings shall stand as before.

Her Majesty in her Privy Councill approveing the said Report was pleased to order, as it is hereby accordingly ordered: That, not only in the cause afore mentioned but in all others for the future where the party recuse the Magistracy, there shall be at least three left to judge the cause; and therefore, if the recusations shall be like to lessen this number of three, then the objection of Cousin Germains, in such case only, shall not be a sufficient recusation, so that justice may go on and the cause come to hearing, to intitle the parties to appeal to Her Majesty if they think fitt; but, where a full quorum can be had unrecused, then the formes and proceedings shall stand as before. Whereof the Bayliff and Jurats of Her Majesty's Royall Court of Guernsey, and all others whom it may concerne, are respectively to take notice of this Her Majesty's pleasure, and govern themselves accordingly."

(Signed) JOHN POVEY.

5684. Does "récusation des Juges" apply in criminal matters?—Yes.

5685. Have you known any such objection taken in criminal matters?—Yes.

5686. Is not there some récusation in consequence of the mutual relationship of the Jurats to each other?—I have never known of any.

5687. Is there none in the law?—None strikes me at this moment.

5688. The Bailiff. There is a regulation, I believe, that father and son shall not be Jurats at the same time. There was a case in 1629, in which that rule was infringed by the Governor of the day. The son having been elected, and it being required that he should be sworn in, the Court took a long time to consider it: and he was sworn in upon condition that the father and son should never sit in Court together. The acte of Court is motivé by this fact, that the father had been bed-ridden for three years and was never likely to sit in Court again. The Court gave the oath to the son upon those conditions. The son died shortly afterwards; and never sat in Court himself. The following are the proceedings in the case.

The same were read as follows.

Le 10 May, 1628.

La Cour s'estant, Mercredy dernier, 7e du présent mois, assemblée en corps et transportée au domicile de Monsr. Nathanael Darel, Esqr. Lieut. Governeur, l'ayant adverti de la nécessité d'admettre des Justiciers au siége pour fournir les places vacantes: Il auroit ésté appointé d'être ce jour d'hui procédé à l'eslection des dits Sieurs Jurés, mandement ayant été envoyé aux Connétables et Douzeniers des paroisses des comparoir ce jour d'huy en Cour pour y estre procédé suivant l'ordre de Messrs. les Commissaires Royaulx, confirmé par les très honorables Seigneurs du Conseil Privé de Sa Majte.: La dite Cour à ceste fin assemblée, et, les dits Connestables et Douzeniers venus exprès, s'est présenté l'avant dit Sr. Lieut. Gouverneur, lequel a déclaré qu', avant que procéder plus oultre, il se fist admission de loy de ceulx qui avoient eu la pluralité des voix en la dernière élection. Et la Cour, considérant qu'en icelle eslection la dite pluralité estoit tombée sur le Pierre Careye, Junr., dequel le père, Monsr. Pierre Careye Senr., Justicier, est encore vivant, et que par la coûtume de Normandie, conforme à l'ancienne pratique du pais, le père et le fils ne peuvent exercer pareilles charges en mesme jurisdiction, a esté d'advis que le dit Careye ne pouvoit estre admis en icelle charge, et qu'elle debvoit passer à une nouvelle eslection. A quoy le dit Sr. Lieutenant s'étant formellement et publiquement opposé, jusqu'à en appeler les officiers du Roy et l'audience a tesmoing, la dite Cour, en esgard tant au bien du service de Sa Majte. qu'au repos public, a suppercédé de passer oultre à la dite eslection jusqu'à en avoir eu redresse de Sa Majte. et des susdits très honorable Seigneurs de son Conseil privé.

Le 23 May, 1629.

Sur l'eslection par cy-devant faite de la personne de Mr. Pierre Careye, Junr., fils de Mr. Pierrre Careye, Senr., à la charge et office de Justicier, la Cour ayant différé de l'admettre en la dite charge, à raison que, son dit père estant a présent le premier Justicier du Siege, le dit Sr. Careye, le fils, par la coûtume de Normandie et practicque ancienne du pais n'y pouvoit être admis, durant la vie de son dit père, toutefois ayant sur ce conféré avec Monseignr. le Gouverneur, touchant la dite difficulté, et considéré que le dit Sr. Careye le père est à présent (à cause de son vieil aage) tellement alicté qu'il n'y a apparence aulcune qu'il puisse jamais être cappable d'exercer sa dite charge, auroit esté finallement conclud que le dit Sr. Careye, Junr, seroit admis et sermenté en la dite charge de Justicier, pourveu toutefois que les dits Srs. Careye père et fils, au cas que son dit père seroit par cy-apprès cappable de l'exercise de la dite charge, ne pourront s'assoir ensemble au siège de judicature; mais lors que le père y seroit assis le fils ne s'y pourroit assoir; n'y ne pourront passer et signer ensemblemt. eux deux seuls aulcuns contracts ou marchés obligatoires. Et à ces conditions a présentement esté le dit Sr. Careye, le fils, reçu et sermenté à la dite charge et office de Justicier en ceste dite Cour et Isle de Guernezey, comme à telle charge appartient, après y avoir esté esleu et admis comme dit est.

5689. Mr. MacCulloch. The Order in Council applies principally to cases of appeal, in which there must be seven Jurats present. Of course that would apply to criminal cases equally.

5690. May a prisoner on his trial object to a Jurat on the ground of his having a prejudice against him, or having expressed an opinion upon his case?—I have never known that objection taken in criminal cases.

5691. Is it allowed in civil cases?

The Contrôle. I recollect one case in which it was raised. That was the case of the late Bailiff, Mr. Brock, who was said to have written some letter about Mr. Le Cotillier. Mr. Le Cotillier had some case coming on immediately after; and he recused the Bailiff: and the Court disallowed the récusation, which made a strong impression at the time.

5692. Mr. MacCulloch. In strictness, I think the récusation should be made in writing; and, if the party fails in establishing it, he is condemned generally to a fine of ten livres. I have often known that insisted on.

5693. Mr. Jeremie. I can mention a case in which a party was not recused, but he recused himself.

5694. There is a great deal of old law in the Coustumier, is not there, with regard to the challenge of witnesses? Would the law there apply to the challenge of Jurats as well?—It is difficult to say; but, I think, in practice, everything which would be held to apply to witnesses would be held to apply to Jurats.

5695. Mr. De Courcy. I recused the Bailiff and two Jurats in a criminal case; and it was overruled.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

October 8th, 1846.

5696. What did you recuse them for?—Their being parties themselves.

5697. They could not well be parties to a criminal proceeding, could they?—It was for advising. They took a deep interest in my welfare at that period. I succeeded in preventing Bailiff Brock sitting in an action which I brought against himself.

5698. Rev. Daniel Dobrée. I beg leave to mention a case in which I recused no less than seven Judges, because they were blood relations of my opponents. I speak of the fellowship case. That was disallowed; and I was condemned. So anxious was my opponent, Mr. Carey, that counsel should not be heard on my side, that he retained my counsel, Mr. MacCulloch, at two hours' notice; and I had to plead my own cause. All the counsel were engaged.

5699. Mr. De Havilland. That was not a judicial proceeding, but a question of patronage on an election.

5700. (To Mr. MacCulloch). At what stage must an objection to a Jurat be taken?—In limine, as soon as the cause is read, and before any statement is made.

5701. Before the Cour du quartier, a person comes forward to make a complaint; what would be the case there?—He would be bound to state, "Before I make my complaint, I object to so and so." Supposing a charge to be brought in a police court, the constable says, "Here is such a man, I have a charge against him;" he must make his objection immediately.

5702. We understand the proposed alteration of the law as to the admission of relatives as witnesses has been discussed here a good deal?—Yes.

5703. Will the gentlemen present, who are members of the Bench and Bar, favour us with their opinion on the subject. (To Mr. Retilley.) What is your opinion upon it?—I think that to admit indiscriminately every one to give evidence would be productive of a great deal of feeling. We live here in a state of society very different from that of England: and, I think, if the law of evidence were extended to all relationships, it would be productive of great evil, inasmuch as, having their feelings of relationship brought in contact with people's sense of duty, it would give rise to a great deal of false swearing.

5704. Are you against enlarging the circle at all?—No. I think the Court has done it in certain cases. In the case of breach of promise of marriage for instance.

5705. Are you against enlarging it as far as the degree of brother; admitting cousins, but excluding brothers?—Yes; adopting the French laws.

5706. Mr. Le Marchant. I should not like to receive the evidence of a father against his children, or a brother against his sister. I think you might go as far as first cousins.

5707. Mr. Métivier. My feelings are very strong upon that subject. I should be very sorry to see the law of evidence extended so far as to oblige father and children, brother and sister, or even, in this country, uncles, to be witnesses against each other.

5708. When you say uncles should you add cousins?—No; I should have no objection to admit cousins; but I should not like to go beyond that. In this community, we often find that uncles stand in the place of parents.

5709. Mr. De Havilland. I am convinced, if you were to extend the limits beyond first cousins, not only would parties have their feelings a good deal hurt, but it would break peace among families. I think it would break that union which has hitherto prevailed.

5710. Mr. MacCulloch (Jurat). I think it might be extended to admit first cousins; but not beyond.

5711. Mr. Jeremie. I entirely agree in what has been stated by these gentlemen respecting extending the admission of evidence to father, son, brother, nephew and uncle. By our mode of proceeding in criminal cases, the utmost facility is already given to parties for arriving at the truth; and, if they cannot get at it without having recourse to those persons of so near an affinity, they leave the presumption against their own testimony.

5712. You would let one brother kill another, and the third brother see it, and not be able to give evidence of the fact?—At present we admit a brother against a brother, and not for him. I think they ought to be excluded in all cases.

5713. The Bailiff. You cannot compel him to give evidence for the Crown; but he is inadmissible to give evidence for the defence.

5714. The Procureur. In this Island, all relations are admitted in what are called causes de mariage. In criminal matters, I think it would be the greatest misfortune for this Island to oblige brother or sister to declare against each other.

5715. The Contrôle. I should wish the Court to be put in possession of whatever evidence there is. I think the objections taken by these gentlemen are not half so injurious as the contrary. I think it is better the Court should be put in possession of whatever evidence there is, and let them weigh it.

5716. You agree with Mr. MacCulloch?—Yes.

5717. The Procureur. With respect to trying several persons together, if we had no interrogatory, I think it might be done; but I see great difficulty in trying three or four persons together, and reading all their interrogatories, because those interrogatories would naturally have the effect of evidence.

5718. Mr. MacCulloch. They have the effect of evidence now. When the last man is tried, the interrogatories of the others have been already read: and they have made an impression upon the mind of the Court.

5719. The Contrôle. I believe there have been many cases in which acquittals have taken place, in which, if they had been all tried together, the accused would have been convicted.

5720. Mr. Métivier. Three soldiers were brought here accused of an assault. They gave in their interrogatories, and stated facts which were evidently incorrect; but that had no effect upon the minds of the Judges of the Court. We took the evidence as it came before us.

Adjourned.

John Le Marchant, Esq., Jurat. October 9th, 1846.

5721. The Commissioners understand you wish to address some remark to them?—I wish to mention that, having been a partner in the bank, on no occasion have I judged in any case in which the bank was in any way interested: and, I believe, I may safely add that there is not a Jurat who ever judges in any case in which he is at all interested.

5722. (Mr. Jeremie.) I have never yet had occasion to challenge a Jurat. The fault in that respect is that they find their consciences moved much too soon. They challenge themselves.

5723. (William Bryce.) The fact is it has been considered a decided insult by the Court to challenge their opinions; and men, for fear of being marked men and called black sheep, have been afraid to do so.

5724. Can you say that you yourself have been afraid to take any steps of that sort?—Yes; I decidedly do.

5725. (The Bailiff.) Here are the proceedings (producing the same) to inquire by what authority the Court of Sark usurped to have a Bailiff and Jurats there.

The following documents were delivered in and read.

Acte de la Cour Royale de Guernsey.

Chefs Plaids, S$^{t}$. Michael, 1581, par Nicholas Carey, Juge délégué, présents, etc.

"Il est ordonné qu'il sera signifié à Hélier de Carteret, Fermier de l'Isle de Serk, par le prevôt de la Majesté, de comparôitre en cette Isle par devant Justice, pour cognoistre de quelle autorité Jurés Justiciers et autres officiers ont été établis en la dite Ile, et pour rendre raison d'autres fautes commises en la dite Ile, suivant la suite et demande du Procureur de la Majesté."

Le 28$^{e}$ Mai, 1582, devant Tho$^{s}$ Wigmore, Baillif, présents, etc.

"S'est présenté le Procureur de la Majesté, lequel nous a remontré qu'en l'Ile de Serk, laquelle est parcelle et membre de cette Ile de Guernsey, on auroit érigé et établi une jurisdiction d'un Baillif et de douze Jurés et autres officiers en icelle, et qu'il n'est loisible à aucun sujet, sans l'autorité du Prince, d'ériger ou établir aucune telle jurisdiction, et partant nous a requis sur ce d'y pourvoir et donner ordre: Sur quoi a été ordonné, par Justice, que Mons$^{r}$ le Bailif de cette Ile et quatre de la Justice se transporteroient en la dite Ile de Serk ensemble, et les officiers de la Majesté, pour faire inquisition des prémisses."

Le 31$^{e}$ jour du moye de May, l'an 1582, par devant Thomas Wygmore, Baillif: présents: à ce, Nicollas Carey, André Henry, Thomas Le Marchand, et Jean Andros, Jurés—Lessquels s'estoyent transportez en l'Ile de Serk pour faire inquisition suivant la remonstrance du Procureur de Sa Majesté; ont comparu les habitants de la dite Isle de Serk, lesquels, après leurs Serments estants enquis et examinez, et ayant produit le livre qu'ils gardoyent, a été trouvé qu'en la dite Isle de Serk un, nomé Edouard De Cartheret, estoyt Baillif, et onze autres des habitants estoyent Jurés (le douzième estant puis naguèrres décédé). Item y avoit autres officiers, come Sergeant de l'espée, un Sergent ordinaire, un Procureur, tant pour la Majesté que pour Phl. De Cartheret, un Centenier, un Connétable et deux Vingteniers, et autres, lesquels avoyent esté choisis et posez aux dites offices par Phles. De Cartheret, du consent d' Hellier De Cartheret son père, l'an 1579, le 27$^{e}$ jour du moye d'Octobre, et qu'ils usoyent des lois et coûtumes de l'Ile de Gerzey, et des poys et mesures d'icelle, et mesme que, s'il advenoyt aucune cause d'importance entr' eux, qu' ils auroyent sur ce l' advis et conseil des Jurés et autres gens ssavants de l'Isle de Gerzey, et aussi que les amendes de la dite Court, combien qu'elles fussent adjugées à la Majesté de la Royne, estoyent appliquées au profit du dit Phle. De Cartheret.

"Sur quoy a esté ordonné que le dit Edouard De Cartheret, et deux de ceux qui estoyent establis pour Jurés, viendroyent présentement par devant la Justice de l'Isle de Guernezey, répondre au procès du Procureur de sa Majesté, et rendre raison de quelle autorité ils avoyent érigé icelle jurisdiction, rejettant la Court Royalle de la dite Majesté en l'Isle de Guernezey, et s'attribuer l'autorité d'icelle, et en partie la transporter et différer en l'Isle de Gersey."

6726. Mr. Mac Culloch (Advocate). In consequence of that proceeding, two of the five self-elected Jurats were imprisoned: and then, afterwards, the Court was regularly constituted. Then, in the reign of Charles the Second, the Jurats were done away, and the Seneschal substituted. I have here several documents relating to Sark, which I will hand to the Commissioners.

Le 2$^{e}$ Juin, 1582; devant Thomas Wigmore, Baillif: Présents, etc.

"A comparu Edouard de Carteret et deux de ceux qui lui assistoient en l'Ile de Serk, comme Jurés: auxquels à été proposé par le Procureur de la Majesté qu' ils eussent à enseigner de l' autorité par vertu dont ils auroient été établis et posés à leurs offices; et, en ne montrant valable autorité, qu'il plût à Mons$^{r}$ le Baillif et la Justice les faire constituer prisonniers, comme usurpateurs de l'autorité Royalle de la Majesté, et contemneurs de la Cour et jurisdiction de Sa Majesté en cette Ile établie et approuvée, dont icelle Ile de Serk est dépendante. Et, partant, a été ordonné par Justice, après que le dit Edouard de Carteret n'a sceu montrer aucune autorité valable, et que le dit Carteret et ses associés ont usurpe l'office de Baillif et Jurés, que le dit Edouard Carteret sera constitué prisonnier, comme usurpateur d'une office et charge publique en la dite Ile de Serk, étant dépendante du Gouvernement et jurisdiction de cette Ile de Guernsey, comme peut apparoître par les gracieuses Lettres Patentes de la Majesté de la Reine, nôtre Souveraine Dame, du premier et deuxième an de son noble Regne, et par les Lettres Patentes de ses nobles Progeniteurs concernant les privilèges de cette Ile, et même par les Lettres Patentes des Capitaines et Gouvernours de cette Ile de Guernesey, qui ont été de tems en tems, dont mémoire d'homme n'existe du contraire. Et, quant au deux, qui lui assistoient comme Jurés, en considération que la dite Ile de Serk est bien peu peuplée, leur avons permis retourner à leurs maisons, leur étant deffendu d'exercer aucune office de Baillif et Jurés en la dite Ile, jusqu' à autre ordre ait été pris sur la dite affaire."

"A tous ceux qui ses présentes Lettres verront ou orront, Thomas Wigmore, Baillif, en l'Ile de Guernsey, de nôtre Souveraine Dame, Elizabeth, par la Grâce de Dieu, Reine d'Angleterre, France et Ireland, Défenseure de la foi, etc., Salut en Dieu. Sçavoir faisons que par-devant nous, en la Ville de Saint Pierre Port, en la dte Ile, le 18e Juin, l'an de grâce, 1582, et en présence de Jean Blondel, Nicolas de Sausmarez, Nicolas Le Mesurier, Nicolas Carey, Jean de la Cour, Guillme Beauvoir, Thomas Blondel, Edward le Febvre, Andrè Henry, Thos Marchand, et Jean Andros, Jurés de la Cour Royale en la dite Ile, sur le propos et déclaration du Procureur de la Majesté de la Reine: lequel nous a demontré, comme Ph. de Carteret, de la succession et eschaette d'Hélier de Carteret, son père, défunt, lequel, en son vivant, auroit obtenu de Sa Majesté l'Ile de Serk, parcelle et membre de cette Ile de Guernesey, en payant une certaine rente annuelle à la recette de Sa Majesté, en cette dite Ile, avec les services et droits seigneuriaux, est par conséquent tenu d'en faire et rendre foi et homage, aussi que le dit Procureur dit et prétend être contenu ès Lettres Patentes de Sa Majesté que le dit de Carteret porte touchant les prémisses; et d'autant que n'a encore fait ni offert de faire homage, ni payer les droits, qui de droit, à cause de ce, sont dus au Gouverneur de Sa Majesté en cette Ile de Guernesey, de laquelle la dite Ile de Serk est dépendante. Pour préserver et garder le droit et prérogtif Royale de sa Majesté, le dit Procureur nous a requis et démandé possession et saisine de la dite Ile, pour n'avoir accomplis les choses susdites, laquelle lui a été concedée et accordée de Justice, suivant les loix et coûtumes sur ce usitées en cette dite Ile, entendu que le dit Ph. de Carteret sera oui, en toutes ses justes oppositions, réponses, et défenses, si aucunes en avoit, lesquelles il pourroit ci-après alléguer à l'encontre du dit Procureur; et en cas que le dit de Carteret ne seroit tenu et sujet quant aux choses sudites, adonc la dite saisine sera de nullité, ni de force ou vertu en manière quelconque.

"Item, Le 19e du dit mois et an, par-devant le dit Baillif, et en présence de Nics Carey et Andrè Henry Jurés de la dite Cour Royale, en la dite Ile, fut présent Jean de Sausmarez, comme Prevôt de la Majesté de la Reine, en l'Ile de Guernesey, et autres à icelle adjacentes, lequel notifia avoir baillé et délivré, par vertu de son office, possession et saisine aux officiers de sa Majesté, sçavoir est de la dite Ile de Serk et ses appartenances, et des fruits, rentes, et revenus quelconques, qui, en icelle, pourroient appartenir à Ph. de Carteret, en toute la dite Ile de Serk: et est accordant à l'Acte de Justice sus-écrite."

5728. "Le 21e Juillet, 1582; par devant Thomas Wigmore, Bailif: présents, &c.

A la requête et supplication d'Edouard de Carteret, lequel étoit constitué prisonnier au chateau Cornet, comme apparoit par les procédures sur ce passées, a été le dit de Carteret admis à sortir de prison sur pleiges, lesquels il a présentement amenés en Justice, à sçavoir, Jean de la Marche, fils Jean, et Cardin Fantrart, lesquels se sont obligés en Justice aux officiers de Sa Majesté, corps pour corps, et biens pour biens, pour le dit Edouard de Carteret, de le rendre en Justice toutes fois et quantes, dans quinze jours après qu'ils en seront avertis par les officiers, pour répondre en la cause pour la quelle il avoit été commis en prison."

5729. "Ordres, Loix et Usages appointez et commandez aux habitans de l'Ile de Serk par authorité Royale, comme ensuit, et ci établies, le 24e jour du mois d'Avril, 1583, pour icelles inviolablement observer."

"In the matters of controversy, depending between Sir Thomas Leighton, knight, Captain of the Isle of Guernsey, aud Philip de Carteret, Esq., Seigneur of St. Ouen, concerning certain demands made by the said Sir Thomas, on the behalf of the Queen's Majesty, by virtue of his Letters Patent, whereby he claimed martial jurisdiction within the island of Serq, prémière saisine to be paid to her Majesty by the said Philip de Carteret for the said Isle; and concerning other demands of jurisdiction made by the Bailly and Jurats of Guernsey; that it pleased the Lords of the Council to commit the matters in controversy, to her Majesty's Attorney and Solicitor-General, Mr. Serjeant Fleetwood, Mr. Doctor Hamon, and Mr. Thomas Norton, to be by them examined and considered at large, they jointly to certify their opinions in law of the right of the parties severally pretended: Whereupon they returned to their Lordships their opinions in writing, contained in the eighteen following articles; who, after a deliberate consideration had thereof, did allow and ratify the same, and commanded the said articles to be set down, and entered in the Register of Council, as their express order and final determination upon the said matter in controversy, as followeth, viz.:—

"Article 1st. For martial jurisdiction in Sarq, and matters of the office of Captain: We think it to appertain to the Captain in Guernsey, as in Alderney.

"Article 2nd. For the civil jurisdiction in Sarq: We think it convenient that there be five Jurats chosen by the inhabitants of Sarke, unless the people, increasing, shall require a greater number; then, by Her Majesty's Order, to be augmented to seven; and the eldest of the said Jurats to give sentence, as is used in Alderney.

"Article 3rd. These Jurats to hold Pleas and use jurisdiction in Sark, in all causes, as is used in Alderney; and appeals likewise to be from Sark to Guernsey, as to the superior Justice, in all causes as is used in Alderney.

"Article 4th. Item, a Clerk of the Court to keep record of all such matters as shall pass before them; and this Clerk to be always one of the inhabitants, and to be appointed by such authority in Sark as the like is appointed in Alderney, with consent of the Lord of Sark.

"Article 5th. Item, a Prevost that shall serve to plead the Queen's causes, as a Procureur; to arrest as a Prevost; to adjourn and distrain as a Serjeant; and to receive the amercements of the Court; and of such things as he shall receive due to the Queen to yield accompt to the receipt of Guernsey, as the like officer of Alderney doth. This officer to be always one of the Isle of Sark, and to be appointed by such authority in Sark as the like is appointed in Alderney.

"Article 6th. Item, a Conestable and a Vingtenier, inhabitants of Sark, to be chosen by the inhabitants of that Isle, and there to execute their office, in the like manner as the like officers in Alderney.

"Article 7th. For ecclesiastical causes: We think good not to meddle therein, but to refer that wholly to the Bishop of Winchester, to whose jurisdiction all those Isles are annexed.

"Article 8th. For Prémière Saisine: We think that the Seigneur of St. Ouen, Lord of Sark, ought, by his tenure expressed in his Letters Patent, to pay Prémière Saisine to her Majesty for the said Isle of Sark.

"Article 9th. Item, that he is not bound by his tenure to serve to the Court of Cheefe Pleas at Guernsey.

"Article 10th. Item, for wracks of the sea: We think that it apprateneth to the Lord of Sark, by express words in his Letters Patent.

"Article 11th. Item, that Tertia decima, Venditiones Terrarum, apperteneth also to him by his Letters Patent, as also the profit called Firmage.

"Article 12th. Item, touching Conger houze, called among them, 'Esperquerie des Congres:' We think it not convenient to direct such of new, to the burthen of the subjects in Sark, where none of long time hath been, nor to drive the fishermen to bring their fish to the Queen's house in Guernsey, to the discouragement of the people newly drawn there to inhabit that Isle. But, if any such Esperquerie shall be hereafter thought good to be used in Sark, we think it a prerogative belonging and reserved to the Queen, but yet so precisely to be used as is expressed in the Book of Extent.

" Article 13*th.* For Customs of Wares, and for Ancrage: We think the same to belong to the Queen, and to be levied by the Queen's officers to her Majesty's use.

" Article 14*th.* For weights and measures: We think it meet to be referred to the present usage of that Isle of Sark, especially the measures of grains; because, in such manner, their rents of corn are received and paid, and after that form the people be already settled, according to the measure of Jersey; but, the oversight thereof and delivery of standart agreeing with the present measures, We think not meet to refer to any authority in Jersey, but to Guernsey, as in Alderney.

" Article 15*th.* Item: that, in Sark, the inhabitants shall observe the ancient laws and customs confirmed, to be established by her Majesty, as in Alderney.

" Article 16*th.* Item: touching Ordinances, or by-laws to be made for matters within the Island of Sark: We think it convenient to refer to the Lord and the inhabitants of Sark, from time to time, as they shall see necessary for the welfare of that Isle, until your L. L. upon especial complaint shall see cause to take other order.

" Article 17*th.* Touching transportation of grain: because the Island standeth in manner wholy upon tillage, which is to be encouraged, and Guernsey standeth otherwise, both of merchandize, fishing, and artificers, We think it not convenient that the inhabitants of Sark be restrained to the Ordinances of Guernsey, but to their own by-laws, and to the immediate permission or restraint of Her Majesty or Her Council, provided that Sark be not suffered to transport without keeping a convenient quantity, to be limited by your L. L., always in store for victualling the Queen's subjects in the Isle.

" Article 18*th.* For the matters of default, suggested to be committed by the Seigneur of St. Owen against his Patent: because they be matters in fact, they cannot so well be examined by us; but we think meet to be referred to some indifferent Commissioners in those parts.

" And, whereas Philip de Carteret, upon the return of the Commissioners' opinions, did exhibit certain petitions containing in effect the matters following, viz.:

" Pet. 1*st.*—First, that, because the Isle of Sark was parcell of Her Majesty's Dutchy of Normandy, and governed by the ancient laws of that country, whereby no Première Saisine is due, therefore besought their L. L. to discharge him of the payment of the said Première Saisine.

" Pet. 2*nd.*—Secondly, that he might have the government of the people of the Isle of Sark, and the keeping of the artillerie and ammunition there, for the consideration therein specified.

" Pet. 3*rd.*—Thirdly, that there might be a Seal authentical granted by Her Majesty within the said Isle, to serve in causes of common justice arising within the same between partie and partie.

" Pet. 4*th.*—Fourthly, that the L. L. rent, due to Her Majesty for the said Isle of Sark, might be at all times received at Guernsey, when it should be sent thither without delays to be used by the Receiver there; whereby the suppliant was often put to unnecessary charges, attending for the paying thereof.

" Pet. 5*th.*—Lastly, that the inhabitants of the Isle might be suffered to trade and to traffic abroad out of the Isle, as others of Her Majesty's subjects in the rest of the Isles, without empechement or prejudice to your suppliant.

" The consideration of which petitions were, by the L. L. of the Council, committed to the Earl of Leicester and Mr. Secretary Walsingham; and they, upon view of the said petitions, calling the parties before them, did, by authority of the Council, in every of the said petitions, take order as followeth, viz.:—

" Rep. 1*st.*—First, they ordered that the opinion of the Commissioners in the 8th Article concerning Première Saisine should stand, but did mitigate the sum due for the said Première Saisine, reducing the same to Forty Pounds sterling, to be paid at the receit of Guernsey, between the Feast of St Michael the Archangel and All Saints ensuing.

" Rep. 2*nd.*—The matters contained in the 2nd, 4th, and 5th petitions were referred to the discretion of the Captain.

" Rep. 3*rd.*—And the matter of the third petition was denied, as not expedient to be granted.

" Moreover, whereas, in the last Article of the opinions of the Commissioners certified, the default suggested to have been committed by Ph. de Carteret, in not producing the inhabitants to the musters at the time required by the Captain, were thought meet to be referred to some indifferent Commissioners to be examined, being matters de facto; it was, by the said Earl of Leicester and Mr. Secretary, for the difficulties appearing unto them in the choice of indifferent Commissioners to examine the defaults, thought more expedient that the said Philip de Carteret should acknowledge the said defaults, and the Captain remit them unto him, which was accordingly done in the presence of the said Earl and Mr. Secretary."

5730. " Thomas Leighton, Chevalier Captaine Gouverneur Général pour la Majesté de la Reine d'Angleterre, Souveraine de ces Isles de Guernesey, Auregny, Serq, Erm, &c., Nicolas Martin, Lieutenant de Louis Devic, Baillif de la dite Majesté en la dite Isle de Guernesey, Guillaume Beauvoir, Pierre Careye, W^m^. Le Marchant, et Nicolas Martin, fils Nicolas, Jurez; Jean Devic Procureur, Edmond Effart, Prevôt, et James Olivier, Clerk de la Court de Sa Majesté, en la dite Isle de Guernesey: A Tous Ceux à qui ces présentes Lettres parviendront, Salut. Sur ce qu'il a plus à Messeigneurs du très honorable Conseil Privé de Sa Majesté ordonner qu'en l'Isle de Sark, étant membre et relevant de la jurisdiction de la dite Isle de Guernesey, et à laquelle a été annexée temps dont mémoire n'existe du contraire, y auroit une jurisdiction et officiers établis pour l'administration de la justice et police de la dite Isle, comme est porté par l'ordre sur ce fait à Greenwich le 24^e^ Jour d'Avril, 1583; Nous, pour cet effet, étant assemblez en la dite Isle de Serk, avons posé et établi Cour, jurisdiction et officiers en la dite Isle, lesquels officiers ont été jurez et sermentez à leurs dits offices, ainsi qu'à tels cas appartient, étant choisis et approuvez par la généralité des inhabitants de la ditte Isle de Sark.

PREMIER.

Robert Sloley,
Huge de Carteret,
Jean de Carteret,
Thomas Roo,
Lucas Le Masurier,

Ont été sermentez à la charge et office de Jurez et Justiciers de la dite Cour en la dite Isle de Serk, entre lesquels le dit Robert Sloley a été ordonné pour présider comme Juge, ayant été élu le premier Juré, et, en son absence, le second après lui.

"Ils ont été choisis, suivant comme dessus, et sermentez après que les dits habitants en avoient fait élexion, et ce par le consentement du dit S^r.Gouverneur ; Sçavoir, viz. :—

BEN. POINGDEXTRE, Clerk de la Cour.
NOËL VAUDIN, Prevost ou Sergeant.
COLLAS CRISTIN, Connestable.
JEAN NEWEL, Vingtennier.

Du devoir des Jurez et Officiers de la Cour, en la fonction de leurs charges severalles, et des droits appertenant à leurs offices.

PREMIER.

"D'autant que la dite Isle de Serk a été longue espace de tems sans habitation et la mémoire perdue des coûtumes et anciens usages observés pour la police de la dite Ile, est ordonné que les dits Jurez et Officiers conviendront et s'assembleront trois fois l'an, viron le prochain Mercredi après le xxix^me Jour de Septembre, le prochain Mercredi après le xv^me Jour de Janvier, et le prochain Mercredi après le jour de Pasques, pour tenir leurs Chefs Plaids, et qu'à chacun des dits Plaids, les dits Jurez et officiers, par le consent du Seigneur de la dite Isle et de la généralité des habitants, feront telles Ordonnances qu'ils trouveront expédient et nécessaires de tems en tems pour le réglement de la police de la dite Isle.

"En administration de justice useront les dits Jurez des loix et coûtumes approuvez et établies d'authorité de Sa Majesté en la dite Isle de Guernesey, tant conformes aux loix et coûtumes de Normandie, et aux coûtumes localles de la dite Isle de Guernesey approuvez, différentes de la coûtume de Normandie.

"Jugeront les susdits Jurez de toutes causes civiles, tant en cause de meuble que d'héritage, et de toutes matières et actions de Forfaite, Excez, et Injures, par emprisonnements, ou amendes n'excédant la somme de soixante sols et un denier Tournois, pourvu qu'il n'y ait matière de crimes, auxquels cas les dits Jurez seront tenus envoyer, par le Prevôt de la dite Ile, leurs corps avec la cause, à la Justice de Sa Majesté en la dite Isle de Guernesey, pour y procéder, comme sera expédient. Et de ce qui sera fait et passé devant eux en garderont et donneront fidelles records.

"De toutes sentences et jugements des dits Jurez excédant la valeur de dix livres Tournois en meuble et de toute cause en héritage sera libre à un chacun d'en appeller à la Cour Royale de Guernesey.

"De ous marchez et contracts en héritage, qui seront faits et passez par-devant les dits Jurez, les minutes, signez du signe des dits Jurez, seront reçues et approuvez, pour être authentiques, sous le sceau de la Baillye de la dite Isle de Guernesey toutes fois et quantes que les parties le requeront. Et prendront les dits Jurez pour leur devoir, Sçavoir.

5731. "Ordonnance de la Cour Royale de Guernsey pour l'établissement d'une Prison en l'Isle de Sark.

"Le deuxième jour du mois de Novembre, l'an mille cinq-cents nonante-sept, par-devant Louis De Vic, Baillif : présents à ce Nicolas Martin, Senior, Guillaume Beauvoir, Andrè Henry, Jean Andros, Jean Sausmarez, Pierre Beauvoir, Pierre Careye, Nicolas Martin, Jun^r. et George Guille, Jurès ; et en présence de Messire Thomas Leighton, Gouverneur.

"Sur ce que par cy-devant, il nous a été remontré, de la part des officiers soubs Sa Majesté en l'Isle de Sark, que d'autant qu'en l'établissement qu'avons fait (suivant les Ordres en ce posés par mes Seigneurs du Privé Conseil) de la Jurisdiction Royale en la dite Isle, il n'y auroit pour lors été pourvu d'aucune ordre exprès concernant la seure garde et détension de telles Psonnes, qui, pour aucune cause civile au criminelle, auroient encouru et mérité punition d'emprisonnement corporel, en défaut de quoi plusieurs inconvénients seroient advenus, et de plus en plus s'y pourroient accroître, au préjudice du service de Sa Majesté, détriment publicq, et mépris intollérable de Justice, de laquelle toute Administration et exécution seroit entièrement rendue vaine et frustratoire, s'il n'y étoit convenablement pourvu : pour ces cause et raisons très importantes et nécessaires, et après meure et deue considération sur ce prinze : Avons (en l'authorité de nos dites charges soubs laquelle la dite

" Premièrement, qu'au plus brief que faire se pourra, un certain lieu cloz, ou maison de capacité et force suffisante pour une Prison, sera à ceste fin appointée, ou (s'y besoin est) nouvellement bastie, en la dite Isle de Sercq, aux communs fraix d'icelle Isle, au lieu le plus propre et commode, principallement pour la plus sure garde des sus dits prisonniers, par l'advis de Mr. Amyce de Carteret, Escuier, pour le présent ayant la garde de la d^te^ Isle, et Lieutenant général en Icelle, soubs moi, avant dit Gouverneur des d^tes^ Isles, soubs Sa Majesté, et avec le consentement de la Justice du dit lieu.

" Item : Que le dit de Carteret sera tenu, à raison de sa dite charge, selon que de mesme il appartiendra, et sera pareillement pratiqué à l'advenir à l'endroit de tous autres qui aussi tiendront en icelle Isle la principalle place soubs Sa Majesté, selon que la raison, coustume et nécessitè de la chose l'importe : Notoirement en tel cas de pouvoir eslire, pozer, continuer et entretenir ung suffisant officier, lequel par le mesme nom et tiltre qu'icy est accoustumé, à sçavoir de Portier en la dite Isle, y aura la garde d'icelle prison et des dits prisonniers sur la mesme charge et peine que de droit il est porté par les loix et la coustume de cette dite Isle.

" Finallement : Que le dit Officier (ayant esgard à l'importance sus-dite de sa dite charge, laquelle y est d'aultant plus pénible et dangereuse qu'ailleurs, à cause que icelle Isle est présentement destituée d'une forteresse particulière, aura et recevra de chacun prisonnier qui lui sera amené par le Prevôt de la dite Isle, ou en quelqu'autre façon juridiquement commis en charge, tout, tel et le mesme salaire et émollument qu'en tel cas est de présent, ou qui, de temps en autre, sera, légitimement usité et pratiqué en cette dite Isle de Guernesey ; Excepté tout seulement que, pour entrée et pour issue de la prison, il recevra la moitié moins que ne fait le Portier de cette dite Isle.

" Et, afin de pourvoir promptement à la nécessaire exécution des prémisses, nous avons requis l'avant dit Sieur de Carteret, estant pour le présent employé en cette dite Isle au service de Sa Majesté, que, des son prochain retour en sa dite charge, il ait à notifier publicquement ceste présent ordre et faire pourvoir à l'entier effectuem^t^ d'icelle, au plus brief qu'il sera possible."

5732. " Sachent tous que, le douzième jour du Mois d'Aoust, mille six-cents soixante-un, devant M. Jean de Quetteville, Lieutenant d'Amice Andros, Eciuyer, Bailly de l'Isle de Guernesey, sous notre Souverain Sire, Charles deuxième, par la grâce de Dieu Roy d'Angleterre, Ecosse, France, et Irlande, Défenseur de la Foy, etc., et en présence de Messrs. Jean Bréhault, Pierre Carey, James Le Marchant, Guillaume de Beauvoir, Sr. Du Houmet, Jean de Sausmarez, Daniel de Beauvoir, Sr. Du Manoir, Elizée de Sausmarez, et Jean Blondel, Jurez de la Cour Royale en la dite Isle :

" Sur ce que Messire Philipe de Carteret, de l'Isle de Jersey, Seigneur de St. Ouen, etc., Bailly de la dite Isle, et Gentilhomme de la Chambre du Roy, a, ce jour d'hui, proposé à cette Cour que deux certaines Patentes Royales, ottroyées à ses ancestres, touchant l'Isle de Serck, fussent lues en icelle Cour, pour leur communiquer une clause mentionée ès dites Patentes, comme il auroit pleu à la Couronne ottroyer, entre autres choses, à ses dites prédécesseurs que tous contracts d'héritage concernant la dite Isle fussent passès sous le sceau du dit Seigneur de St. Ouen, et que tels passements seroient aussi bons et valables en droit, comme sont contracts passés sous les sceaux des Isles de Guernesey et Jersey : Cette Cour, condescendant à la proposition du dit Seigneur, a fait lire les Chartes sus-dits en pleine audiènce, et, oui sur ce le Procureur de Sa Majesté, à déclaré son opinion estre que le dit Seigneur de St. Ouen poura et peut mettre en exécution les clauses sus-dites des dites Patentes, et que tous tels contrats qui seront passés sous son sceau, suivant la teneur des dites clauses, seront receus en cette Cour comme sont contrats passés sous les sceaux des dites Isles de Guernesey et Jersey ; et que le dit Seigneur pourra aussi mettre sous son dit sceau les contrats d'héritage, qui ont été passés autrement concernant la dite Isle durant les derniers troubles.

" Extrait des Registres.—Es tesmoignage desquelles choses le sceau du Baillage de la dite Isle de Guernesey à ces présentes Lettres est mis et appendu, par nous soussignés, Bailly et Jurés, ce sept jour de Febv^r^, l'an mil sept-cents vingt et huict—Josuè Le Marchant, Baillif. 5733. ACTE. " Le 15e jour de Juillet, 1675, devant Mr. Le Lieutenant Baillif : présents Messrs. Guillaume de Beauvoir et Jean de Sausmarez, Juréz.

" En rendant humble obéissance à certain Ordre de Sa Majesté, en date du XIX^e^ de Mai dernier, addressé à cette Cour, pour sermenter et établir un Séneschall en la Cour et jurisdiction de l'Isle de Serc pour administrer justice aux habitans de la dite Isle : A ces fins a comparu Messire Philippe de Carteret, Baronnet, Seigneur de St. Ouen, et de la dite Isle de Serc, etc., lequel a présenté Mr. Pierre Gibaut, pour estre Séneschall en la dite Isle de Serc, lequel Sr. Gibaut a été ensuite juré et sermenté à la dite place et charge de Séneschall, pour exercer avec même pouvoir et authorité de jurisdiction que les naguères Juges et Juréz de la dite Isle ont eu : lequel Séneschall jouira et percevra les mêmes droits, avantages, profits et émoluments, authorité et dignité que les dits naguères Juges et Juréz de la dite jurisdiction de Serc ont joui et possédé, et qui de droit sont appartenants et dépendants de la dite charge.

" Conformement au susdit Ordre de Sa Majesté, le Sr. Pierre Dobrée à été juré et sermenté à la charge et Office de Prevost de la dite Cour et jurisdiction de Serc, ainsy qu'à telle office appartient, et y ayant été présenté par le susdit Messire Philippe de Carteret, Baronet, Seigneur de la dite Isle."

5734. " Le cinquième Mai, mil huit-cent vingt-sept : devant Daniel de Lisle Brock, Ecuier, Baillif : présens Jean La Serre, Josias Le Marchant, Jean De Lisle, Jean Guille, Jean Le Messurier, Jean Hubert et Pierre Le Cocq, Ecuiers, Jurés.

" La Cour s'étant assemblée le 24e Mars, 1827, pour faire droit sur la requête de Jean Falle, Ecuier, Sénéchal de l'Ile de Serc, au sujet des Chefs Plaids, et de l'exécution des arrêts dans la dite Ile ; et après avoir entendu Pierre Le Pelley, Ecuier, Seigneur, le dit Monsieur Falle, et le Sieur Thomas Godfrey, Prevôt de Serc, ayant remis à un autre jour pour rédiger son Acte, a, ce jour, statué, ouie la conclusion des Officiers du Roi, ce qui suit, de l'acquiescement de toutes les parties.

" 1°. Que, pour prévenir les inconvéniens résultans de l'absence du Seigneur aux Chefs Plaids et de celle du Sénéchal en tous tems, le dit Seigneur nommera, tant un autorisé à le réprésenter en cas d'absence dans les Chefs Plaids de Serc, qu'un Député Sénéchal, qui sera sermenté pour représenter le dit Sénéchal, en cas d'absence aux Chefs Plaids, à la signature des arrêts et autres fonctions de la charge de Sénéchal.

" 2°. Que les Chefs Plaids de Serc se tiendront aux jours indiqués par l'Acte de la Cour Royale, du 16e Juillet, 1594, en présence du Seigneur ou de son autorisé, et du Sénéchal ou de son Député : et ne pourront les dits Chefs Plaids se tenir sans la présence du dit Seigneur et celle du dit Sénéchal, ou sans qu'ils y soient représentés comme dessus.

" 3°. Qu'aux dits Chefs Plaids, seules Assemblées Legislatives dans l'Ile de Serk, toutes les Ordonnances, suivant au 16e article de l'Ordre de Sa Majesté en Conseil, du 24e Avril, 1583, seront passées par le

GUERNSEY.

John Le Marchant, Esq., Jurat.

October 9th, 1846.

Seigneur et les habitans; le Sénéchal, ou son Député, y presideront, en vertu de leur charge, les Officiers de Justice et les habitans; et la narration sur les records de ce qu'y s'est passé commencera par dire que l'assemblée s'est tenue en présence du Seigneur, ou de son autorisé, et par devant le Sénéchal, ou son Député.

"4e. Lors qu'une Ordonnance sera proposée dans l'assemblée par quelqu'un qui y a droit de suffrage, elle y sera discutée, et ensuite mise aux voix des habitans, tenans, par le Sénéchal ou son Député. Si la majorité des voix est en faveur de la dite Ordonnance, le Sénéchal ou Député demandera le consentement du Seigneur, ou de son autorisé, à ce qu'elle passe et aye force de loi. Si ce consentement est donné, il ne pourra plus y avoir d'empêchement à ce qu'elle soit enregîstrée. Si ce consentement se refuse, l'enregîtrement ne pourra avoir lieu; sans préjudice, toutes fois, au droit de représentation des parties aux autorités supérieures.

"5e. Le Seigneur et le Sénéchal, ou leurs représentans, rédigeront avec le Greffier les Actes et Ordonnances passées en Chefs Plaids, que le Sénéchal, ou Député, ne pourra, sous aucun prétexte, refuser ou empêcher d'enregîtrer sur le livre des Records de Serk.

"6e. Quant aux arrêts: le Prevôt n' en exécutera aucun qui ne soit signé du Sénéchal, ou, dans son absence, du Député Sénéchal, à moins qu'ils ne soient l'un et l'autre absens de Serk: il sera alors loisible, sur le serment de la partie qui demande un arrêt, que le Sénéchal et Député Sénéchal sont absens de Serk, ou que l'arrêt et dirigé contre l'un ou l'autre qui y soit resté, au Baillif, Lieutenant Baillif ou Jurés de la Cour Royale, de signer l'arrêt, qui sera exécutoire en Serk de la même manière que s'il étoit signé du Sénéchal ou Député Sénéchal.

"7e. D'autant que les habitans et tenans de Serk n'ont pas été ouïs, et qu'ils peuvent avoir intérêt au présent Réglement, La Cour a ordonné qu', avant de l'enregîtrer, le Greffier de la Cour Royale le transmettra aux Connétables de la dite Ile, qui le mettront devant le dits habitans et tenans, afin de leur donner occasion d'être ouis, s'ils le souhaitent. Et sont le dits Connétables requis de faire savoir au dit Greffier, dans quinzaine après avoir reçu copie du dit Réglement, s'il y a quelqu'un qui demande à être oui devant la Cour Royale en opposition au dit Réglement."

5735. "Aux Chefs Plaids d'après Pâques, tenus le trente Avril, mil huit-cent trente-deux, devant Monsr le Baillif: présens Jean la Serre, etc., Jurés.

"Sur la représentation faite à la Cour par Monsr Elie Le Masurier, Sénéchal de l'Ile de Serk, que le bâtiment, qui d'ancienneté a servi de Prison dans la dite Ile, est dans un tel état de déterioration qu'on ne peut plus en faire usage pour cet objet, et priant la Cour de vouloir bien donner les ordres nécessaires afin qu'il y soit pourvu: La Cour, ayant précédement ordonné aux Connétable et Vingtenier de Serk de consulter les habitans de la dite Ile, et ayant remis à ce jour pour en ordonner définitivement, et après avoir entendu Pierre Le Pelley, Ecr., Seigneur de la dite Ile, et eu lecture d'une lettre du dit Sénéchal de la dite Ile, d'une lettre, en date du 2e Avril, 1832, signée du Sieur Henri de Carteret, Connétable, et du Sieur Henri Drilliot, Vingtenier de la dite Ile, d'une Ordonnance de cette Cour du 2e Novembre, 1597, des Ordres réglementaires pour la jurisdiction de l'Ile de Serk en date du 24e Avril, 1583: A ordonné et ordonne qu'un bâtiment convenable sera érigé dans un lieu sûr, dans six mois de ce jour et date, aux fraix des habitans de la dite Ile, au dire de Jean Guille, Ecuyer, Juré; lequel bâtiment servira de Prison à l'avenir en la dite Ile de Serk. Et, le dit Sénéchal ayant prié la Cour de déclarer le tems pendant lequel, d'après les susdits Ordres réglementaires, le dit Sénéchal a droit d'emprisonnier par voie de punition, a déclaré qu'aucun emprisonnement par voie de punition ne doit excéder trois fois vingt quatre heures; mais que, dans tous les cas qui seroient d'une gravité telle à requéri rau-delà de trois jours d'emprisonnement, le dit Sénéchal sera tenu d'envoyer les accusés par la première occasion à Guernsey, afin d'être produits devant la Cour Royale et qu'elle en ordonne. Et sera la présente Ordonnance transmise à Monsr le Sénéchal de l'Ile de Serk par le Greffier du Roi ou Député, pour qu'elle soit enregitrée et publiée en la dite Ile, afin que personne n' en prétende cause d'ignorance."

Charles De Jersey, Esq., (Procureur de la Reine), examined:—

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

5736. It appears from the answers to question ten of the third series, that the evidence of an accomplice must be confirmed. What extent of confirmation is required?—The best answer I can give you is the answer of the Scotch Law. It may be confirmed by another witness speaking of other circumstances, or by circumstantial or presumptive evidence.

5737. The Contrôle. I know that, in a case in which I was counsel myself, the Court ruled that the testimony of an accomplice alone upon the material facts of the case was not sufficient to convict.

5738. Is it not the case, by your law, that the testimony of one witness is not sufficient to convict?—That has been very much modified of late years.

5739. The Bailiff. The following, from Alison's Criminal Law of Scotland, I think, expresses the idea as fully as anything I know. "Legal evidence, in murder, is founded either on the direct testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness with a train of circumstances, or of such a train of circumstances by themselves, as leave no reasonable doubt in the mind that the pannel was guilty."* I am not aware that, in point of law, there is any distinction between the two cases of an accomplice, as a single witness, and any other person. The only way in which the rule can operate in working is that, if one witness comes to the bar and swears directly, and there is no other evidence given, his testimony cannot convict.

5740. (To the Bailiff.) As a question of law: would the Judge say "Here the testimony of one witness it not sufficient?"—Yes. The rule is Unus testis, nullus testis.

5741. But you think a train of circumstances added to it would do?—Yes.

5742. The train of circumstances must be proved by some one else?—Yes.

5743. That means then that there must be another witness?— The Contrôle. In civil cases, I have seen it happen that, where there has been one witness, the Sergeant or somebody of the Court has been sworn to give some evidence as to his apprehension.

5744. Mr. Carré. That never amounts to proof.

5745. (To the Bailiff.) Is it quite correct that the train of circumstances must be proved by some other person?—It must be a train of facts confirming the evidence already given.

GUERNSEY.

Charles de Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 9th, 1846.

5746. The Procureur. These words in Bell's Dictionary, under the word "Evidence," I think, give an idea of our law better than any thing. "By the law of Scotland no fact can be legally proved, and in criminal cases no conviction can follow on theu nsupported testimony of a single witness, however unimpeachable his credit may be. But, where one witness swears distinctly to a fact, the want of a second witness to the same specific fact may be supplied by a witness to corroborative circumstances; and, in cases of circumstantial evidence only, two witnesses are not required to prove each circumstance of the same transaction." *

5747. May the same witness swear to the corroborative circumstances?—We consider that one witness is never sufficient.

5748. The Bailiff. Sometimes, the facts constituting the corpus delicti being proved by divers witnesses, and the identification of the party accused resting upon one witness, it is a matter of great discussion whether that is enough.

5749. (To the Bailiff.) You do not mean, to satisfy your consciences, but, to satisfy the rule of law?—Yes. I have heard the objection taken; but I do not think it prevails. In the way of dealing with cases here, the French law is very much followed, which looks at two classes of evidence, the one relating to the corps de délit and the other to the person.

5750. The Contrôle. In a case which Mr. Tupper pleaded, since the present Bailiff was appointed, there were a number of counts, and only one witness to several of them: the objection was taken there, and was overruled.

5751. Mr. Carré. I think that one witness is required to prove each circumstance.

5752. The Procureur. The circumstances must corroborate each other. You may take two facts: one person swears he saw a person commit a robbery; another swears that he was seen to sell the goods. There is a corroborating circumstance; and that would be quite sufficient.

5753. (To the Bailiff.) You think that the law is not different in the case of an accomplice and of any other witness?—I do not think the law is different, though there would, of course, be a discretion exercised by the Court.

5754. (To the Procureur.) You state, in your answer to the 14th question of the third series, that "the statements of the party charged, or his conversation with third persons 'en temps non suspect,' are admissible in evidence, either for or against him." What is the meaning of the expression "temps non suspect?"—Before the man is taken up or suspected. I should consider that temps non suspect.

5755. Is his interrogatoire temps non suspect?—No; that speaks for itself. I should take "temps non suspect" to be before he knows there is an accusation against him. I mean this, before he is taken up by the officer or knows that an officer is after him.

5756. The Bailiff. Before he knows he is suspected, I think, would be a much surer definition. The way in which the difficulty would be got over would be this. If, at the time the evidence was given, it appeared that there was any suspicion against the party at the time when the statement was made, it would not be received in evidence. But I will go one point further, and say that the counsel, on the other side, in order to support the objection to the reception of the evidence, might prove that there was a suspicion at the time, and afterwards argue that the statement had no weight because not made "en temps non suspect."

5757. (To the Bailiff.) Would not you have to determine, as an independent fact, the knowledge of the suspicion by the party?—I think not.

5758. (To the Bailiff.) To exclude the declaration of the party is of course a very easy rule; but to say that his statement cannot be evidence in his favour, unless made "in temps non suspect," appears to involve the necessity of trying in every case whether it was so or not?—Perhaps logically it would be so.

5759. (To the Bailiff.) How would it be practically got over?—I think the statement would be admitted; and, if the Court thought afterwards the time was one of suspicion, they would give no weight to it.

5760. That leaves this sort of opening, that the Court may give judgment with no evidence at all or next to none, or they may exclude evidence of the greatest consequence.

5761. (The Bailiff.) It leaves the matter very much to the discretion of the Court.

5762. The Procureur. As a general rule, there is a great deal left to the discretion or to l'arbitrement du Juge in criminal cases. We will suppose the case of a man's being killed. The man is thrown down a precipice. The person, who afterwards is charged with the murder at the moment the man falls, says: "What an accident has happened! Unfortunately I touched this man; and he fell over by accident and was killed." I should consider that temps non suspect; the first moment, before he knew there was an accusation or anything of the sort. But, if that man, after the falling of the person and the killing of him, said, "I hated the fellow, and I gave him a push, and he is dead, and I am glad of it"—that is another case. I should think that would be taken to be a confession of his guilt. And, if it were proved, in the other case, that he had said, at the moment, "It was an accident," anything which would make you suppose that it was an accident would go a long way to clear him.

5763. (To the Procureur.) Suppose the Constable says to the man, "How came you to throw the man off the precipice?" And the man at first says, "I did not do it." And the Constable then says to him, "We have somebody to prove you did;" and he then admits it. Would that be "temps non suspect?"—No; I think it would not be. The Constable would declare it against him, no doubt.

5764. Does not your exposition of the rule shew that whatever the accused has said at any time against himself may be evidence against him, but, in order to admit declarations made by him in his favour, they must have been made in a "temps non suspect?"—It is so.

* Bell's Dictionary of the Law of Scotland, vol. i. p. 579. Tit. EVIDENCE.

5765. The Commissioners, then, would interpret rightly your written answer to question fourteen, if they confined the qualification as to "temps non suspect" to the declaration of the party accused in his own favour?—Exactly.

5766. The Bailiff. Suppose the man were walking out the next morning with a friend, and he said, "As I was going down the road yesterday, I saw a man, and he tumbled over a precipice, and I think he is dead." I apprehend that, that appearing to be a bonâ fide conversation between two persons, would be evidence admissible in the man's favour. Suppose, the next day, the party against whom the accusation is made had had this conversation with his friend: "I understand so and so is dead; my brother saw him fall over the cliff." That would here be admitted as evidence in his favour.

5767. The Procureur. I think that would be admitted as evidence for him.

5768. (To the Contrôle.) You have heard the instance which the Bailiff has just given. Do you think it would come within the rule of evidence "en temps non suspect?"—I think I have heard evidence of that kind given.

5769. Do you agree in the principle?—Yes.

5770. (To Mr. MacCulloch, Advocate.) Do you agree in the instance which the Bailiff has given?—I do; but I think in all those questions a great deal must be left to the discretion of the Court. I have often heard almost every Jurat present say, "I am thoroughly convinced in my own mind that the man is guilty, but I do not think there is legal evidence to convict him."

5771. (To the Contrôle.) Where there is full proof from the confession of the accused, must the corps de délit be proved extrinsically?—Yes.

5772. Suppose such a case as this. A man might be heard to say, "A. B. left the Island last week; before he went I picked his pocket of his watch, and have lost the watch." Would that be sufficient to convict him?—No; the corps de délit must be proved in all cases.

5773. If the prosecutor was there and said, "Somebody, I do not know who, stole my watch," would the corps de délit be proved.—Yes.

5774. The Procureur. That is quite clear from Terrien, lib. xii., chap. xxxv., p. 523. "S'aucun recognoist en lieu commun le crime dont il est suy, luy-mesme se juge et damne. Pourveu que le crime soit verifié et qu'il n'apparoisse de l'erreur de la confession."

5775. (To the Procureur.) It would not be enough that the man was proved by half a dozen witnesses to have declared "I have stolen, and since lost, the watch of a man who has left the Island?"—No.

5776. When parties are in confinement under a charge of crime, has any body access to them"?—Yes.

5777. Who are the parties who have a right to see them?—After they are committed for trial, of course, their counsel has a right to see them; and any of their friends are admitted to see them and speak to them, in the hours from ten in the morning till two in the afternoon.

5778. Have the constables and the members of the police access to them?—Yes.

5779. Would the counsel of the accused have access to him at all times?—Yes; there is no difficulty.

5780. Mr. Le Retilley. They are allowed to see their friends without the presence of the gaoler.

5781. (To the Procureur.) Does the practice exist of the constables and the members of the police questioning prisoners upon their crimes when in confinement?—As to being allowed to do it, I will not say they are not allowed to do it; but, in practice, I should say that, when once they are confined, it is not usually done. I will not say it is never done.

5782. Are there any formal orders issued to prevent their doing it?—No; I believe there are no formal orders issued.

5783. If a stranger were to go to the prison and say to the accused, "It will be worse for you if you do not confess, and better for you if you do." Would that exclude the declaration made in reply as evidence?—I apprehend that in practice a declaration made to any body whomsoever, under such circumstances, would not be admitted.

5784. The Bailiff. I never had reason to believe that the English distinction, upon that point, existed here. I should rather judge, in case of any person exercising any influence upon the mind of the prisoner, the English distinction would be rejected.

5785. Mr. MacCulloch (Advocate). I believe that the promise or the threat must have been made by an authorized person, in order to exclude a confession; the constable or sheriff, or some one supposed by the party to have authority.

5786. The Contrôle. That is quite my view of it.

5787. The Procureur. The impression upon my mind is that, if the prisoner made a declaration under a promise or threat from any person, the Court would not admit it; but I cannot say that I have seen the question arise. I know that I should be against the admission.

5788. Mr. Falla (Advocate). With respect to a promise or inducement to a prisonner to confess, I have seen the confession so obtained brought in evidence against a prisoner here. And I have pleaded for the prisoner that the declaration made in consequence was not evidence; and in my conscience I thought there was no proof against the prisonner without that admission; yet I have seen the prisoner convicted. But I have heard the late Bailiff censure the constable for having done so. The prisoner, nevertheless, was found Guilty.

5789. (To Mr. Falla.) Censured, you mean, for holding out an inducement?—Yes.

5790. (To Mr. Falla.) Suppose there were neither promise nor threat, but the constable put a series of questions to the prisoner. Would that have any effect in excluding the answers?—I think not, in practice.

5791. Have you known constables censured for questioning prisoners in that way?—No. It is within my knowledge that the late Bailiff gave orders to the constables not to do so. It was in a case in which there was a robbery of some plate in the parish of Catel; and the late Bailiff told the constables that they were not to question the prisoners. That case did not come to trial. The plate in question was subsequently found in the house supposed to have been robbed. The accused were servants living in the house. In practice, and very lately, I have seen answers of the prisonors to constables brought forward in evidence against the prisoners: and it must be admitted by every one that it is always done in practice.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

5792. (To the Bailiff.) Has the Court the power of discharging a constable?

The Bailiff. Upon judicial proceedings. I do not apprehend that they can do it ministerially.

5793. (To the Bailiff.) What control can the Court exercise to prevent such a practice taking place?—I should think that, in practice, if the rule was once or twice clearly laid down, the constables would follow it. Supposing that were not enough, and an Ordonnance were made to that effect, and that Ordonnance were broken, that would be an offence.

5794. Mr. Falla. When I first came to the bar, it struck me as so very unfair towards the prisoner that I objected to such answers being given in evidence; and I was overruled.

5795. (To the Procureur.) In reference to the 19th query, suppose the Crown officers decline to produce a document which is in their possession, and evidence is given which convinces the Court that there is such a document in existence, would the Court be entitled to admit secondary evidence of its contents?—I apprehend that can never happen; because the King's officers, who had a document in their hands which they refused to produce, would be exceedingly culpable. I apprehend that, if they were to refuse to produce any document, the Court might order other evidence to come at the truth.

5796. The Contrôle. I think the Court would cut the Gordian knot there by acquitting the prisoner.

5797. The Procureur. I think they would acquit, certainly; but I think they might admit secondary evidence.

5798. Mr. De Courcy. During the conspiracy trials here, there were meetings held by the Court without the presence of the Crown officers, which I apprehend to be illegal.

5799. (To the Bailiff.) Can the Bailiff and Jurats act as a Criminal Court without the presence of the Crown officers?—No.

5800. If they are without the Crown officers, what they do is null?—Yes. First of all, the Court cannot be opened unless there is a Crown officer present. They are present, as of right on their part; and one of them, as of duty, during the whole time the Court is open.

5801. The Procureur. It may be right that I should mention that I do not recollect any meeting concerning the conspiracy, on which the Court was in private without the Crown officers.

5802. (To the Bailiff). You say that the seal of a court of justice or a municipal corporation proves itself. Do you take notice of the existence of English Municipal Corporations?—Yes: it rarely arises, except in the verification of an affidavit. Suppose an affidavit comes with a seal of the Lord Mayor of London, or any other Municipal Corporation, it proves itself. In case of any dispute as to the existence of the corporation, if we find the power to be exerted we should hold the seal to be legal. It must be the seal of a Court or a Corporation. To the seal of a notary credit is not given. Those questions rarely occur in criminal proceedings. In civil proceedings, in fact, they do not arise as they do in England; because you do not prove every document you put in, but the Advocates communicate to one another their case, and there is no question raised, unless one of them is impeached. So that the general law with regard to the proof of documents is small. Again, it is diminished in criminal matters by the Interrogatory; because it generally happens that, if papers are material, they are either proved or admitted by virtue of the Interrogatory. In a case where you wanted historically to trace a man by anything which has been done, not bearing directly upon the offence with which he was charged, they would be put in, I apprehend, without very strict proof. They would be read historically, just as you would read Hume's History of England to ascertain what was done in the year sixteen hundred.

5804. The Procureur. If you wished to make use of a judgment of a foreign Court of justice, it has always been usual to have the seal placed upon that judgment by the proper authority, either by the Consul or the Ambassador: but I know that, of late years, powers of attorney from America have been admitted, though merely signed, in the first instance, by a notary, and afterwards the signature of the notary attested under the seal of the Court. But that is merely of very late occurrence.

5805. (To the Contrôle.) Do you agree with the Bailiff in his written answer, that it is not strictly legal on a question of character to give evidence of specific acts of good conduct on the part of the accused?—I should think not. I have seen specific acts of good conduct brought forward; but I do not think it is right, myself. Suppose a servant is indicted for larceny of property at her master's house; some other master where she lived might come and say, that on a particular day he trusted her with some money, and she accounted faithfully for it. I have seen evidence of that kind admitted.

5806. Mr. Le Retilley (Jurat). Always.

5807. The Procureur. Universally, I should say.

5808. (To Mr. MacCulloch, Advocate.) Does it ever make part of the body of the accusation that the crime is committed after a previous one?—No.

5809. There are three or four offences in England in which that is a substantive charge. For instance, in the case of uttering bad money, it is a felony to utter bad money after a previous conviction. Have you anything of that sort in your law?—I know no case of that kind.

5810. You say, in answer to the 22nd question of the third series, "The Crown Lawyers may produce former convictions against an accused party." You cannot in a prosecution make it part of the original case to prove bad character?—Certainly not.

5811. In a charge of theft you could not begin by shewing that the person had previously committed theft?—No.

5812. At what stage would the contradiction of the witnesses to character arise?—At the moment the prisoner's witnesses have been examined. As soon as their examination has been completed (that is supposing the evidence to be given vivâ voce), the Crown Lawyers, I conceive, have the right to recal any of their former witnesses, for the purpose of disproving the good character given to the accused by his witnesses.

5813. The Commissioners are contemplating a case in which the instrument of impeaching the good character is a previous conviction.—Perhaps, in order to understand it, I ought to state how those convictions are produced. The Crown lawyers speak last in giving their conclusions. They state the prisoner at the bar is an old offender, he has been previously convicted of such and such offences.

5814. That is in comment upon the character of the accused?—In their conclusions upon the whole case. It is brought forward merely for the purpose of justifying the conclusion for a heavier punishment.

5815. Is it not your course of practice that the conclusion of the Procureur and Contrôle, as to punishment, must be given before the decision of the fact has been come to?—Yes; the conclusions are given upon the whole together.

5816. That may be done, you say, though no witnesses have been brought to character?—It is continually done in practice. That comes pretty much under the same class of difficulty, I have mentioned, of obliging the prisoners to plead all sorts of things at the same time. In general, the prisoner is allowed to plead any objection in bar. In the case of Chapman, he was tried for murder, and the question of insanity was set up. I was obliged to plead that together with the plea of Not guilty in one speech, which embarrasses one very much.

5817. The Crown officers, you say, urge a previous conviction for the purpose of guiding the Jurats in awarding punishment. Is the means of doing that the production of the conviction?—Yes. The book is brought up from the Greffe.

5818. That is supposed to be in the possession of the Court?—Yes.

5819. What is the method of proving that the party at the bar is the person whose name appears in the book?—If there were any doubt about it, the Crown lawyers would have taken care to have summoned as witnesses, possibly the Greffier, or the constable who was cognizant of his being the party who committed the first offence. But it is scarcely necessary in practice, because those people are always so well known. Every Jurat will recollect the man having been before the Court a year or two ago; and the man will not deny it. Very frequently either the constable or sheriff, or serjeant, or gaoler, is called to prove the identity of the party.

5820. That is to say, he is ready to do so?—The Crown lawyers have him among their witnesses.

5821. Do you mean that, in the body of the case for the prosecution, they would prove that the man has been tried before?—Yes; I have seen that done.

5822. The Contrôle. I should conceive that that is irregular. My own idea of the practice is this. The previous conviction has nothing to do with the case before the Court whatever: but, after the Crown officer has gone over the facts of the case, when he comes to what punishment he thinks due to the case, he produces this conviction in his speech. And, if the prisoner's counsel were to say, "That is not the same man," the Crown officer would say, "I will show you it is." And, I conceive, the Court would allow him to prove it, though that is a very doubtful question. However, it is produced substantially as part of his speech, and only for the aggravation of punishment. I do not think that it has been allowed to the Crown officer to prove that a man, who is being tried for larceny, has been convicted of a previous larceny. That has not been done since I have been at the Bar. There is, no doubt, a great deal of license in all those things here; but, if it were denied by the prisoner's counsel that the person was the same man, I think the Court could take no account of it, unless the Jurats might happen to recollect him, and know him to be the same.

5823. The Procureur. Upon the question which has just been put, it has often struck me that it would be a great improvement in our way of proceeding, if two questions were put. The first being, "Is the prisoner Guilty or Not Guilty;" and then, afterwards, after the finding of Guilty or Not Guilty, "What shall be the amount of punishment," as a second question. Then the previous conviction might be produced. We have a positive law by which we cannot prove à deux fois. I am requested to mention that, in the event of there being two questions put hereafter, it might, perhaps, be proper to have it clearly stated that all the Jurats should be obliged to give an opinion upon the second point. I mention that, because I am requested so to do. Because it might happen that some three or four of the Jurats might think the man innocent, and the others might think him guilty; and it is thought that, in the event of the man being found Guilty, all should be obliged to consider him so, and should be obliged to give an opinion as to what, supposing him to be so, should be the punishment to be inflicted.

5824. The Bailiff. I think, that very question being raised opposes the strongest possible objection to the proposition of the Procureur.

5825. Mr. Le Marchant (Jurat). It would be very hard for me to have to pass sentence of death upon a man for murder, when I thought he was an innocent man.

GUERNSEY.

Charles De Jersey, Esq., Procureur de la Reine.

October 9th, 1846.

5826. (To the Bailiff.) If there is a division in the Court as to the innocence or guilt of the prisoner, by whom is the sentence now passed?—By the majority.

5827. In practice, does each individual of the Court say, "I think the sentence ought to be three months' imprisonment, or five months?"—Mr. Le Marchant (Jurat). Yes.

5828. The Bailiff. The mode of passing sentence is, that each individual Jurat states the amount of punishment to be inflicted. I agree with Mr. Le Marchant to some extent. In murder, the law awards the punishment; but, in a case of manslaughter, part of the Court may hold that it is excusable or justifiable homicide; some of them may think it is homicide to be punished by transportation for life. All those who thought it was excusable or justifiable homicide would vote for a nominal punishment, wherever the punishment is discretionary.

5829. (To the Bailiff.) You think they would not consider themselves bound by the decision of the fact?—I do not see how it is possible. Suppose a case of manslaughter, which, according to the facts, is capable of having two or three degrees of intensity upon it.

5830. Does not the same difficulty exist now?—The people who say "Not Guilty," say therefore, "No punishment." You ought not to call on them to say we are bound to award such and such a punishment, although we do not think him guilty.

5831. Is it not assumed that the fact of guilt, of its not being excusable homicide, for instance, is concluded before they are called on to award the punishment?—In that case, although they must give some punishment, they might give a nominal punishment.

5832. Mr. Jeremie. I will mention a case which actually occurred, and which, as it was the first case I had before the Court, made an impression on my mind. The man was accused of murder. There were nine Jurats present; three found that the man was guilty of gross negligence; three found that he had gone too far, that he was to blame; and three found that he was excusable, he having been grossly provoked, and that the result was a pure accident. So that there were three who condemned him to banishment; three who condemned him to three months' imprisonment; and three who acquitted him. At last, not being able to make up their minds upon the subject, one who thought there was some negligence, and who thought the man should have some punishment, went over to condemn him to be banished. On the other hand, one, who found there was negligence, considered three years' banishment too severe a punishment, and joined for the acquittal. Therefore there were left four on one side, and four on the other; and the other remained of his own opinion. So it came to the casting vote of the Bailiff, Mr. Brock, who gave his casting vote in favour of an acquittal.

5833. To Mr. Jeremie. In fact, five out of the nine found him guilty of crime and yet he was acquitted?—Because they could not agree as to the penalty. I think that is a more just way of having it than that the man (according to the system now proposed) should be condemned to a more severe punishment than it might be thought the case deserved.

5834. (To the Bailiff.) You give your casting vote in case of an equality. Is that, not only in case of an equality of two bodies, but wherever equal numbers of the Jurats hold different opinions?—A case occurred the other day, in which three were each of a different opinion. I coincided with the second one, and that was considered to be the judgment of the Court. One was for an acquittal; two were for a fine, one larger than the other. I said there are two for a fine; and I joined my opinion for the smaller fine. There is a case from Jersey, in the Privy Council Report, which throws some light upon that matter. And, I conceive, we should be bound by the principle of that case, though it would sometimes be very difficult to carry it into practice.

5835. Does it decide that, unless there is a positive majority in favour of some one opinion, the casting vote of the Bailiff must be given?—The case to which I allude was a civil matter; Le Gros v. Le Breton, reported in 2 Knapp, 181. There were three opinions among the Jurats. One opinion was, that the remonstrance in question ought not to be received at all; the second, that a certain measure of relief should be given; and the third, that a certain other measure of relief should be given. Those that were for rejecting the remonstrance altogether were the minority of the Court; but were a majority as compared with either of the two other opinions. Thereupon the remonstrance was rejected: but, on appeal to the Privy Council, it was held that, inasmuch as the majority of the Jurats were in favour of receiving the remonstrance, though they might differ in their mode of dealing with it when received, the Court ought not to have rejected it. The effect of this decision appears to be to lay down a principle for deciding what, under certain circumstances, shall be deemed a majority of the Court. In Le Breton v. Ennis, 4 Moore, 323, a subsequent case, also from Jersey, where, out of six Jurats present, there were three for one opinion, two for a second, and one for a third, it was held that judgment pronounced in accordance with the opinion of the three Jurats, no casting vote having been given by the Bailiff, could not be supported. And this, on the ground that by the law of Jersey a majority of the Jurats constituting the Court must concur. In Guernsey, the law is considered to be otherwise; the concurrence of an absolute majority appears not to be required. The opinion which has the greater number of Jurats in its favour is taken to be the judgment of the Court.

5836. (To Mr. Carré, Lieutenant Bailiff.) What is your view of the question? In the case of three being of one opinion, and three of another opinion, and three of a third opinion; would the Bailiff have a right to give his casting vote?—In practice, I think, the Bailiff is considered to have the right to give a casting vote. I know the question has been argued that it ought not to be so considered, because there was a majority for a degree of guilt.

5837. Mr. Jeremie. Suppose three were for three years banishment; three for imprisonment; and three for acquittal. The Bailiff has said, "Make up your minds; if you do not come to two opinions I shall know which way to give my casting vote." And, I think I may say, I have seen it done two or three times.

5838. Mr. Le Retilley (Jurat). Here is the record of the case to which Mr. Jeremie alluded; and there were only eight Jurats present: therefore he must be under some misapprehension.

5839. Mr. Jeremie. I know there were three opinions.

5840. The Contrôle. Where three are for one degree of punishment, and three for another, it has been the general practice for the three who were for the higher punishment to join with those who were for the lower punishment.

5841. (To the Bailiff.) In England, it is very often the case that, in a state prosecution, a witness is asked who gave him his information, and the Court will not allow that question to be put?—I always understood the rule to be that, where it is a communication to some one in an official capacity, the question cannot be asked.

5842. The case where it has oftenest occurred has been, where police officers are the witnesses. In a case of coining, it is a very ordinary question to ask them, "Who told you where to look?" The Court stops that.—I think that only applies to a case where the person to whom the information is given is in some official character.

5843. Are you prepared to say what the rule is on that subject here?—No: I am not.

5844. Can any gentleman of the Bench say whether that point has been discussed here?—

5845. Mr. Carré. I have never heard it.

5846. The Procureur. We know nothing of the rule to which the Commissioners have referred. I would wish to add, that there is a case where an advocate, Mr. Le. Cocq, was compelled by the Court to declare what had been told him by his client before he received a retainer from him in the cause. Mr. Le Cocq refused: he stated that he had been for many years counsel for his client in every case, or nearly every case; and that, in this particular case, there was something connected with this power of attorney. At the same time it appeared that he had not then received a retainer for anything connected with that case; and he was obliged to declare. That is the impression upon my mind.

5847. (To the Bailiff.) Do you think there would be any distinction between the case of an enquête and of a trial with regard to putting such a question?—No.

5848. Mr. Carré. With respect to the case of the Rev. Daniel Dobrée, I should wish to observe that the English rule did not apply to that case, as far as I can understand it. The general rule, as laid down by Mr. Justice Eyre in Roscoe's Law of Evidence,* is in these words. "It is perfectly right that all opportunities should be given to discuss the truth of the evidence given against a prisoner; but there is a rule, which has universally obtained, on account of its importance to the public for the detection of crime, that those persons, who are the channel by means of whom the detection is made, should not be unnecessarily disclosed; if it can be made to appear that it is necessary to the investigation of the truth of the case that the name of the person should be disclosed, I should be very unwilling to stop it; but it does not appear to me that it is within the ordinary course to do it, or that there is any necessity for it in the present case."—Hardy's case, 24 How. St. Tr., 808. I should say that, in ordinary cases of a trial at the bar, such a necessity would rarely occur; but, in the case under consideration, it was precisely such a case of necessity. It does not appear to me that the English rule was applicable to this case; because it was the case of an inquiry where every means were used to obtain witnesses to throw light upon the case. It was considered that the person making the declaration to Mr. Dobrée would be just the person capable of throwing light upon the facts.

5849. You think it came within the qualification of the rule laid down by Mr. Justice Eyre?—Yes.

5850. The Bailiff. I stated that there was no difference between an enquête and a trial. I think I was incorrect on two grounds. It would be unnecessary upon the trial, and yet might be necessary at the enquête; that is taking one point of view. And, again, an objection to this is the public disclosure of the name of a party; that applies to a public proceeding, and not to a private proceeding. Upon both those grounds it appears to me that I was inadvertent in the expression of that opinion.

5851. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. Mr. Carré is quite mistaken in his view of the case, inasmuch as, if you will turn to Sir James Graham's letter, you will find that the Royal Court of Guernsey were only entitled to try the parties for seditious language. The question put to me did not regard seditious language, but who gave me the first information of the conspiracy.

5852. (To the Procureur.) Mr. Dobrée suggests, in a paper he has laid before us, that there is some rule or authority which forbids a clergyman giving information received by him in that character. Is that so?—I apprehend, if any authority was produced, it was only some dictum of a French authority, which states that a priest, who receives information under the seal of confession, is not obliged to declare what is told him.

5853. The Bailiff. Gilham's Case, 1 Moody, C. C. 186, is a very strong one; because there a clergyman extracted a confession by telling the person that it was necessary to his salvation.

5854. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. The case of Richmond Seymour was a case directly in point. He was tried at Reading some years ago before Mr. Justice Park.

5855. To the Procureur. You think there is some French authority that a priest is not allowed to divulge what he has received under the seal of confession?—That he is not obliged to do so; I have no doubt there is.

5856. The Bailiff. There is no doubt that that which was given in confession ought not to be divulged.

5857. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. In the case of Richmond Seymour, Dr. Meyrick had a question put to him: he refused to answer it; and Mr. Justice Allan Park waived the question.

5858. (To the Contrôle.) It has struck the Commissioners that a great many practical difficulties must occur in criminal proceedings from the Court having to decide both the law and the fact. Have you considered how far it would be better to have a distinct tribunal, something in the nature of a Jury, to decide upon the question of fact, leaving the Court then to decide upon the legal question, and to apply the punishment to the crime if the other tribunal found the party accused guilty?

5859. In that point of view a change in the system might be desirable certainly. I have no doubt there are considerable difficulties in the present system, as to the issues of law and fact being tried by the same persons; but the difficulty I see would be, that the remedy of introducing any other tribunal would be worse than the disease. I do not see how you are to carry it out.

5860. Suppose you said that four Jurats with the Bailiff should form the Court, and that the other eight should sit apart from them and decide upon the fact,—there would be a technical separation of the two?—The first difficulty would be that you would always require the twelve Jurats to be present.

5861. You think it would be desirable to have a separate tribunal for the trial of the fact, but that the difficulty is to carry it out?—Yes. I conceive that the alteration would be desirable.

5862. If a portion of the Jurats were taken as a tribunal to decide upon the fact, you say it would oblige the attendance of all the Jurats?—That is one difficulty. And the second is this: that I should conceive it very difficult for the eight Jurats, who are accustomed to decide law and fact, to separate themselves in that way, and dwindle into one half their functions.

5863. Perhaps, also, gentlemen who have been accustomed to decide the law, would not be inclined to take the law from any one else?—That is an insurmountable difficulty, I think, with regard to the present Court.

5864. Is there any objection to the selection of jurors here, in the same mode as is pursued in England?—There are numberless objections. The first objection I will mention is, the language: if the jury were taken from the town, the great majority of the inhabitants there are much more familiar with the English than with the French language; and it is exactly vice versâ in the country parishes. I conceive that you would have to try many cases in French and many cases in English. What I mean to say is, that I do not see how a jury here can be constituted as respects either of the two languages. If you had it in French, you would exclude a great mass of the most respectable inhabitants of the town; and if you had it in English, you would exclude the great mass of the respectable inhabitants of the country. I conceive that would be a great practical difficulty. I do not see how the system could possibly work, except you have a jury in both languages.

5865. Might not you have a jury of townspeople to try townspeople, and a jury of country people to try those who live in the country?—The difficulty would be in the witnesses and the counsel. Suppose a country jury are trying a case, and an English witness comes forward: his evidence would all have to be interpreted to the country jury. I conceive that would lead to an incessant complication. Again, if you have an English jury, and a man comes up who talks the Guernsey patois, that would have to be interpreted.

5866. The difficulty would only be met by having a jury, like the jurats, who can speak both languages. Could not that be found in Guernsey?—I do not say it could not be found; but it would exclude a vast number of respectable inhabitants.

5867. You think that would very much limit the number of the jurors?—Yes.

5868. The Bailiff. You would exclude those who could not understand both languages, and those who would not.

5869*a*. The Contrôle. You would exclude a vast number of respectable country farmers for the English; and you would exclude the great body of the English residents here, many who are domiciled and settled here, for the French.

5869*b*. Perhaps, also, there would be some difficulty in making a selection?—Certainly there would. Again, a man who did not wish to sit on a jury, would say, "I do not understand the language sufficiently." You would have perpetual difficulties in respect of the language.

5870. You think they must be selected. Could not they become Jurymen by being rated to a certain amount?—They must be selected; and you would exclude a vast number of persons who, otherwise, would be perfectly competent to serve on the Jury by language. The next prominent difficulty I conceive to be the extraordinary number of family connections in the Island, and connections of interest; particularly family connections.

5871. You think that, if the right of challenge were allowed for relationship, there would be a difficulty in getting the requisite number of men to try a prisoner?—Yes. It is not only the actual or blood connections, but the connections by alliance, and connections of interest. The next circumstance of difficulty is the publicity which every circumstance obtains in every part of the Island. I do not think you could ever get a Jury who would come into Court without some previous knowledge and impressions upon the case to be tried. That might not apply to petty cases; but it would apply most strongly in all cases of importance. The moment a crime is committed, everybody talks of it. There are a vast number of people here who have no business to attend to, and who do nothing else but talk; and there is no crime of any importance committed here which is not canvassed and talked about in every domestic circle. It may be objected that the same thing applies to the Jurats, who may have heard a great deal about the crime before they come into Court to decide upon it. But there is this strong difference. The Jurats are constantly under the eye of the public: and every decision which they come to in criminal cases is come to in public, each man giving his opinion. He is therefore before the tribunal of public opinion in each individual case.

5872. Is it your practice here for each individual Jurat not only to give his vote, but to state his opinion both of the law and the fact?—It is so; except in cases of appeal in civil cases. Jurors, on the contrary, on retiring from the trial go back into the mass again, and are no longer before the public. To shew the Commissioners what I have mentioned, as to the Jurats being prominently before the public, you may remember, since you have been here sitting on this inquiry, what a number of cases have been brought before you, decided years and years ago, in which the conduct of the Jurats, and what they have said and done, has been brought before you. It continually happens that what a Jurat has said is remarked upon in public; and, of course, the Jurats are careful and guarded, and much more careful and guarded than Jurors would be. Jurors also, I believe, would think nothing of talking upon the case before they came to try it. They would talk of the matter with their friends. Now, I conceive, that the Jurats, knowing they will have to judge of a case, which Jurors would not know, are very careful and guarded not to talk upon it, but rather to keep aloof from any conversations upon it. There are a great many English residents here, who are not rate-payers. It is not usual to put the English residents upon the rate, unless they have bought property in the Island. I conceive, if a Jury system were established, the fact of a person not paying the rate, which is a mere act of favour on the part of the parish, would not be an objection to his being a Juryman.

5873. You are aware that in the neighbouring Island of Jersey they have a Jury of twenty four?—Yes.

5874. (To the Bailiff.)—Will you favour the Commissioners with your opinion upon this question?—First of all, as a general proposition, I conceive that the distinction of law and fact is of considerable importance; and, in that point of view particularly, a jury is a more convenient mode of trial than a Bench of Magistrates. I do not know that it is so much so in a small community, as in a large one. I mean that the advantages of distinguishing law from fact arise in a large community more than in a small one.

5875. Do you mean on account of the more limited number of cases?—Yes. All we should look to in a trial by jury here would be the result in each particular case; and I think the mode of conducting the business in particular cases, as a general proposition, is more satisfactory by a jury than by a Bench of Magistrates. I do not, however, think the mode of trial here is open to many of the objections to which a Bench of Magistrates may be open under certain circumstances; and I can see considerable difficulties in respect to a system of trial by Jury. The difficulties, which I see, are those which exist (though perhaps not to the same extent) in the Welsh Counties. There, as here, you have a double language and a small district.

5876. In what sense do you mean a small district?—The counties are much smaller than in England. There are fewer people; and they come from a smaller district of country. First of all, with respect to the language. I take it that every man who is in a jury-box has a right to say, "I do not understand your language, not being my own." And you cannot go into the question, whether he understands the foreign language more or less; because, unless he understands it competently, he is not a good juror. That necessitates having both a French and an English jury, which is objectionable on two grounds; for, if you have a French jury and an English jury, you will have, probably, one tone of feeling in one, and one in the other, which would be intensely mischievous. Besides that, it would not answer; because in a French case you may have two or three English witnesses, and vice versâ. If you have one juror who does not understand, you must have an interpreter: and I take it that an interpreter is the greatest impediment to the extraction of truth. I believe every man who knows anything of the Welsh procedure, which I do not know except by report myself, is perfectly convinced of that. It puts the counsel at arms length, and is a shield which it is very difficult to battle against. That is one great advantage of the Jurats; they are competent to understand whichever language turns up. Then the next objection which arises is with respect to the smallness of the district and to the local feeling, which is considered an objection in the Welsh counties, so much that, when the Welsh counties were thrown into the English circuits, it was proposed to club two counties together, in order that you might have a larger field to get your juries from; and that was objected to, not because the evil did not exist or because the remedy was a bad one, but because the counties were afraid of losing their independent existence. That was a mere county feeling. Here you have a district much smaller than the Welsh counties; and the feeling therefore is more intense. You might call this like a Welsh hundred rather.

5877. When you speak of a district, do you mean a district in point of space?—I think you must take population and space together. Here, particularly in the country parishes, you have an intense local feeling. They are people who have succeeded from father to son, and have transmitted their feelings from one generation to another. Then I also feel another difficulty, which has been mentioned by the Contrôle,—that the Court, as at present constituted, acquires the habit of dealing with trials as a matter of business, and that under the eye of the public, so that there is a habit of responsibility which would press much less strongly upon jurors. I think that is much stronger here than it is in a large county in England, where less attention is paid to the proceedings of the quarter sessions. There is another consideration also, with respect to the introduction of a jury; the introduction of a jury, as I understand it, must involve the having a single Judge. I do not see the necessity of having more than one judge, if you have a jury. That appears to be a principle which is completely established by the municipal corporation alterations. Clearly having a full Court and a jury besides would be a considerable impediment: and probably either there would be one presiding Judge, or one presiding Judge with a very limited number of assessors. If so (and probably it would come to one presiding Judge), you put a much higher requirement upon that Judge than you do under the present circumstances. A great deal more then would depend upon the efficiency of the presiding Judge than does now. A greater degree of efficiency would be absolutely requisite then than is the case now.

5878. Would not the fact of his being the single Judge tend to render him efficient?—It might stir him up, perhaps; but, where we have but twenty trials in the year, perhaps that would not make him very efficient. There is not practice enough to make the presiding Judge master of the law of evidence at all efficiently, if he was not so before.

5879. Do you think the thirteen have a greater mastery of the law of evidence than a single Judge would have?—I think so. Their recollections and knowledge would probably run over a greater length of time than his would.

5880. Probably the present gentlemen of the bench have acquired their knowledge from acting as Judges?—Very likely. It is not stronger than this, that, if you have not business enough for a man to master it by his own experience, you are assisted by having more persons from whom to gain information.

5881. There is always a great difficulty, is not there, in forming a very efficient tribunal for a small district?—I should conceive so. I will add also that there are considerable difficulties in detail, as to points reserved and so on, which would create some embarrassment in working out the system.

5882. Do you think that the objection could be got over by leaving it optional with the prisoner whether he would have a jury or not?—If you have the system of a jury, I would have it regularly, and not accidentally. If you have a jury, the more you work it the better, because you give it experience.

5883. (To the Procureur.) Is not it the case that a jury is optional in the law of Scotland in certain cases?—In some cases I believe so. Alison, in page 89, says, on the subject of jurors, "No more specific rule can be laid down for the weighing of such testimony, but that it must be such as produces conviction of guilt in a reasonable mind; and that if any serious doubts are entertained by the jury. it is their duty to acquit the prisoner. It is to be regretted that the composition and habits of our juries under the late Act of Parliament is such as, in many parts of the country, to render them in a great measure incapable of exercising the important duty of weighing any long chain of evidence, and that when the trial has endured a considerable time, the merits of the evidence too often enters but little into the formation of their verdicts."

5884. The Contrôle. In England there are a much greater number of different subjects which occupy the public attention than we have here; the consequence of which is, that everything that takes place in the Court here occupies the public attention more prominently than anything else, and the Court becomes in criminal trials a sort of theatre. Anything that takes place in the Court, and even the particulars of a case before it is tried, form a very prominent part of the newspaper topics. There is another objection which has occurred to me, which it may be proper to lay before the Commissioners; and that is as regards the duties of the Crown officers. The introduction of a jury would necessarily, I conceive, very much change their duties. I mean their duties would then become analogous to those of the Crown Counsel in England. They would merely have to lay the case before the jury, and would have no ministerial functions, if I may so express myself, to perform.

5885. The Bailiff. It would be a great question, then, whether it would be for the Crown officers to advise the Court as to what punishment to give, and who should give the sentence, whether the Judge presiding at the time, or the full Court.

5886. If a change as to the duty of the Crown officers would be beneficial, it might be made without the trial by jury. If such a change would be mischievous, the trial by jury, you think, would carry it with it?—The Contrôle. Certainly.

5887. The Bailiff. There would be considerable difficulty as to who was to award the punishment. If it were left to a single Judge, it comes to my former proposition, that the Judge must be a more efficient person; because the judge now has the advice of the Crown officers upon the point, of which he would be then deprived. It would be out of the question, I take it, to go on with the practice of the Crown officers advising the Court upon that subject.

5888. (To Mr. Carré.) Will you favour the Commissioners with your opinion upon the subject?—I do not wish to say much on the subject; the question must depend a good deal upon the feeling which the people of the Island have with respect to the way in which justice is administered in general. I consider that in every country it is absolutely necessary that the sentences, particularly in criminal matters, should satisfy the public mind. Therefore, as to the question as it now stands, with respect to the introduction of a new law, I should say that my own opinion or that of any other Jurat upon the Bench must not be taken as having any weight against the public opinion, one way or the other, in a matter of this kind. I have had no experience whatever of the manner in which the system of a jury works in other countries; therefore it is only by imagining what might be its results here that I can come to any conclusion upon the subject. It is quite clear that keeping distinct the questions of law and fact is a matter of considerable importance in a general sense; but it does not appear to me to be equally clear, as to the result of the operation of a jury in individual cases, that there is more certainty of justice than in a Court constituted like the present Court. I should say that the habit of weighing evidence, which is acquired by constant practice in both civil and criminal cases, enables a Jurat to decide questions of fact with more probability of arriving at the truth than a juryman, particularly in a small place like this, where, without a considerable degree of habit, it is difficult to prevent private feelings from interfering with questions brought before them. As to the general effect of the introduction of a jury, it would be open to many objections. In the first place, I doubt whether the verdict of a jury would have an equal weight with the judgment of the Court. I think it would be liable to produce certain evils in practice. For example, a prisoner would be likely to produce a vast number of reasons for challenging individual jurymen, which would have to be discussed, and often offensively,—reasons which might be offensive to the party, and create evil results and important results in society.

5889. That objection would not be confined, perhaps, to what took place through the right of challenging, but generally?—Yes; though now that does occur, to a certain extent, with the Judges; yet the knowledge that it is imposed upon them against their will, as of duty, tends to diminish the evil results of such feelings.

5890. Mr. Le Marchant (Jurat). I quite agree in what has been stated on the subject.

5891. Mr. De Havilland (Jurat). I consider that any change, of the kind proposed, would lead to the sapping of the second privilege which we have. When I speak of the second privilege, I consider our first privilege to be that of being under the Crown of England; and the second is that we elect our Judges. I feel certain that the establishment of a jury here must do that away in a very short time. The Judges in England are appointed by the Crown; we have not therefore the same reason for requiring a jury here, since the Judges are elected from among the people. The making a part of the Bench jurymen would lead, I fear, to very great difficulty; either the number must be increased, or those appointed must always be here, which would be very irksome. Very soon, if juries were appointed, we might expect that the remainder of the machinery adopted in England would be established here, and that we should have Judges sent by the Crown; juries would be more expensive than our present proceeding; and any additional expense would be raised among us by a sort of county taxation, as in England.

5892. How would a jury be more expensive than the present system?—It would lead to other machinery.

5893. The Bailiff. The summoning of the jury would be a matter of some considerable expense.

5894. Mr. Andros. In a large country the chief recommendations of a jury are that, where political considerations may weigh, the accused is protected from the undue and improper bias of the Judge, who is appointed by the Crown without any voice of the people. Another recommendation of the trial by jury is that a man is judged by his peers. Here we are all sufficiently upon a level as for each class to understand the wants and habits and usages of the other classes; so that the Jurats are competent to judge of the case of any man who comes before them. They are sufficiently his peers to satisfy him with the verdict which they come to. Guernsey-men think it one of their proudest privileges to choose their Judges; not only as an idle boast, but because it gives them satisfaction. They are satisfied to be judged by those whom they have appointed. It might be said perhaps, on the other hand, that the English here are not satisfied; but I am sure that they are. I have always heard them say that they would much rather be judged by the Court here than by a jury. There may be a few individuals who may be disposed to contradict what I am saying; but I believe that is the general feeling. As to the English language, I quite agree in all that has been said of the great difficulties of introducing it, supposing even I were satisfied that a jury was desirable. It must not be understood, however, that I or the other Jurats are opposed to the introduction of a jury, if it could be carried out; I think there is something to be said in its favour. But looking to the question altogether, I decidedly think that the jury would not be so desirable as the present Court. It is not from a feeling that we should be curtailed of our power. I do not think that that weighs with any of us. We have been compared to a Bench of Magistrates; but we much more represent a jury with a presiding Judge, I think. It has been said that matters of law and of fact are mixed up together: but it is well known that it is very difficult to determine where questions of law begin, and questions of fact begin. And, considering the way in which the Bailiff sums up (particularly the present Bailiff), in which he gives his opinion of the law and the fact, I think it may be a very good thing if the Judge gives his opinion temperately upon the fact as well as the law even to a jury. It has been laid down, I think, by persons of much more experience than I have, that it is a good thing for the Judge to go discreetly into the fact as well as the law. Of course, from the smallness of our district, we could not have a change of venue; we could not get rid of impressions in particular cases by changing the venue. We are all so nearly situated, that we must put up with that inconvenience without being able to remedy it. Another consideration is that, I think, the system works so well that it would be a great pity to run the risk of giving us a worse one. We know the evils, if there are any (though I think there are no serious evils), of the present system; but we cannot see exactly what would be the result of any change. And, I think, it would be a great pity to change a system which really works upon the whole in a way which very few people can object to. The Commissioners have been here many days; and they must have seen how very few charges have been brought forward against us.

5895. Mr. Carré. I take it for granted that it has always been the practice for the Bailiff to take upon himself to sum up questions both of law and fact.

5896. Mr. Le Retilley (Jurat). I quite concur in what has been said, though our opinions, in a question of this kind, must not go for much, being parties interested perhaps: but, as being a question which concerns the whole community, I think they ought to be consulted upon a question of that kind. If they are of opinion that a jury would be better than the present system, by all means have it: but I think you will find the very general opinion in the Island to be that they are satisfied with the present state of things. I think, then, that that opinion ought to weigh something in the question of the alteration of the present system. I doubt very much whether the materials could be got to form a jury from our country parishes. In many cases, I am sure, you would be at a great loss in doing so.

5897. Having juries exclusively from the town you would probably consider a very great evil?—I should.

5898. The Procureur. In a case of this kind, which concerns the whole Island, I quite concur in what has been said by the Court.

5899. Mr. De Havilland, (Jurat). I agree perfectly with Mr. Le Retilley, that it is a matter of that nature which ought to be put to the States in a body, to know the feeling of the community upon the subject. And I should say that the Bailiff's summing up and the question as to the Law Officers ought not to be lost sight of.

5900. Mr. Metivier (Jurat). If I were to consult my own individual feelings, I should be glad of any change which would relieve me from a portion of the responsibility which is placed upon me: but I have a duty to the community to discharge; and that points out to me, that the machinery could not be got at, nor could it work well, in a country so circumscribed as this. If the Commissioners will have reference to the list of rate-payers, they will see what would be the difficulty in forming a jury list.

5901. From the difficulty of finding people assessed in a sufficient amount?—Yes; a sufficient number of people who would be able to serve as jurymen among the rate-payers. A great many of them are either minors or persons who have attained an age when they could be no longer called on to perform the office.

5902. Mr. Le Retilley (Jurat). Most of our country farmers, who are on the rate, are persons of very limited means, and could not afford really to give up the time to the public that would be required. I am quite convinced that they would object, to a man, to be compelled to serve as jurors.

5903. (To Mr. MacCulloch, Jurat.) Do you agree in what has been said by the Bench?—I do.

5904. (To Mr. Jeremie, Advocate.) What is your opinion upon the subject?—I should consider that there are two arguments against it. First of all, from the manner in which the evidence would be taken. If you had a jury, some would understand French and others English: and, with respect to the witnesses who give their evidence in one language, it might be much better for them perhaps, to give it in the other, and that kind of evidence would be most difficult of all for us to understand. Besides, we are a very peculiar people. We all like to have our opinion in this place; and how you would get twelve men to agree upon a point of fact, I cannot say. The community here is a small community; and every individual takes a part in local politics, and has family connexions; and they are so interwoven, one with the other, that it would be very difficult for persons to come with unprejudiced and unbiassed minds to decide any question of fact. Besides, the challenge of jurors would present a difficulty. The Commissioners inquired yesterday respecting the challenge of Jurats. The difficulties with respect to the challenge of jurors would be insurmountable. We have lately extended the right and power of electing douzeniers to the cantons of the town parish. I should say that those represent very fairly, in point of talent and fortune, the districts from which they are chosen. I put it to any individual who knows anything of those gentlemen, whether, if he were called up for his fortune, his life, or anything he holds most dear, he would confide most in the cantonal douzeniers, or in the body of the Royal Court. With the system of the Court, there are always some who are seniors in years; they obtain by practice, if they have not by education, a knowledge of the rules and principles upon which the fate of property depends, as well as the fate of one's honour and liberty. Another thing, which I consider to be a great objection to the introduction of the system, is this. If you introduce the system, it creates faction; faction is the bane of letting in persons to meddle with what does not concern them; and it would spread. There are individuals now who may get into parochial offices; and each in his little sphere may gratify his little ambition: but, when it comes to a questionof life, or property, or honour, I do not think the Island, from its limited locality, would put up with it. And the reason we have so little faction here (while there is so much in the neighbouring Island), is precisely because every one here knows what he has to do; whereas in Jersey they do not. One of the Commissioners put a question the other day, the answer to which greatly surprised him. It was, "If an individual wished to be upon the rate-list, what measures he was to take?" There was not a person here to instruct him: and the Procureur was obliged to go to a case occurring many years ago as to a douzenier in St. Peter in the Woods to instruct him. That must show to the Commissioners, more than any other fact, the total absence of faction. And why is it? Because the system of jurymen and people meddling with what they do not know anything about does not exist here. Then, as to talking about it being the privilege of the Island to be judged by ourselves and about the other privileges of the Island, that has nothing to do with it. The real question is, Is it a beneficial and proper manner? Because it is not popular opinion which is to decide. There is another observation I will make, which is this: that the chief magistrate has his opinion, and he makes it known to his brother Jurats, so that all are at perfect freedom to adopt it or not; and, as a matter of course, he has the weight of wisdom on his part. We ourselves, as suitors, desire that there should be as many Jurats as possible to decide a case, because we feel that with numbers there is security. We think that the decision of one or two magistrates would not have the weight which the decision of a bench of magistrates would have, composed, as it is, of those who have nothing to expect from the Crown or any other department. I think they offer the best and strongest means of administering substantial justice. It must not be supposed that, because there are now only two gentlemen who have been educated at the English bar, there have not been always such. There have always been four or five most able men, who have directed the proceedings by their wisdom, their intelligence, and experience, and some of whose judgments have excited the admiration of many English Judges. I see before me persons who are the descendants of eminent individuals, Mr. Carré, for instance. He has succeeded to the position of his father, than whom nobody has ever carried more weight. And the same observation would apply to several other individuals, the late Mr. Carey, for instance. There never was a more able man than he was. I say therefore that a system, which has continued so long from generation to generation, should not be easily disturbed; particularly as it hinders the spirit of faction, and of men meddling with what they little understand.

5905. Mr. MacCulloch. The subject has been so fully discussed that I need not enter into any details. My opinion decidedly coincides with that of the Contrôle upon the whole matter. I think the introduction of trial by jury would lead to a great many evils. I think the thing would work very much as I have seen it work in Jersey. It is by a majority the jurors decide. In the case of the woman, Le Gendre, she was not found guilty of murder, but of manslaughter. What was the consequence? There was such a cry raised against the jurymen that those who had given their opinion that she ought to be convicted of murder went to a printer to get him to issue a placard, stating that they were of opinion that she ought to be convicted of murder. If I were put upon my trial for an offence, I should be very sorry to be tried by a jury in Guernsey.

5906. Mr. Falla. I owe it to myself to express the opinion which I hold upon the subject of a jury for a small Island like Guernsey. When I first came to the bar, having lived in France many years, I could not conceive how a Court composed of the Bailiff and twelve magistrates, being compelled to decide upon fact and upon law, could give satisfaction or render justice. I was decidedly opposed to that system; and I was decidedly of course in favour of a jury. I believe I expressed my opinion very freely for a few years. But, when I became acquainted with the system of the Court, and also when I came to compare a country like France or England with a very small community like Guernsey, I felt myself compelled to change my opinion. And, although I was as much for a jury as any man living, I came to the opinion that a jury could never answer for a small place like Guernsey. I saw that what might be good for a large community would be quite the reverse for a small one. In France or in England, but more particularly in France, they all doubted the integrity of the Judges, because they were appointed by Government and paid by Government. And I must admit that a jury there, in very many cases, is an admirable institution. But here we do not require it. And by the practice I have had, and knowing what takes place in a small Island like this, I myself feel that, if I were tried to-morrow, if Guilty, I should say, "Let me be tried by a jury in Guernsey, because I have a chance of getting acquitted." But, if innocent, I should say, "No, let me be tried by the Court." I do not express that opinion to support the opinions I have heard from the Bailiff and the Magistrates. I have always had an opinion of my own. I have found fault with many acts of the Court; and I do not admire the whole system, as I have already stated. It has been stated that it might be optional for a prisoner to be tried by a jury. I declare, in conscience, from what I have seen of the acts of the Court, that my first advice to a prisoner would be: "If you are guilty, say that you wish to be tried by a jury; but, if you are innocent, allow yourself to be tried by the Court." And, in my opinion, it is very natural that I should like to be tried by men who could appreciate evidence, who are in the habit of hearing evidence every week, and who are, of course, more acquainted with human nature than men would be who were called to try a prisoner only once in a twelvemonth. In Guernsey, if I only took the trouble to make inquiries what the jurymen might have declared before they came into Court, I will say that I might challenge two thirds of the jury for the opinions they had expressed upon the case before them; because, in a small Island like this, every thing is known from one end to the other in twenty four hours. In England, if anything takes place in one parish, you will not hear any feeling expressed in the neighbouring parish or within three miles. In Guernsey it is quite otherwise: and I think that, to men not in the habit of judging, it would be very dangerous to entrust the power of deciding upon cases of which they had heard a great deal before they came into Court. The institution of a jury here, in my opinion, would be the means of getting two out of ten guilty persons acquitted. At the same time, I think, there would be the same danger of getting two innocent persons out of ten found guilty. My opinion therefore is, that a jury here would not be an advisable measure to adopt; and I should be very sorry, as a Guernseyman liable to be tried as any other person, to see it instituted.

5907. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. As rector of two country parishes, and as a member of the States, I hope the Commissioners will not consider it presumptuous in me to express my opinion, and give my reasons in answer to what these learned gentlemen have stated. I am rector of two of the most distant parishes in the Island, where the English language perhaps is least of all used. But I can safely assure you that in those remote parishes, among the rising population particularly, English is almost as well understood as French is now. In proof of that assertion, I will mention that our country people usually come to town and make their bargains in English; that they are pretty nearly all of them, or have been, militia men, who either give or receive the word of command in English, and are called on to command Englishmen, if required to do so. I would also state that at my own country schools the boys before quitting, say at about twelve years of age, can almost invariably read English, as well as they can French.

5908. Are those schools numerously attended?—Very; almost universally. And so great has been the progress of the English language of late, that, in three parishes circumjacent to mine, an English service is now always given on Sundays. If you go into any of the shops in the town, they will converse with you, and serve you with anything you may require, equally well, in ninety nine cases out of a hundred, in English, as in French. I think those are pretty strong proofs of what I began by asserting. Mr. Utermarck, the Contrôle, has stated, as a reason against trial by jury, that family connection and party spirit would render it inadvisable. But does not family connection and party spirit already exist upon the Bench? Look at the facts which have been this day elicited: and I leave the question to the Commissioners. The Contrôle has given as another reason against trial by jury being established here, the publicity which is often given to evidence by jurors. He says that a quantity of busy persons are always spending their time here in telling or hearing the news. So it was at Athens of old; and so it will be in every part of the universe where people have little or nothing to do. We are not singular in that respect.

5909. The question rather is, whether family connections and party spirit are not in themselves objections to the trial by jury?—I think, if the Commissioners will compare the evidence given after the Enquête at the late conspiracy trials with the Star of that period, they will find that some of the Jurats or some of those persons must have been very leaky indeed. It has been already said before you to-day that the Jurats meet often in private; that they are connected with each other; that they are bound together by ties of the strictest confidence and mutual support, and almost unbounded confidence in each other. I believe that every case almost is prejudged before it comes into Court. The Contrôle has stated that the jurors receive a charge from the Judge. I conceive that to be the greatest recommendation of the system. Jurors not only receive a charge from the Judge, but they are bound to abide by it to a certain extent; for no Judge in England will allow a jury to give a verdict contrary to the evidence; yet we have heard that some of the Bailiffs here have been obliged to succumb. I think we shall find by an Order in Council, lately issued regarding the Mauritius, that the English language has been established there among a mixed community. Permit me to say that we are equally mixed. Another objection raised by the Contrôle was that there were not sufficient rate-payers out of which to constitute a jury. But every stranger, as he is called, after he has resided here a year and a day, by law is capable of being put on the tax. Of those English residents there exist no less a number at this moment than six thousand persons. Will any one tell me that, among six thousand persons, twelve good men and true cannot be found? We must be sunk to a very low ebb here indeed. It is paying a very bad compliment to the English residents to say that, amongst six thousand persons, twelve good men and true cannot be found. My opinion is, that the real objection of the gentlemen at the Bar, whom you have just now listened to, is the fear of losing the situations which they now hold, and being competed with by Englishmen; that Englishmen, who know nothing of French, might be chosen. The situation of advocate then, I hope, would be open to the English Bar, and the competition given for foreign talent, the same as it is in the Church and at the College. What is good in one case holds good in the other. The Bailiff has mentioned an objection regarding the Welsh counties, and says great difficulties exist there on the score of trial by jury, so much so, that it has been proposed to club two counties together. I am aware that such difficulty does exist; but, if the same difficulty were to be found to exist here, not the least objection in particular cases could exist, I should think, in clubbing Guernsey with Jersey. The Bailiff has expressed the opinion, that a sworn interpreter is a great hindrance to the administration of justice: will he say there is a great bar to the administration of justice at the Old Bailey in London, where foreign juries are constituted and exist almost every day in the week for Frenchmen and foreigners of every description? It has been said that party feeling and party spirit are an objection in the case of jurors: but, if they exist in jurors, how much more strongly may they not exist in Jurats, who perhaps are derived from the same aristocratic families almost from generation to generation. The Bailiff has intimated his opinion that, if trial by jury were instituted, it would be necessary to have a more efficient Judge. The Bailiff is Recorder of Dartmouth; and I think he is quite as competent here as he is at Dartmouth. When he condemns a man to punishment there, he does not consult the Jurats; and, if he is efficient in one place, it appears to me he might be efficient in the other. But, if he feels himself incompetent, why not extend the Western Circuit to these Islands? Advocates might plead in French or English in these Islands: but it is necessary, in almost all cases where jurors or Jurats exist, that they should have some authorized director, against whose opinion they cannot give a verdict. Consider the case of an Englishman, who comes to be tried here, whether guilty or innocent I will not decide. The pleadings against that man, and perhaps a great part of the evidence, take place in French. There is no sworn interpreter to interpret to him.

5910. Mr. MacCulloch. There is the counsel.

5911. The Rev. D. Dobrée. That is by accident. There is no sworn interpreter to interpret the evidence or the proceedings to him; and by that means he loses many valuable opportunities, which he otherwise would have, of putting questions to prove his innocence. Why not then, at least, leave it optional to the man to be tried either in one language or the other, or by one system or the other? If it is said that Guernsey men are incompetent to understand English, how much more may it be said that Englishmen generally are incompetent to understand French. Take the two cases, and I would say that Guernsey men understand much more English than Englishmen do French. The Contrôle has called this court a theatre. I am glad I have not done so. I have seen a good many farces acted here, it is true; but, as to the expenses, if there was a Judge on the Bench who by virtue of his office might take the part of the prisoner, as is the case in England, the prisoner might very often be spared the expense of counsel at all. Mr. Carré admits that, in the comparison between jurors and Jurats, the Jurats must be interested persons. I am quite satisfied that the result of the present Commission will enable the Commissioners to judge for themselves whether trial by jury is necessary or not. I give it as my opinion that it certainly is. How can a Jurat understand the case of a man better than a juryman? I have always heard it laid down by all English Judges, and it forms a principle of every law book I have ever met with, that the great privilege of an Englishman is to be judged by his peers. Inquire who are the Jurats. They are all gentlemen of property; they all stand in the rank of rich men; they know not the cravings of want, nor half the temptations to crime; and yet you see those very Jurats, or you have seen them, awarding the same punishment to an unfortunate youth who breaks a knocker in a drunken brawl, and a man who attempts the life of his neighbour, and nearly succeeds in it, with malice aforethought. I judge of no man's motives; but permit me to say that such a case as that, such parity as that, could never have occurred, I hope, in England. Whether the Jurats are as immaculate as a jury or not. I think no case can illustrate more strongly than the case I adduced yesterday, which Colonel De Havilland was pleased to call an election. I mean about the fellowships. I think, when every man is allowed to plead his own cause, and when all the talent of the bar is ranged against a single party,

GUERNSEY.

it can hardly be called an election. I should call it on the part of the Jurats absolute predestination. It is a maxim of scripture that all Christians should let their light so shine before men that others may see their good works. I think we have seen some works to day which cannot exactly come under that category. Col. De Havilland also says, that one of our great privileges is to chuse our Judges. We no more chuse our principal Judge here than they do in England. The Bailiff is named by the Crown: and, as to all the rest of the Jurats, if they did their duty, they could not, even if they would, give a verdict against the Judge's charge: but here you find they do. What then is the use of the Bailiff? As to experience, talking of the experience of the past is like begging the question; because, as has been observed, it ought to be a matter of right, and not of public opinion. Upon the subject of expenses: they are already pretty great; but I see no objection, if trial by Jury were established in the Island, to jurors being compelled to attend gratis, as they are compelled to attend gratis at the States meetings and such like. I have already stated that the Jurats in general are not peers or equals. It has been stated that many a man is afraid to challenge the Bench, because he may be looked upon as a black sheep and become a marked man. But that could never exist in England; and a very strong reason exists upon that head, why Jurats should be challenged, and why the same Magna Charta of equal rights, which exists in England, should be put in force in this Island. How are the English represented in this Island on Juries? They are totally excluded; and yet I conceive that one half of the persons who are tried perhaps are Englishmen by birth. As a matter of history, if you look to the case of the Doges of Venice, the Inquisition in Spain, and the Thirty Tyrants in Athens, you will find they were done away with by the people precisely on the same principles as those which I am now advocating. With respect to the case of the placard in Jersey, I would say that certainly it was very improper; but the same thing might have taken place here, as regarded the Jurats. I myself saw the Governor placarded as a perjured man: and the men who so placarded him would have very little regard for the feelings of the Bailiff. I now come to what has been said by Mr. Falla: and it is a most remarkable fact that this change of opinion, which took place in his mind, arose after he had been called to the bar. All the benefits of a liberal education, all the acquirements and learning which he had obtained in France, appear to have led him to an entirely different conclusion; but, the moment he came to Guernsey, his opinion changed entirely. I must say it was a very extraordinary and sudden conversion. With respect to what he has said about the summoning of the jury, and the mode in which their minds would be prejudiced before they came into Court, I think it would be very easy to summon a number of jurors, more than would be necessary for the occasion, and that it would be not at all necessary to tell those men what case they came to judge. It is never told the jurors in England what case they are wanted for. They are sent for from distant parts of the country, and are put into the box, and then are told what is the case they have to try; and they are not permitted to leave that box till they have given their verdict. I have now, perhaps, sufficiently announced it as my opinion, that there ought, in this community, to be but one Judge, one law, and one language.

5912. (To the Bailiff.) Have you sufficient causes in one day to make it doubtful to a jury what cause they were coming to try?

5913. Certainly not: we have only one cause in a day.

5914. The Contrôle. The Commissioners will see, by the statistics, that there are not above twenty causes in the course of a year tried here.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq.—further examined.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq.

5915. Having been told, at the beginning of the inquiry, that the limit of the power to make laws by the Royal Court is the written law of the land, and that the written law is Terrien and the Approbation, the Commissioners wish to see how far the written law furnishes them with the means of ascertaining to what extent crimes are defined and punished. With respect first to Larceny. What the Commissioners find in Terrien, Lib. xii. chap. xi. p. 477, is only an Ordonnance of Francis the First relating to highway robbery, directing that parties who are convicted of it should be broken on the wheel. That chapter does not appear to be approved, so far as relates to the punishment. But chapter xx. of the same book of Terrien treats expressly "De larcin." What is the actual punishment for Larceny here?—It is very difficult for me to answer that question.

5916. We do not even find the term "Larcin" in your law. Will you tell us how the word has disappeared here?—It has disappeared from all the late actes d'accusation. I cannot say how it has disappeared.

5917. The Bailiff. The only reason I can suppose is, that there being no verb for larcin may have led to it.

5918. By Terrien, at page 491, Lib. xii. chap. xx, Larceny may be punished with death; and branding is also mentioned as a punishment. And Le Marchant, in his Remarques, says, "En cas de peine de mort nous n'avons accoustumé d'user d'aucun supplice fors que de pendre et brusler, selon l'exigence du cas," citing the Approbation on chapter xi. Can you burn for robbery or larceny now?—No.

5919. How has the burning disappeared?—I cannot say. I do not know of any law to forbid that punishment.

5920. By chapter xx. of Terrien the punishment of Larcin for the first offence is whipping; for the second, whipping with cutting off the ear and branding; and for the third hanging?—That has entirely disappeared. It is not put in practice. For the first robbery committed the man may be flogged. I have seen a man flogged for the first robbery he had committed in this Island where there was violence.

5921. Do you ever brand now?—No.

5922. Can you by law?—I dare say the Court can by law.

5923. Could you burn by law?—I should think so.

5924. Have you the term "Roberie," as a crime existing at present?—No.

5925. Will you refer to Lib. xii. Chap. xxviii. p. 501 in Terrien, and read the passage beginning "De roberie"?—"De roberie doit l'en sçauoir que clameur en doit estre faite en ceste forme. Je me plain de G. qui en la paix de Dieu et du Duc m'assaillit, et me batit et me fit sang et playe, et me tollit ma chappe en roberie: pourquoy me convient crier Haro. Et suite de roberie, si l'en sçait par l'enqueste du pays, que Haro ne fut crié, cil qui suit encherra de sa suite. Roberie n'est pas larcin furtiuement fait: mais est un brigandage ou destroussemẽt fait à force et avec outrage de la personne robée." In practice we have not the term "roberie."

5926. Is the punishment of robbery capital now?—It might be.

5927. It appears from Terrien that unless a person made Clameur de Haro he could not sue the person for robbery?—In practice it is not the case: but still there is the law; and it is "approvée."

5928. You have no peculiar law for Piracy as opposed to robbery, have you?—No.

5929. What is the punishment for piracy?—It would not be tried here.

5930. You have no jurisdiction of the seas?—No.

5931. There appeared to be a doubt about it, the other day, whether there was or not?—I have never seen any exercised.

5932. Suppose, in a Guernsey vessel, a part of the crew rose upon the master, and seized the vessel, and by means of that vessel seized other vessels, among them a Guernsey vessel, and then that she put in here. Would the Court have jurisdiction?—I do not think the Court could try them for piracy; for the robbery they might.

5933. The Contrôle. I think it is very difficult to say what would be done in a case of that kind. Properly speaking, we have no Admiralty jurisdiction here.

5934. The Procureur. In a case of piracy, Queen Elizabeth ordered the Court to judge in that particular case; and the order is to hang two or three of the most guilty and send the others away.

5935. The Contrôle. That was in the nature of a Commission. That case, or a case similar to it, will be found in the Appendix to the case between the Governor and the Royal Court.

After our verye heartye commendation, the enclosed petition hath been exhibited unto us in the behalf of one John Blondell of the Isle of Jersey, Marryner; wherein complainte is made that he hath been detayned in prison the space of fifteenth months past upon suspicion of piracie, wherewith he was charged by one Peter des Moulins, a Frenchman, who neither by himself nor his sureties that undertook to prosecute the cause for him, have made any proofe of the said accusation against Blondell (as we are informed) after such long time of his imprisonment; whereof report having been heretofore made to our the Lord Admyrall by Sir Thomas Leighton, Knight, Governor of that Island of Guernsey, I directed my letters or warrant to the Bailiff and Jurats there to send up the said prisoner unto me; to the ends he might receive speedy trial here, if any such matter were to be objected against him; notwithstanding, they have detained him still in prison, neglecting to send him unto me, in contempt of my said direction as it seemeth; we have been therefore moved to wryte these our letters unto you, whereby we do require you to take this present order that the aforesaid John Blondell may upon receipt hereof be forthwith enlarged out of prison, and good bonds taken of him both for his appearance before us (by some convenient time to be by you assigned) to answer what he may be charged withal concerning the cause before mentioned; as also to give his attendance on us for that purpose untill we shall finde cause to dismiss him. And so we bidd you heartelye farewell, from the Court of Greenwich, the 29th of May, 1599.

Court of the Island of Guernsey have taken upon themselves, not only to send a summons to Sir John Mylne, Bart., Commander in chief in that Island, requiring him to make his appearance before them, but also to threaten him with damages for detaining a Swedish Brigantine, called the Seven Brothers, laden with Iron, &c., for St. Malo's, notwithstanding His Majesty's commands had been signified by Henry Fox, Esq., one of His Majesty's principal Secretary's of State, to the Lord Delawarr, Governor of Guernsey, and, in his absence, to the Lieutenant Governor or Commander in Chief, to take effectual care that no Military Stores of any sort should be permitted to be sent to France; which proceedings of the said Bailiff and Jurats, in assuming to themselves the power of summoning the Commanding Officer of the Island to appear before them, and at the same time to threaten him with damages for having paid a dutiful obedience to His Majesty's Commands, signified by his Secretary of State, as before recited, cannot but be looked upon as unwarrantable and derogatory of His Majesty's Royal Authority, vested in the Commanding Officer in that Island, as likewise a contemptuous proceeding against His Majesty's Commands as aforesaid:

We are therefore to signify to you His Majesty's dissatisfaction at such your proceedings, and do require and command that you do not, upon any pretence whatever, presume to act in like manner for the future; but that, in all cases where you may have any reason or cause of doubt with regard to the conduct of the Commanding Officer, you are to send over to His Majesty, at this Board, a representation of the fact, that His Majesty may signify his pleasure thereupon to such Officer. And for the more effectual preventing sending lead or any Military Stores or habiliments of War to France, it is His Majesty's further pleasure, that no ship or vessel, belonging to His Island of Guernsey or any other of His dominions, be permitted to sail from Guernsey without first shewing to the proper Officers their bills of lading, and to what place they are bound, nor without taking a clearance from the proper Officer thereto (if there be one), otherwise from the Receiver of His Majesty's Revenues in that Island, or such other person as shall be appointed by the Governor for the time being; for which clearance such officer or other person is hereby required to receive no more than one shilling, sterling money of England. And so we bid you farewell. From the Council Chamber at Kensington, the 14th day of June, 1756.

"Le premier Décembre, Mil sept-cent Quatre-vingt trois, devant William Le Marchant, Ecuyer, Baillif, présents, Charles Andros, Nicolas Reserson, Elizée Tupper, Jean Carey, Thomas Dobrée, James Hubert, Jean Guille, et Eléazar Le Marchant, Ecrs., Jurés.

La Cour étant ce jourd'hui extraordinairement assemblée, sur la plainte de Monsr. Thomas Knight, négociant de la ville de Bristol, qui arriva hier, environ les dix heures du matin, en la Rade de cette Isle dans son vaisseau, le Rainbow, dont Jean Roach est maître, que Monsr., Le Lieut. Colonel Basset, Commandant en Chef en cette Isle, l'auroit fait saisir, environ les dix à onze heures du matin par un Officier Militaire, accompagné d'un soldat, comme il était à vaquer à ses affaires en cette ville; et que le dit Officier l'aurait ensuite envoyé, sous la garde du dit soldat, prisonnier sur le Corps de garde, et de là envoyé prisonnier au Chateau Cornet; le dit Officier ayant dit que la raison du dit Commandant en Chef, pour ordonner les dits arrêt et emprisonnement, est parce que le dit vaisseau du dit Mr. Knight avait une flamme (Anglicé "pendant") déployée au haut de son mât, nonobstant les Ordres du dit Commandant en Chef. Et les Officiers du Roi ayant été de la part de la Cour au dit Commandant en Chef, et l'ayant informé que les dits arrêt et emprisonnement sont subversifs des droits des sujets du Roi, et dérogatoires aux privilèges et immunités particulières de cette Isle, afin de l'engager à remettre le dit Mr. Knight en liberté: et le dit Commandant en Chef leur ayant donné pour réponse, "That any person who disobeys his orders, he has a right to imprison for twenty four hours; that he had confined Mr. Knight for having hoisted his pendant, contrary to his (the Commander in Chief's) orders; and that he considered this affair as a private dispute between him and Mr. Knight:" et les dits officiers du Roi lui ayant dit, "That the Court did not consider it as a private affair, but an infringement on the rights of the subject, and a violation of the rights and privileges of the inhabitants of this Island," le dit Mr. Basset leur a repondu, "That he did not mean to infringe the rights of the people; but that he was authorized to act as he had done, and would support or enforce his authority; and that the Court might complain of him if they pleased:"

La Cour prenant le tout en considération, ouie la conclusion des dits officiers du Roi, a délibéré:

1°. Qu'elle ne connait aucune instance qu'aucun Gouverneur, Lt. Gouverneur ou Commandant en Chef de cette Isle ait jamais empêché aucuns vaisseaux d'avoir leur flamme déployée au haut de leur mât ou prétendu avoir droit de l'empêcher; la pratique immemoriale étant que les maîtres de vaisseaux marchands (ni ayant de vaisseau du Roi présent) déploient leurs couleurs sans aucun empêchement dans aucun cas; mais ordinairement, dans les jours de fêtes, ou pour complimenter leurs bourgeois, passagers ou autrement; conséquemment que le dit Commandant en Chef s'arroge un droit vexatoire inconnu à ses prédécesseurs.

2°. Que la prétention du dit Commandant en Chef, d'avoir droit d'emprisonner pour vingt-quatre heures aucune personne qui désobéit à ses ordres, est illusoire; pareille authorité n'ayant été exercée de mémoire d'homme par aucun de ses prédécesseurs que dans des cas fort graves et dont ils devaient répondre, ou sur des personnes de la lie du peuple, pour maintenir la discipline de la milice; conséquemment, que l'arrêt et l'emprisonnement du dit Mr. Knight sont despotiques, arbitraires et destructifs aux libertés dont doivent jouir tous les sujets du Roi, et qui distinguent si heureusement le gouvernement de notre auguste Souverain.

3°. Qu', à l'égard de la réparation demandée par le dit Mr. Knight contre le dit Monsr. le Commandant en Chef, La Cour, concevant que le dit Commandant en Chef n'est point, pour le présent, justiciable devant cette Cour, elle a cru qu'il est de sa justice de le certifier à Sa Majesté, afin d'en ordonner et d'accorder le remède en loi au dit Monsr. Knight qu'en Sa sagesse et Sa justice Elle jugera propre.

La Cour, pour ces raisons, et pour empêcher des actes d'authorité qui militent contre les droits les plus sacrés des peuples et qui, s'ils n'etaient arrétés, exposeraient les habitans de cette Isle à toutes sorts de malheurs à été d'opinion de transmettre, en toute humilité, ce présent acte à Sa Majesté et sur ce de lui faire ses très humbles remontrances."

5938. The Bailiff. The question of Piracy was also brought before the Commissioners in 1607. The passage relating to it is at page 27 of the "Documens relatifs à l'Ile de Guernsey." The passage was read on a former day.

5939. (To Mr. Falla.) By what law is any punishment inflicted for robbery, except that which is laid down in Terrien? You never hang for mere robbery?—Never. It is the law of the Island, as stated in Terrien, that vol domestique is to be punished by death. That law is not put in force; but to tell you how it has been altered or has ceased to be put in force, I cannot. I do not know of any law authorizing the Court to substitute another punishment.

5940. The Procureur. Except the general law which states that the punishment is to be left à l'arbitrement du Juge.

5941. What is the passage in Terrien to which you refer?—The Note at page 530, Lib. xii. c. xxxix. "Ou autre peine." "Les peines des crimes sont toutes arbitraires en ce Royaume; si non d'autant qu'il y en a de statuées, indites et imposées par les édicts et ordonnances Royaux. Et combien que la loy die quòd facti quidem quæstio in arbitrio judicantis est, pœnæ verò executio non ejus voluntati, sed legis authoritati reseruatur: toutes fois le Juge auec cognoissance de cause peut augmenter ou diminuer la peine, selon les circonstances; c'est à sçauoir, selon l'honnesteté ou vilité des personnes, selon leur aage, selon les merites de la vie précedente; selon le dol et malice des délinquans, ou pour autre cause raisonnable."

5942. (To Mr. Falla.) That appears to be where no specific punishment is laid down. Whence does the right of the Court to transport criminals arise?—There is no law authorizing the Court to transport.

5943. It does transport, does not it?—It does: but I conceive the Court has no right to do so.

5944. (To the Bailiff.) What is the routine when a person is ordered for transportation?—A notice of it is sent over to the Home Office; and a letter comes from the Home Office directing that the prisoner should be sent to Millbank; and certain certificates are to be signed. The first thing is to send to the Home Secretary a statement of the judgment, that the prisoner is to be transported to such place as Her Majesty in Council shall direct, and requesting accordingly.

5945. A direction takes place in consequence, does not it?—The Procureur. An Order in Council is usually sent by a messenger.

5946. The Bailiff. An Order in Council is sent with the letter.

5947. (To the Bailiff.) That Order in Council does no more than direct the particular place; it does not set the punishment in motion?—I do not recollect the precise form of the Order in Council.

5948. Mr. Falla. I pleaded that, in the case of Smith, who was tried for forgery here. I argued that the Court had no right to transport a prisoner; but my objection was overruled. That was in the year 1842.

5949. (To Mr. Falla.) Do you think the Chapter in Terrien (Lib. xii. chap. xxiv.) "De recepteurs et complices des mal-faiteurs" alludes to stolen goods?—I think so.

5950. The Bailiff. I think the word "Receleurs" would now be used in that case.

5951. Mr. Falla. The words "ceux qui les receptent" evidently refer to those who receive and harbour the evil-doers themselves; but the words "Parçonniers" and "Consentans" include the receivers.

5952. Have you such a crime as simply receiving stolen goods by itself, not treated as an act of larceny?—Yes; at least cases have occurred.

5953. What is the punishment?—From a fortnight to three months' imprisonment.

5954. As much of that time as the Court thinks proper on bread and water, probably?—Yes.

5955. That would not be tried "au Grand Criminel," would it?—No; "A l'Ordinaire."

5956. The Bailiff. I suppose the limit might be banishment for any period not exceeding six years.

5957. (To Mr. Falla.) Suppose a person trusted by his master with money makes off with it; what should you call that?—We should call that "frauduleusement approprier."

5958. What would be the punishment?—It depends upon the discretion of the Court. From a fortnight to two or three months' imprisonment, and a part on bread and water. The Court might condemn the person to banishment for any period less than seven years.

The Bailiff. The form of the accusation would be, à telle peine, punition, ou châtiment corporel, que la Cour trouvera condigne.

5959. Have you any written law making fraudulent appropriation a crime?—No.

5960. The term "Péculat" in Terrien, Lib. xii. c. xvi, is confined to the appropriation of public moneys is it not?—Yes.

5961. You do not admit that chapter of Terrien, do you, according to the "Approbation?"—No. But it has been admitted to be a crime in the case of Dorey, the parish-officer. He was the Procureur des Pauvres; in his accounts he stated that he had given money to so many poor families; it was found out that he had not. He was supposed to have appropriated about 100*l.*; and he was sued for the offence, "frauduleusement approprier." I pleaded that there was no crime of Péculat, and that he could not be found guilty of any crime, and consequently that he must be acquitted. The Court overruled that; and he was condemned to two months' imprisonment. I pleaded that that chapter was not approved; and that it was therefore no law of ours; and I maintained that the crime of which he was accused was the crime of Péculat.

GUERNSEY.

Thomas John Blondel Falla, Esq.

October 9th, 1846.

5962. Under what law was he punished? If your criminal law be derived from Terrien and the chapter which constitutes péculat be not approved, how do you get any law in this country applying to a case of péculat?—I do not know of any law; and, I conceive, the Court was not authorized to inflict a punishment upon that man; especially when it is so well defined by the Commentary. "Ceste ordonnance est assez clere qu'elle entend Péculat estre larcin des deniers du Roy commis par ceux qui en ont la charge et administration, combien que de droict il s'estende plus loin."

5963. The Contrôle. The Court held that this chapter of Terrien had effect only as regards the particular Ordonnance of François I. there mentioned, for increasing the punishment; thereby showing that it was a crime punishable before that Ordonnance existed; and that therefore the Approbation merely excluded this particular Ordonnance, but left the crime punishable by the common law.

5964. Are we to understand that, by the common law of Guernsey, there is a general principle that a thing, which appears to be prejudicial and in the moral sense of the word wrong, may be punished?

5965. The Bailiff. I think there is a general notion of misdemeanor at common law, particularly in the case referred to, of misconduct on the part of a public officer.

5966. (To the Bailiff.) May the Commissioners understand, in the first place, that you do not hold yourselves bound to the punishment laid down in Terrien and the Approbation; that you do hold yourselves entitled to substitute another; and also that you are entitled to punish generally crimes which you do not find there?—I take it that there are crimes punished which are not found textually in Terrien. The Court was inclined to think, in that case, that it was a common law offence; and inferred, from the language of Terrien, that there was a common law offence of the kind.

5967. (To the Bailiff.) Are not crimes punished sometimes without any precedent?—I do not know.

5968. The Contrôle. The case which has been referred to is an instance.

5969. Mr. De Jersey. Bell, in his Dictionary, says:—"In Scotland, the supreme Criminal Court has an inherent power to take cognizance, to a certain extent, of new offences; and is authorized by usage to inflict an arbitrary punishment, that is, a punishment not affecting the life of the offender; and generally speaking, and in the ordinary state of society, and for practical purposes, this system is attended with great advantages. According to Mr. Hume, it is thus far beneficial to the public, "that the evil is repressed in its beginnings, and more effectually than "it ever can be by any statute, because all statutes are liable to be partial and defective in their "descriptions of new offences; and thus the transgressor finds the means of eluding the sanction, "and the law itself falls into contempt. But it is also a merciful course to the offender; because "the crime, being censured on its first appearance, and before it has become flagrant or alarming to the community, is restrained at that season by far milder correctives, than are "afterwards necessary to be applied to it, when the growing evil has come to require the "passing of an express law in that behalf. Thus in England, the sending of incendiary or "threatening letters is punished with death, in virtue of certain statutes, which passed at a "time when this sort of wickedness prevailed. But our Judges punished the first offender of "this sort (whose trial was within these fifty years) with transportation; and it has never been "found necessary to seek authority for any higher or more rigorous judgment."*—Hume, vol. i. p. 12. I think that expresses the principle on which we should act here.

5970. (To the Lieutenant Bailiff.) You do not hold yourselves bound, where one special punishment is mentioned in Terrien, to adhere to that punishment or to abstain from another?

5971. Mr. Carré. I should think not. What Terrien says upon the subject is clear upon that point, that the Judge is not bound specifically to any one punishment; but may inflict another provided he does not go beyond.

5972*a*. Do you hold that the Court could do that in its character of a Court?—Yes.

5972*b*. In its legislative character, of course, it could not; because it would thereby change the written law?—It could not.

5973. If that be so, your judicial power exceeds your legislative power in that sense?—You may consider it so. We have no right, sitting in Chefs Plaids, to bind the Court sitting in judgment upon an offender to a specific punishment. The passage from Terrien, cited by the Procureur, shews clearly that the Court are not confined to a specific punishment.

Maurice De Courcy, Esq., further examined.

Maurice De Courcy, Esq.

October 10th, 1846.

5974. Have you any further observations to make to the Commissioners?—With reference to the observations which were made yesterday, as to trial by jury, I would say that I would prefer the Court being a little more before the public. It was said that the Court were constantly before the public; I take leave to say, that the Court are too frequently in private among themselves; I refer to the sittings au secret. I think that the Bailiff made one observation, which I will take the liberty to remark on, that he thought the twelve best men could be dispensed with at public meetings. Without reference to the Bailiff and these twelve men, I deny their being the best twelve men, or the twelve most sensible men in the island. Colonel De Havilland spoke of the loss it would be to the privileges of the Island, the nomination of Judges coming from the Crown. His respected father had an appointment from the Crown, and certainly no difficulty arose from that appointment.

Délibération.

C. W. Tupper, Ec^r., un des Députés de la Douzaine de la ville et paroisse de St. Pierre Port, dans la séance des Etats de cette Ile, tenue le 21^e Août dernier, ayant, ce jour, informé la dite Douzaine qu'il adressa la dite assemblée des Etats dans la langue Anglaise (la langue, dans laquelle tant lui que d'autres membres de la dite Douzaine sont dans l'habitude d'exprimer leurs opinions dans les séances de la dite Douzaine), et qu'il fut interrompu dans sa dite adresse; et par une décision de la dite Assemblée des Etats il lui fut permis par faveur de finir sa dite adresse à la dite Assemblée; mais qu'il fut aussi déclaré par la majorité de la dite Assemblée, qu'il ne serait plus permis à aucun membre des dits Etats d'adresser les dits Etats dans la langue Anglaise: a Douzaine, sensible que, dans l'état actuel de la société, la langue Anglaise est la langue du commerce et de l'usage le plus général dans la dite ville et paroisse; sensible qu'une grande partie de ses membres est dans l'incapacité de s'exprimer librement dans aucune autre langue; sensible de l'importance d'une expression libre et facile des opinions et des sentimens de tout Député envoyé aux dits Etats; sensible aussi que les dits Etats ont sanctionné l'usage de la langue Anglaise dans leur Assemblées, en permettant à un Magistrat de la Cour Royale de se servir constamment de la dite langue: A déclaré acquiescer au protêt verbal du dit C. W. Tupper, Ec^r., contre la décision des Etats du 21^e Août dernier; et déclare autoriser Messieurs les connétables de la dite paroisse à transmettre au Président des Etats cette présente délibération, afin qu'il connaisse les sentimens de la dite Douzaine à ce sujet, comme, aussi, à prendre toutes et telles mesures qu'ils trouveront nécessaires à ce sujet, dans l'intérêt de la dite Douzaine, bien entendu que telles mesures seroient préalablement soumises à la dite Douzaine.

Séance du 25 ^me Août, 1846.

5979. The Bailiff. The Town Douzaine of the parish consists of twenty two members, that is, of twenty Douzeniers and two constables. The Lieutenant Bailiff has since received a counter protest, signed by ten members of that Douzaine, which I will also hand in.

The same was delivered in, and is as follows.

Guernesey, ce 8^e Sept^re. 1846.

Monsieur,

La majorité de la Douzaine Centrale de St. Pierre Port (alors présente) ayant protesté contre la décision des Etats du 21^e Août, qui ne permet à aucun membre à l'avenir d'adresser cette Assemblée en Anglais, nous, sous-signés, déclarons formellement notre différence de sentiment à cet égard, et vous prions, Monsieur, de vouloir bien exercer votre authorité et votre influence afin d'empêcher un document si anti-national d'être enregistré sur les records des Etats,

Nous avons l'honneur d'être,
Monsieur,
Votres très humble et obéissants serviteurs,

5980. Mr. Carré. Mr. Tupper commenced addressing the States in English; and a member of the States objected that he had no right so to do. Some discussion took place, and I stated, as the then President of the States, that French was the language of the States. It is the language in which the Billet des Etats is written, and in which all the proceedings are entered; it is the language of the States; and no other language could be spoken without the leave of the States. At the same time I expressed an opinion that probably the States would be ready to grant that permission, if he wished to have it. It was put to the vote, and was carried; but there were several of the country Deputies who objected to it, and objected to it on the ground that they did not understand English; some that they could not follow him; and others that they did not understand English at all.

5981. In the States probably the majority would prefer French to English on account of the great number of country parishes represented?—The persons who speak chiefly are not from the country. There are more people who do not understand English than who do not understand French. I should say that everybody understands French; but there are some who do not understand English.

5982. Is there anything like a possibility of getting at the fact, how that would be as to the population, taking the Island in a mass?—I cannot give you any information.

5983. Mr. Dobrée (Jurat). I should say, it would very nearly come to a balance in this way, that the population of the Island is nearly equally divided between the town and the country.

5984. Mr. De Havilland. The town population is about three fifths, and the country two fifths; and part of the inhabitants of the town parish, included in the three fifths, are actually country people, residing in the suburbs of the town.

5985. Mr. Dobrée (Jurat). I should say that the entire of the two fifths of the country would prefer the French language, and a very large proportion of the three fifths of the town.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

October 10th, 1846.

5986. Mr. De Havilland. I think, all the part of the Island which may be called the country, namely, nine parishes and a part of the tenth, are much more interested in the welfare of the Island than are a large portion of the town, for this simple reason, that almost all their property is reality: whereas, not only is a large portion of the town's people strangers, but another portion has scarcely any thing else but personalty.

5987. (To Mr. De Havilland.) Probably many residents in the town are strangers or sojourners; whereas the country people are residents on the land and farmers?—Yes; and their interest in the soil I take to be greater than those whose only property is personal.

5988. The Bailiff. I do not know whether it may be a part of the Commissioners' plan, hereafter, to divide the duties of the Bailiff. In case any such plan should be suggested, as, for instance, that it should be the business of the Bailiff to preside at the trial, and the business of the Lieutenant Bailiff to preside at the commital in the Court of Police, I would recommend that it should be stated in this way; that the Court should be presided over either by the Bailiff or his Lieutenant, provided whichever of them presided at the committal, should not preside at the trial. There are some advantages in that over dividing it permanently. It would often be a matter of convenience in a variety of ways, that one should have the opportunity of presiding in the other's Court.

5989. Mr. Carré. As Lieutenant Bailiff, I am of the same opinion.

5990. The Bailiff. Occasionally, the Bailiff leaves the Island. It would be very right, then, that he should sit occasionally in the Police Court, in order that the Lieutenant Bailiff should be qualified to preside at trials.

5991. Mr. De Courcy. I would suggest to the Commissioners, in case of the establishment of a Police Court, to put it on exactly the same footing as a Police magistrate is put in England. The expense would be greatly lessened. I believe that persons cannot now approach the Police Court, on the ground of the expense; they are deterred from coming on the ground of the uncertainty of their cases being disposed of. They sit seldom.

5992. The Bailiff. That is perfectly incorrect. The Police Court sits every Thursday throughout the year. In the course I propose, cases would be brought before the Police Court which now come before the regular Court at present, and embarrass the proceedings of the Court very much.

5993. (To the Contrôle.) With respect to frauds upon the Bankrupt Laws: have you an actual Bankrupt Law here?—The Commissioners, who came here in 1815, made some regulations on the subject, which are embodied in different Orders in Council. It is not a complete Bankrupt Law, certainly. The regulations contained in those Orders in Council are with respect to the Bankrupt Law.

5994. (To the Bailiff.) Is there any Insolvent Law as distinct from the Bankrupt Law?—No; it is more in the nature of a Cessio Bonorum.

5995. You have no distinct systems here, have you, one for those who are traders, and another for those who are not traders?

5996. The Contrôle. No. There is "Renonciation" and "Cessio," both. The difference between them is this; that cessio merely frees a man till he acquires new property, and renonciation frees him for ever.

5997. The Bailiff. The renonciation is a voluntary act; and you cannot be driven to it by committing an act of bankruptcy.

5998. Some cases must occasionally occur of fraud upon the creditors?

5999. The Contrôle. There are precedents. And the Order in Council of the 20th December, 1825, empowers the full Court to condemn a fraudulent debtor to an imprisonment for a period not beyond two years. That is not strictly speaking a criminal proceeding at all. It is a proceeding in this form. A man claims the benefit of a cession, having been imprisoned; the creditors oppose that; and, upon their proving acts of fraud, the Court withholds the discharge to a certain time.

6000. But it is incumbent upon them to discharge at the end of the two years?—Yes.

6001. Will you look at Terrien, page 491, lib. xii., c. xxi., Des banqueroutiers, and at the Approbation on the same chapter. Is that approved or disapproved?—There is the word "nihil;" which means that we do not make use of this law.

6002. The law of Terrien therefore does not apply?—No.

6003. Have you any criminal proceedings for frauds of that sort?—Yes; we have this proceeding. Every person, applying either for the benefit of cession or renonciation, is obliged to deliver in a general schedule containing a list of his debts, both due to him and from him, and of all the property he may possess. After that, he takes an oath, before the Bailiff and two Jurats, that the contents of that schedule are true. In case of their not being true, he is liable to a prosecution for perjury thereon. But, in the case of his having withheld or concealed any of his property, or made away with it in any way, there is a prosecution in the nature of a fraud. There are precedents for it. There is one case, since I have been at the Bar, which I defended myself; the case of a man of the name of Ferrell, in the year 1843; he was acquitted. The last condemnation took place on the 4th of December, 1841, the case of Bailey. I believe, in that case, he had been admitted and had completed his renonciation, and it was after that, that this property was discovered. The following is the first count in the acte d'accusation.

The same was read as follows.

6004. Sur l'action des officiers de la Reine contre James Bailey, fils de Jean, de la paroisse de St. Pierre Port, prisonnier dans la prison publique, à soutenir leur preuve en la cause qu'ils ont contre lui à se voir adjuger à telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel que la Cour trouvera condigne, pour avoir, le dit Bailey, le 8e Août, 1840, ou environ, étant dépourvu de la crainte de Dieu, dans la ville et paroisse de S$^{t}$. Pierre Port, commis le crime de parjure ; le dit Bailey, qui avait demandé d'être admis à renoncer à tous biens meubles et héritages aux fins d'acte de la Cour Royale, du 1 Août, 1840, sur la cause mise contre lui par le S$^{r}$ Thomas Lihonu le dit Bailey ayant devant Justice, dans la dite paroisse de S$^{t}$ Pierre Port, le dit jour, 8$^{e}$ Août, 1840, ou environ, méchamment et frauduleusement et dans le dessein de nuire et de frauder ses créanciers, déclaré par serment que l'inventaire, livré par lui en présence de Thomas Le Retilley, Ecuyer, Juré, commis de la Cour, le 7$^{e}$ Août, 1840, de ses biens, meubles, effets et marchandises, ainsi que de ses dettes actives et passives, était du meilleur de sa connaisance un état fidelle de tout ce qu'il possédait; et ce, quoique, lorsque le dit Bailey fit le dit serment, il savoit avoir caché et célé une grande partie de ses dits biens, meubles et effets et marchandises dans une maison et jardin lors occupés par Timothée Clinch, Ec$^{r}$, et situés à Vauvert, en la dite paroisse de S$^{t}$ Pierre Port, où les dits biens, meubles, effets et marchandises ont été dernièrement saisis.

6005. The Contrôle. There is a proceeding, somewhat analogous to that, in cases where persons, after an arrest made upon their property, have removed the effects arrested by the Sheriff. They are liable to a criminal proceeding upon it.

6006. Is that in the nature of a fraud too?—Yes.

6007. Are you speaking now of seizures under the law of renonciation?—No; general seizures under the law of arrest. Property is liable to arrest here before any process has taken place. If you have a claim against a person, you may begin your proceeding by arresting his property.

6008. What is the punishment in the case you mention?—Imprisonment with bread and water.

6009. For what length of time?—Two or three months.

6010. There is no specific limit?—No.

6011. The Bailiff. The frame of the accusation, in all these cases, limits the amount of punishment.

6012. (To the Contrôle.) We presume there is no written origin of this law. The offence is punished by your common law is not it?—Yes. I apprehend the way to state the punishment would be, to say that it might be up to seven years' banishment.

6013. There is no Order in Council, nor Ordonnance for the punishment, nor anything, except what has been called the common law?—That is all.

6014. The Contrôle. There is a class of cases, in which persons have been tried for having concealed property in the Island, so as to get it carried out of the Island before the Sheriff could arrest it; and they have been indicted for that, although there had been no legal proceedings taken against them. The latest proceeding of that kind is in the month of April, 1837. The man was condemned to two months' imprisonment, one solitary on bread and water, and three years' banishment. The indictment is in the following form.

The same was read as follows.

6015. " Sur l'action des officiers du Roi contre Elie Way, fils de Joseph, de Tolpuddle, dans le Comté de Dorset, en Angleterre, prisonnier dans la prison publique, à soutenir leur preuve en la cause qu'ils ont contre lui, à se voir adjuger à telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel que la cour trouvera condigne, pour avoir, le dit Way, soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, depuis le 1$^{er}$ Mars au 3$^{e}$ Avril, 1837 ou environ, dans la paroisse de St. Pierre Port, frauduleusement porté ou fait porter, caché ou fait cacher, dans une maison appartenant aux Etats, et située à la rue de la Fontaine, occupée en tout ou partie par Thomas Prowse, dix grandes jarres ou bouteilles de terre remplies de liqueurs spiritueuses, trois douzaines ou environ de bouteilles de vin et de cordiaux, des quilles, un panier contenant assiettes, couteaux et fourchettes, et une poche contenant des outils à cordonnier, le tout appartenant au dit Way, et ce à dessein de frauder et voler ses créanciers; le dit Way lequel était cordonnier et gardait cabaret à la rue du Parcq, devant de l'argent à Jean Valrent, Ecuyer, à Monsieur Pierre De La Mère, au Sr. Victor Benoist, et à autres ses créanciers : Item, avoir le dit Way, dans le dit tems et dans les dits lieux, soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, frauduleusement obtenu de la toile du Sieur Jean Carrol, et avoir, sous de faux prétextes ou dans le dessein prémédité de frauder ses créanciers, obtenu une quantité de cuirs du Sr. Victor Benoist, et les dites liqueurs spiritueuses, le dit vin et les dits souliers, portés dans l'accusation ci-dessus, de divers particuliers, notamment des dits Monsr. Valrent, Pierre De La Mère, Victor Benoist, Jean Carrol ou de quelques uns d'iceux, et avoir été empêché de compléter le transport des dites marchandizes ou de quelques unes d'icelles hors de cette Ile par des circonstances indépendantes de la volonté du dit Way."

6016. Is this also an offence by the Common Law?—Yes; I was wrong in saying that there is no written law to punish a party who removes his goods fraudulently after they are arrested. There is a law with respect to the removal of property attached by process from the Court, which you will find in Terrien, lib. xi., chap. i., p. 405.

The passage was read as follows.

6017. " L'en doit sauoir que s'aucun a gaigné par jugement la saisine d'aucune chose contre un autre, et cil qui l'a perduë y met puis la main, il doit estre justicé par corps et par biens, tant qu'il ait restoré l'autre de tous les dommages qu'il a eus par luy, et qu'il ait amendé à la Cour, autrement despeceroit on chacun jour ce qui seroit fait et jugé en Cour. Car tout ce qui est jugé en Cour doit estre gardé sans contredict, jusques à tant qu'il soit rappelé par plus solonnel jugement. Pareillement, quand aucun met la main à la chose qui est arrestée ou prinse en la main de Justice, deuant que la querelle soit finée, le corps de luy doit estre mis en prison et retenu jusques à tant qu'il l'ait amendé, et rendu ce qui a esté empiré par son meffait."

6018. The Contrôle. That is strictly a proceeding in the case of persons removing property under arrest: and that is very analogous to the form of proceeding now.

6019. Is the precedent which you have given us a strictly criminal proceeding?—Yes. The first applied to bankruptcy, and the latter to fraudulent removal, without the Sheriff having been there at all. In the case of the Sheriff having possession of the property, and the person removing it, the usual form is for the Sheriff to produce the person before the Cour Ordinaire, and for the case to be dealt with summarily.

6020. That is to say, it is an application by the Sheriff to the Court to vindicate his authority over the goods?—Yes.

6021. Suppose a case tried by seven Jurats, with three Chefs d'accusation; and that six of them thought the prisoner guilty, but on different counts; two for each of the three counts. What would be the result?—It is difficult to give any opinion upon that, because the opinion of the Court would be taken at the same time upon the whole accusation. In the way the case is put, there would be an embarrassment. Technically, the prisoner would be amerci: a conviction would take place.

6022. The Bailiff. Suppose there are a dozen chefs d'accusation. Some of the Jurats may think he is guilty of count two or three, others may think he is guilty of count four or five, or six. That is not so material; because those who find him guilty of the smaller offence will award the less punishment. So that, in all probability, the punishment will be according to the opinion of the majority.

6023. (To the Contrôle.) When you prosecute criminally for fraudulent removal to avoid seizure, do you allege a debt?—Yes.

6024. Are you bound to prove that?—I presume so. I was not at the bar when those proceedings were entered. I found them from the indexes; and they always appeared to me rather curious ones. I do not know what the proof brought forward by the Crown was.

6025. Probably the creditors in Way's case came to the bar and declared upon oath that Way owed them money?—Yes.

6026. Would it be sufficient to prove a debt to somebody, or must A, B, and C, prove their separate debts?—I should say that some of the debts mentioned must be proved; and other cases would be added for the purpose of showing the intention.

6027. There was a case at which the Commissioners were present, in which a man was brought up for appropriating a purse. The whole of the circumstances were stated in the accusation. Must they be proved exactly as they are laid? Would a mistake, for instance, in the proof of the property be fatal to the charge?—I conceive so. If the evidence is very clear, it is usual to allege everything specifically. If there should be any doubt upon the evidence, it would be laid a little more vaguely. For instance, with regard to time, when we are quite sure of the day, we allege the day; if we were not sure of the day, we should allege the whole month. There is one instance which I could put specifically to the Commissioners. It might be laid "d'avoir depuis le de Septembre, au d'Octobre."

6028. But you are bound by your statement?—Yes. I am not quite clear whether the property could be laid as the property of a person unknown; but, if it be laid that it belongs to a person, you are bound to prove who that person is.

6029. The second count in Way's case, for example, is very special indeed. It alleges the false pretences, and also the intent to carry the goods out of the Island. Suppose you proved the false pretence only, and not an intent to take them out of the Island?—I should say that that count would fail. I should say that, having laid in the same count that they were obtained with a fraudulent design of appropriating them and also with the design of carrying them out of the Island, you must prove both. Had there been any doubt upon that, the duty of the Crown officers would have been to have laid them in different counts.

6030. Most of your actes d'accusation are concise statements of the facts against the prisoner?—They are.

6031. It therefore becomes important to know how far the party accusing is tied to proof of the particular facts he alleges?—I conceive he is tied to the particular facts.

6032. The Bailiff. The accusation would be good if put at large; but it is proper to give the prisoner as much information as you can, when you consider that the mise en accusation is the only information he gets of the nature of the charge against him. It also saves us from defining the crime, to state the particular facts.

6033. The Contrôle. I could give the Commissioners some very strong cases, in which the prisoner, under such circumstances, was acquitted. There was one case, in which a man was indicted for ill treating his wife; her name was laid as "Mary Blatchford," and on the trial it was proved to be "Eliza;" he was acquitted.

6034. (To the Contrôle.) Suppose a man were indicted for having given his wife certain kicks; and it were proved, on the trial, that the ill treatment was by blows. Would that be fatal to the charge?—I conceive so. If there were any doubts as to how the ill treatment had been caused, it would have been laid, by a kick, or a stick, or with a knife, and so on, leaving it doubtful.

6035. Suppose you were to charge obtaining goods under false pretences. Would you allege it, in the same way as it is there, "d'avoir frauduleusement obtenu sous de faux prétextes;" or would you lay it "d'avoir frauduleusement approprié?"—I should say you would put in both. You would say "Having fraudulently appropriated goods which he had obtained by false pretences."

6036. Are the technical words "fraudulently appropriating," or "obtaining by false pretexts?"—I conceive the form would be as I have stated. In the year 1833, on the 11th of May, John Mew was indicted for having "soit seul ou avec autre son complice, ou autres ses complices, soit d'aubord du navire Danois, le Jupiter, ou dans ou proche la Baie des Corbelets en l'Ile d'Auregny, pris, volé ou s'être furtivement emposséde d'un ballot, contenant des schalls on mouchoirs de soie, faisant partie de la cargaison du dit navire Danois, le Jupiter, dont le Sieur F. W. Lofgrew étoit maître." It was not alleged there to whom they belonged.

6037. In mentioning the case of a false pretence, in which it would be laid both ways,

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

October 10th, 1846.

what is the punishment?—The accusation would run "à telle peine punition ou châtiment corporel, que la Cour trouvera condigne."

6038. Is the obtaining money or goods under false pretences also made a crime, and punished under the general jurisdiction of the Court, and not by any particular law or enactment?—Exactly so.

6039. Have you a distinct head of offence corresponding to the English crime of Burglary?—No: but, in the case of a robbery committed in a dwelling-house, and at night, and of there being a breaking, all those facts would be laid specially in the acte d'accusation, and would be an aggravation of the offence.

6040. It would be vol avec effraction nuitamment?—Yes.

6041. Supposing no theft is committed; that a person breaks into a house by night and does not steal?—It would be the attempt to commit the crime, which he would be indicted for.

6042. Is it a specific offence the breaking into a house in the night time with intent to commit a felony?—Yes; but I conceive it would be necessary for the Crown to allege and to prove that there had been some hindrance in the committal of that crime. If not, it might be indicted as an act of brigandage.

6043. Supposing the person is charged with breaking into a dwelling-house in the night with intent to commit a felony?—That would be a perfectly indictable offence; but we should be bound to add to that, that the committing of the felony had been prevented by circumstances independent of the will of the prisoner. I conceive that that would form an essential part of the indictment.

6044. If he broke into the house in the night, intending to commit a felony, but, having broken in, a sudden compunction came over his mind, and he walked out of the house; would he be convicted of the crime?—No; not in that shape. In that case we might indict for malicious mischief.

6045. What would be the punishment for an offence of that kind?—I conceive that an offence of that kind would be indicted au Grand Criminel, as the complete offence would have been.

6046. Is that punishable under the general jurisdiction of the Court, or by some law in Terrien?—Under the general jurisdiction of the Court. It might probably come under the head that was mentioned yesterday. I believe there is nothing very specific with respect to attempts in any part of Terrien.

6047. In the case of "vol," you add "nuitamment" and "avec effraction," purely as aggravations?—Yes.

6048*a*. Without adding those circumstances in the acte d'accusation, can you prove them?—You may prove them; but, if you do not add them in the acte d'accusation, the trial would be au Criminel Ordinaire, and not au Grand Criminel.

6048*b*. Can you try au Grand Criminel without laying the offence félonieusement?—You would lay an offence of that kind félonieusement.

6049. Could you lay a simple vol félonieusement?—Not without the circumstances.

6050. Not without showing how the felonious character was imparted to it?—No.

6051. What is the law with regard to arson in this country?—That is charged félonieusement also.

6052. Is there any law in Terrien relative to Arson?—I am not aware, at this moment, that there is. There are precedents. It would be tried au Grand Criminel.

6053. Arson, perhaps, would be the burning of houses. Have you any law as to the malicious burning of stacks and crops?—I believe not.

6054. In the case of the malicious setting fire to a barn; would that be laid félonieusement?—I conceive so. There was a case of Arson about ten or twelve years ago which was laid félonieusement.

6055. So with ships the same?—Yes; I am not aware of any precedent for ships.

6056. Your opinion is that such cases ought all to be laid félonieusement?—I conceive so.

6057. Mr. Le Retilley. There was a case of burning a stack some eleven years ago. There was an inquiry made; but there was not sufficient proof to indict the person.

6058. (To the Contrôle.) Do you recollect the circumstances of McCrea's case?—His was a case of Arson. A dwelling-house was burnt; but he was acquitted.

6059. The Bailiff. "Les Ardeurs" are mentioned in the Coustumier, chap. iv. De Justicier. Also in Terrien, Lib. III. chap. v. p. 59, this passage from the Coustumier is cited. This refers to persons guilty of arson. A custom or law in Normandy, which may not have been inserted in Terrien, and so may not have come down to us there, may still be law in this Island. There are other things which are matter of common law here. In the Placita de Quo Warranto Insulæ de Gerneseye et Jereseye, there is the following entry. Coïtas hujus Insulæ allocuta quâ lege utuntur et per quam legem clamant deduci, an videlicet per legem Angliæ vel Normannorum aut per speciales consuetudines eis per Reges concessas, &c., dicunt quòd nec per legem Angliæ nec Normannorum sed per certas consuetudines in hâc insulâ usitatas à tempore quo memoria non existit. Placita de Quo Warranto, Ed. II. p. 825. I think it would be beyond our power to make any Ordonnance altering custom which stands upon the footing of a law.

6060. (To the Bailiff.) Suppose the Court, acting judicially, to say that, setting fire to a stack was felony. That, the Commissioners understand, would be within the scope of their authority?—Yes.

6061. Suppose them to have decided that such firing was not felony. Would they have any power to make an Ordonnance creating it a felony?—No; I do not apprehend that any Ordonnance would give the power of inflicting more than a fine, or perhaps imprisonment.

6062. The Contrôle. Not imprisonment, except in default of the payment of the fine.

6063. (To the Bailiff.) Do you think you could make an Ordonnance fining a man to a certain amount for firing a stack?—Yes; by making it a mere matter of police.

6064. Would that limit it to cases which may be tried by the Cour du Quartier?—Not quite; it would be either a matter for the Cour du Quartier, or an action for penalties.

6065. The Contrôle. The jurisdiction of the Cour Ordinaire, in matters of fines, is confined to cases under thirty livres Tournois. All other cases of penalties must be tried before the full Court by a penal action.

6066. The Bailiff. I do not think it is very clear where the line as to the power of the Court is to be drawn. In the case of Tupper against the Treasurers of the Hospital, the validity of certain Ordinances, which were in question before the Privy Council, was recognized. It was admitted that every thing could not be done by Ordonnance; but the Court said it would be difficult to draw the line. I think that we should probably feel the difficulty as much as the Privy Council.

6067. Mr. MacCulloch. In the third chapter of the first Book of Terrien, there is a quotation in which the different kinds of law are distinguished. In the 12th page you will find: "Aussi à l'opposite, la coustume de nouueau introduite abat l'ordonnance contraire precedentement faite. Pareillement une coustume est abroguée par non usance ou coustume contraire de nouueau introduite." That is a principle which has been universally recognized in Guernsey; whether properly or improperly I will not say; but that is the fact.

6068. The Bailiff. It is like a general custom, which sixty years suffices for. In the same case of Tupper against the Treasurers of the Hospital, it was thrown out by Mr. Baron Parke whether forty years did or not create a custom.

6069. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Against this chapter in the Approbation there is written "nihil," as one of the chapters not approved?—That is not exactly right. There is a general approbation which embraces the whole book. The Approbation des Loix certainly does not recognize this chapter; but it says: "Au lieu du premier livre, qui traite de la Justice et du droit des Normands, nous avons accoustumé d'user suivant le Livre appelé l'Etente du Roy, et Précepte de l'Assise, lesquels doivent estre en cette Isle, gardée et observée inviolablement, tant pour l'Election Estat, et direction des Justiciers et autres Officiers de Sa Majesté que aussi pour les Droits, Rentes, Revenus, Services, Hommages et Suittes de Court appartenants et dûës à Sa Majesté en cette dite Isle de Guernezey." It does not reject it; but says we have other things instead.

6070. Your construction is that it is not a substitution of the Extent of the King and the Precept of Assize for the first Book, but that it is the first book of Terrien in addition to them?—Not exactly that. I consider that it is the first Book, except where the contrary is ruled by the Précepte d'Assise and the Extent. We have always admitted the general principles laid down here.

6071. The Contrôle. In Terrien, Lib. iii, chap. v, page 60, you will see, in the note to Malfaiteurs, "De l'Office du Bailly sur le faict des crimes sera escrit cy-après par un traicté à part," referring to Book xii. Then, if you go to page 463, Lib. xii, chap. ii., "De l'Office des Baillis et Vicontes sur le faict des Crimes," which chapter is approved, Terrien says, citing La Coustume: "Le Bailly est appelé Justicier du pays, qui est estably par le Prince pour garder la paix, pour terminer les querelles, pour destruire les larrons, les homicides, les ardeurs et autres malfaiteurs."

6072. The way in which you get at the law of arson is, that you find its existence assumed in defining the jurisdiction of the Bailly?—Yes.

6073. With regard to the malicious destruction of goods, what is the mode of dealing with an offence of that sort?—It is malicious injury to property, and goes under the head of brigandage.

6074. Destruction of sea walls, or bridges, or goods belonging to any individual, would all come under the definition of brigandage probably?—Yes.

6075. How are they punishable?—The accusation would run à telle peine, punition, ou amende, que la Cour trouvera condigne.

6076. Not à châtiment corporel?—Not usually. There are cases in which they are indicted à châtiment corporel; but the usual way is to indict à telle peine, punition, ou amende.

6077. In those actes what is the form of accusation? D'avoir commis le fait de brigandage?—D'avoir commis divers brigandages, sçavoir, &c., and then going on specifying each distinct act.

6078. Those cases might be tried summarily, or sent before the Cour Ordinaire, according to the gravity of the offence?—Certainly; that applies to all cases generally.

6079. Mr. Andros. With respect to the destruction of high trees, timber trees, there is a specific law.

6080. The Contrôle. Terrien, Lib. xiv, treats, "Des Eaux et Forests;" the Approbation says, "Pour les Eaux et Estangs contenus au quatorziesme livre il y a ordre posé par les Chefs-Plaids."

6081. How is it with regard to vol? Can it be committed upon a growing plant? For nstance, suppose a person pulled up a young tree and took it away with him, would that be vol?—Yes. There are precedents for that.

6082. The learned Advocates at Jersey differed upon that point.—I think there is no doubt upon that point here.

6083. Suppose you take a chattel away for the purpose of destroying it: where do you draw your line there?—I should think that would be in the nature of a malicious injury to property.

6084. The Bailiff. If you were to take a horse and throw it over a precipice, I think it would be an act of malicious mischief.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

October 10th, 1846.

6085. Would the malicious killing of another person's horse or cow be an act of brigandage also?—I conceive so.

6086. And punished either by the exercise of summary jurisdiction, or be sent before the Cour Royale for peine, punition, ou châtiment corporel?—Exactly so.

6087. The Procureur. In the year 1842, February the 9th, a man was tried for having taken a piece of wood, which answered the purpose of a gate. He took it to a distance, and broke it to pieces; he was tried for brigandage.

6088. (To the Contrôle.) Is the exhibiting of false signals to allure ships in distress an offence?—I conceive it would be treated as an offence. I am not aware of any precedent for it. I should suppose it would be dealt with as a malicious mischief.

6089. There is no particular law which applies to such a case as that?—Not that I am aware of.

6090. Would you charge the particular act which the person had done?—Yes; you would specify the act.

6091. Would it be called an act of brigandage?—I should suppose it would be laid: "Having maliciously exhibited false signals with the intent of destroying certain vessels."

6192. Would it be laid félonieusement?—I conceive, supposing it were done in such a way as to endanger the lives of the persons in the vessel, it would be certainly laid félonieusement.

6093. Would that be so treated in the exercise of the general criminal jurisdiction of the Court?—Yes. There may be some old cases which would guide the Court in their discretion.

6094. Would the same doctrine apply to cutting away buoys?—There is an Ordonnance upon that subject of January, 1846, the 3rd article of which provides for it.

6095. Could that be punished in any other way?—I conceive that would not prevent the Court from authorizing a prosecution. There is an Ordonnance of the year 1840, "Pour les chemins," which provides a fine in the case of windows being broken. In the course of this year, two persons were indicted for having, during the night, thrown stones at the windows of dwelling-houses. Their counsel pleaded that it was provided for by the Ordonnance; but the Court set the objection aside.

6096. And punished the parties under the exercise of their general criminal authority?—Yes.

6097. The same rule, of course, would apply to the case which has been mentioned?—I conceive so.

6098. The crime of Forgery appears to be provided for by Terrien. Lib. xii., chapter xviii. —Yes. There is also a passage which was before the Commissioners the other day, about "L'inscription de faux," Terrien, lib. xii., chapter xxviii, at p. 504:—"L'information faite est rapportée; et si par icelle les faicts contenus esdits moyens semblent prouvez et verifiez, le Notaire et la partie et autres coulpables de la fausseté, sont adjournez à comparoir en personne, ou prins au corps, à la discretion de la Court. Et s'ils comparent, sont enquis, examinez et interroguez. Et s'ils n'alleguent faicts et raisons probables et apparens pour soustenir la pièce veritable, est procédé extraordinairement et, le procez parfait, la fausseté déclarée."

6099. Does not the 18th chapter apply solely to forging contracts, or other instruments, passed before a notary?—It does, strictly so.

6100. What you have just read from the 28th chapter, appears to be the mode of proceeding when any one alleges that an instrument produced in a civil cause is a forgery?—Yes.

6101. And in general terms would extend probably to any instrument?—Yes.

6102. Do indictments for forging a bill of exchange exist?—Yes.

6103. What is the technical form of charging the crime?—D'avoir commis le crime de faux; and the instrument must be always set out.

6104. What is the punishment for Forgery? Is that an offence laid félonieusement?—Yes. There are modern cases in which it has been treated both ways; but it is generally laid félonieusement.

6105. Is there any distinction as to forging a deed or will?—No.

6106. You would allege still that the party had "Commis le crime de faux, sçavoir, &c."—Yes.

6107. The passage of Terrien, to which you have referred, does not enter into the punishment, does it?—No.

6108. The Ordonnance of Francis I., in the 18th chapter of Terrien, makes the punishment for making false contracts and deeds, capital. The Approbation says, "Les forgeurs et faiseurs de faux contracts, les faux tesmoins et les suborneurs sont punis à la discretion de Justice de mesme selon l'exigence du fait?"—Yes.

6109. Does the crime de faux extend to the false making of every instrument? Or must it be the forging of some instrument which, upon the face of it, is a commercial instrument, or a will, deed, or contract, or other instrument, which the party, affected by the crime, has some pecuniary interest in?—I conceive it must.

6110. A receipt for money would, of course, be included?—Yes; I conceive there must be some pecuniary interest involved in it.

6111. Must it always be the having forged with an intention to defraud a person?—Yes.

6112. Is the uttering a forged bill of exchange or note, knowing it to be forged, a specific crime?—Yes. And the practice is, unless there is some positive evidence of the forgery having been committed by the person charged, to indict for having forged, or for having uttered the instrument knowing it to be forged.

6113. Your answer would involve that both of those charges would be félonieusement?—Yes.

6114. The uttering would be supposed to be implied in the law of forgery, or else punishable in the exercise of the general criminal jurisdiction of the Court?—Yes.

6115. The French law takes a distinction between two sorts of forgery: one, the absolute fabrication of an instrument; and the other, the alteration of a valid instrument for the purposes of fraud. Is any such distinction taken here?—No.

6116. The alteration of a five-pound note into a fifty would be a forgery as much as the fabrication of a fifty-pound note?—Yes. The very last case of forgery which was tried was for altering the amount.

6117. The punishment of the pillory was inflicted for forgery, was not it?—Yes.

6118. That punishment now is almost obsolete, is not it?—Entirely so. It has not been inflicted for the last twenty five or thirty years. A person was put in the cage as late as 1841.

6119. What is that punishment?—Putting the prisoner in a cage in the market-place on Saturday.

6120. The law used to be, when the punishment of the pillory was inflicted in England, that people might throw filth and dirt at the person exposed, provided it was nothing that could inflict an absolute wound. We take for granted that the exposure in the cage did not include anything of that kind?—Not always; it did sometimes. In the case I have referred to there was imprisonment also.

6121. Is the punishment of exposure in the cage applicable to other crimes besides forgery?—Yes; for domestic robbery.

6122. Mr. De Courcy. I heard it threatened by the Bench, to a person of the name of Kennedy, for breaking windows, if it occurred again. In the case of Farrell, who forged Mr. Mansell's name for fifty pounds, the punishment inflicted upon him was banishment.

6123. The Contrôle. Farrell was indicted au Grand Criminel. He was condemned to two months' imprisonment, one month of which was on bread and water, and six years' banishment. The punishment of banishment was severe in that case, because he had a wife and several children. He possessed property in the Island, and had been resident here a considerable time.

6124. Have you any specific punishment for the offence of Personation?—No.

6125. You would treat it as a common fraud probably?—Yes.

6126. What is the technical mode of charging Murder?—There is a special form, which is made use of in that Indictment, "étant dépourvu de la crainte de Dieu," and then it goes on "tué, occis, et meurtri."

6127. In this Island, what is the definition of murder?—The English authorities are cited in cases of that kind.

6128. That would be killing with malice aforethought?—Yes; we should follow precisely the English doctrine. There is a special Order in Council for those cases.

6129. In the old Norman law, every violent killing of a man was murder?—Yes. There are three Orders in Council, of the dates of March 25th, 1697, June 23rd, 1698, and November the 30th, 1699, which authorize the Court, on an Indictment for murder, to give a verdict of homicide, and to condemn to a lesser punishment than death.

The same were delivered in, and are as follows.

6130. "Order in Council, registered 5th May, 1697; Order produced, dated 25th March, 1697.

"His Majesty in Council taking notice that, in the application forHis Majesty's pardon by petition from persons convicted upon trials in the Royal Court of Guernsey for murder, manslaughter, or chance medley, the methods prescribed by His Majesty's Order in Council of 13th of March, 1689, had not been duly observed: It is this day ordered by His Majesty in Council, as it is hereby ordered, that upon trials of persons in the Royal Court of Guernsey for murder, manslaughter, or chance medley, where by good evidence it shall appear that there was no premeditated malice, and that the offender is a fit object of His Majesty's mercy, the Judge of the said Court do thereupon forbear to give judgment and suspend all further proceedings against such offender, until, upon certifying to this Board a true state of the case, with all the circumstances of the fact as they shall appear upon oath, His Majesty's pleasure shall be signified concerning the said offender, whereof the Bailiff and Jurat of the Island of Guernsey, and all others, whom it may concern, are to take notice, and to cause this Order to be registered in the Royal Court of the Island.

(Signed) Wm. Blathwayt."

6131. "Order in Council, registered 10 Dec. 1698, produced; dated 23rd June, 1698.

"His Majesty was this day pleased in Council, for the better explanation of the Order of this Board of the 25th March, 1697, concerning trials of murder, manslaughter or chance medley in the Royal Court of the Island of Guernsey, to declare and order that all persons, accused of any of the crimes above mentioned shall be forthwith according to law tried and have sentence passed upon them; but the execution thereof should be respited, if it should appear upon the trial that there was no premeditated malice, or that the offender is a fit object of His Majesty's mercy, until His Majesty's pleasure should be known thereupon; to which end the Royal Court of this Island is to certify to this Board the true state of every such case, with all the circumstances of the fact, as the same shall be made appear upon oath at the trial. And hereof the Bailiff and Jurats of the said Island of Guernsey, and all others whom it may concern, are to take notice, and to cause this Order to be registered in the Royal Court of the said Island.

(Signed) John Nicholas."

6132. At the Court at Kensington, the 30th day of Nov., 1699.

Present, The King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council.

"Whereas His Majesty did, by His Order in Council of the 23rd of June, 1698, direct that all persons accused in the Royal Court of Guernsey of murder, manslaughter or chance medley should be forthwith" according to law tried and have sentence passed upon them, but the execution thereof should be respited, if it should appear upon the trial that there was no premeditated malice, or that the offender is a fit object of His Majesty's mercy, which was granted upon a representation formerly made to His Majesty, that by the Law of that Island the punishment was capital in all cases where any person was found guilty of the death of a man, and that there was no distinction of punishment, in cases of murder, manslaughter or chance medley; and His Majesty having been since informed that there was some mistake in the representation of that matter, and that, according to the law and ancient usage of that Island, the Bailiff and Jurats, upon the trial of any person accused for the death of another, unless they find the offence to be murder, do not proceed to inflict capital punishment for the same, but do inflict lesser punishments, according to the nature and circumstances of the offence: His Majesty hath therefore thought fit in Council to order, that the said Order of the 23rd of June, 1698, for stay of execution in cases of murder, manslaughter and chance medley, until His Majesty's pleasure should be known, shall be restrained to cases of murder, and other cases where capital punishment is inflicted, where the said Court shall think the offender a fit object of His Majesty's mercy, and no other; to which end the Royal Court of the said Island is in such cases only to certify to this Board the true state of every such case with all the circumstances of the fact, as the same shall be made appear upon oath at the tryall. And hereof the Bailiffs and Jurats of the Island of Guernsey, and all others whom it may concern, are to take notice, and to cause this Order to be registered in the Royal Court of that Island."

6133. Are they counterparts of the Jersey orders?—I believe they are.

6134. With respect to Attempts to murder: how are they laid?—They would be indicted as attempts. And I conceive the same rule would apply that I mentioned with regard to vol avec effraction.

6135. That you must particularize the Attempt?—Yes.

6136. It would be an assault with intent to murder?—Yes; and, of course, in that case, if there were any doubt upon the evidence, the Crown officers would indict for an attempt to commit grievous bodily harm.

6137. Mr. Falla told us that he considered the French law to prevail on that point?—I do not go quite so far as Mr. Falla, in what he said upon that point.

6138. Do you consider Mr. Falla to have overstated the extent to which the French law prevails here, as opposed to the English?—Yes.

6139. (To Mr. Carré) What do you say on that subject?—I do not conceive that Mr. Falla meant to say that a crime would be punished according to the rules of the French law; but that it would be considered a crime of the same nature.

6140. He was understood to mean that, when you refer for illustration to the law of another country, he thought you would consider a French illustration better than an English one?—I agree with him in that.

6141. The Contrôle. But not the modern French law; that is the difference. The Criminal Ordonnances certainly, but not the modern French law.

6142. The Bailiff. I apprehend, when Mr. Falla talked of the French law, he meant the old French law.

6143. Mr. Falla. I meant the old French law, in what I said.

6144. (To the Contrôle.) In the case of an Assault with intent, is the particular intent, as to cut, wound, or to do grievous bodily harm, specified?—Yes.

6145. What is the punishment for that offence? For instance, for an attempt to murder or to maim?—It would depend upon the particular circumstances of the case.

6146. Would it be alleged félonieusement?—An attempt to commit murder would always be laid félonieusement.

6147. Though no wound were actually inflicted?—Yes.

6148. Suppose you fired at a person and missed him?—I conceive that would be indicted félonieusement. Indictments for attempts to commit grievous bodily harm would more usually run "à telle peine, punition, ou châtiment corporel." In a very serious case, I conceive, the Court would indict félonieusement.

6149. In the case of an attempt to commit a rape, how would it be?—That would be usually also laid "à châtiment corporel." In a case where there were peculiar circumstances of aggravation the Court would indict félonieusement.

6150. The case of an intent to wound a peace officer: is there anything peculiar in that?—No; except that it is considered as an aggravation of the offence, and is more severely visited.

6151. What was the precise form of the charge against Mr. Gallienne on a late occasion?—He was indicted "à telle peine, punition, ou châtiment corporel."

6152. When did that case occur?—In February, 1843.

6153. He wounded some one with a knife, did not he?—

6154. Mr. Andros. Yes; he struck with a penknife, and inflicted two wounds, one on the left arm, and the other on the right shoulder. Then there was a second count for having, after he had given the wounds, gone in search of the person whom he struck, saying, he would kill him if he found him. He was told that the person he had struck had gone another way, to divert him; and he ran after him. The Court found him Guilty generally. They made no distinction in the finding.

6155. (To Mr. Andros.) Is not a case of actual stabbing ordinarily laid "félonieusement?"—That was not considered such a case.

6156. The Contrôle. It would be ordinarily laid félonieusement. It depends upon the particular circumstances.

6157. Do you recollect what were the circumstances which took that case out of the ordinary rule?

6158. Mr. Andros. He went into a room where there were two gentlemen Mr. Corbet and another, and three or four women, and made those stabs with the knife, one upon the shoulder and the other upon the arm. They had been drinking together. The house was a sort of house of ill fame.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq. Contrôle de la Reine.

October 10th, 1846.

6159. Mr. De Havilland. He drew his knife under the arm; and Mr. Corbet declared upon his oath that he was quite sure the first wound, on the shoulder, was an accident; and he believed the second also to be unintentional. They had dined, and had been drinking together. They were at this house of ill fame; and he picked a quarrel with him. Mr. Corbet declined having anything to do with the prosecution. The Law Officers, before the Court, stated that there could be no prosecution. The Court insisted, as there had been much scandal about it, that the Law Officers should prosecute; and the case was brought forward accordingly.

6160. The Procureur. Originally, Mr. Corbet refused to prosecute in any way. And it was proved, I think, if I recollect the circumstances right, that they had been dining together: that, after a while, they went to this house; that there they gave a quantity of what they call sherry punch to this Mr. Gallienne; which was made with sherry wine and the usual quantity of brandy. And, after he was exceedingly drunk, they played at cards; and he supposed that they were taking money from him in an improper way. At the time of the conversation, to which Colonel De Havilland has referred, neither the Constable nor any other person had mentioned it to the Crown Lawyers. On the trial other things came out. And, if I recollect right, the Court condemned him to two months' imprisonment: but the conclusions of the Crown Officers were for three months' imprisonment, or four.

6161. Mr. De Havilland. This had gone abroad. It had been talked of; and the Crown Officers were asked, whether they intended to prosecute; and they said No.

6162. (To Colonel De Havilland.) Do you recollect what were the particular circumstances of mitigation in that case?—The person wounded had declared that one wound, he was quite sure, was in the scuffle in falling down; and that, as to the other, he did not believe that the prisoner had any intention to hurt him; that he was in a state of great inebriation and excitement.

6163. The Procureur. There is another circumstance, which was that there was a young person with Mr. Gallienne. He was drunk; and this person was then supposed, and is now known, to be his wife. It was not known then.

6164. Mr. De Havilland. That person was then playing at cards with Mr. Corbet; that led to some dispute between them. It was more an affray than anything else.

6165. (To Colonel De Havilland.) Did it come out au secret, before the acte d'accusation was framed, that there had been this attempt to pursue Mr. Corbet after the wound had been given?—Yes.

6166. Mr. Gallienne had no connection on the Bench, had he?—None whatever; neither by alliance or otherwise.

6167. He was an Advocate, was not he, at that time?—Yes.

6168. This was a case, the Commissioners understand, which had escaped the vigilance of the Police; and had indirectly come to the knowledge of the Court?—Yes; it was a case that was much talked of abroad.

6169. It had not come to the knowledge of the Court through the Constables?—No; the Procureur stated that he had no knowledge of it brought to him.

6170. Do you know how it happened that the Constables did not bring it forward?—No, do not: I believe it was that Mr. Corbet, when he was spoken to, wished to avoid any complaint whatever.

6171. Supposing a breach of the peace is committed, and the party injured wishes not to bring it forward, is it considered within the discretion of the Constable to abstain? Take the case of theft, for instance.

6172. I should think not.

6173. The Contrôle. Certainly not.

6174. (To Mr. De Havilland.) In this case the Court thought that the Constable had acted very improperly; did not they?—I do not recollect that it was particularly mentioned.

6175. It was not a case which the Constable had been ignorant of; was it?—No.

6176. Mr. Le Retilley. It was thought a trifling assault, at the commencement. But the accident was found much more serious on the following day; in fact Mr. Corbet's life was in danger. That created a great sensation in the public mind; and the Court ordered it to be brought forward.

6177. When was the prosecution ordered?—I think the second or third day; I am not positive.

6178. Mr. H. Dobrée (Jurat). I believe, Mr. Gallienne was constitué prisonnier almost immediately, provisoirement, till the result of the wound was finally known. When Mr. Corbet was sufficiently recovered (which took perhaps a week or so) to come before the Court and give his evidence in the presence of the Court and the Crown Officers, he did there what he had already done to the Constables, he exerted himself in every possible manner to avoid the prosecution being gone into. He stated to the Court, in the strongest terms, that he and Mr. Gallienne were intimate friends; that he was convinced that he could have had no intention of doing him any harm; that the wound was received in consequence of a fall; that Mr. Gallienne was exceedingly intoxicated at the time; that he was under a more violent state of excitement than drunken men generally are; and his conviction was that he meant to do him no possible harm. He used every possible influence, and said he would leave the Island to avoid giving evidence. But the case had become so public that the Court determined to bring the matter to trial.

6179. Was that the only case against this gentleman?—The Contrôle. At that time. He has been since brought before the Police Court once. It was supposed to be a case of stabbing: but the Court were satisfied it did not amount to that; and he was condemned to a slight imprisonment.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

October 10th, 1846.

6180. The Bailiff. He was intoxicated; and one of the men with whom he came in contact thought he made a blow at him with a knife; but it was proved affirmatively that he had no knife.

6181. The Contrôle. In consequence, the Acte does not mention anything about the knife at all.

6182. What was the sentence upon Gallienne?—The first sentence was two months' imprisonment; the sentence in this second case was a week's imprisonment.

6183. Mr. Andros. A representation was made in that case by General Napier to Sir James Graham; and Sir James Graham wrote a letter, desiring the Court here to suspend Mr. Gallienne from being an Advocate. The offence mentioned in the letter was for stabbing and wounding. The Court had always intended to suspend Mr. Gallienne; and, upon the receipt of this letter, they immediately did so. General Napier made a subsequent representation to Sir James Graham; and in the letter of Mr. Manners Sutton, intimating that Sir James Graham did not think a suspension of one year sufficient, the offence is characterised as "stabbing and wounding with intent to kill." In a Militia Order issued afterwards by General Napier, he dismissed Mr. Gallienne for stabbing and wounding his companion with a knife.

6184. The Procureur. The man, I should state, committed the offence on the 1st of January; and he was committed on the 4th.*

---

* The following communication was received from Col. De Havilland, one of the Jurats of the Royal Court, after the Commissioners had left Guernsey. As it contains a more detailed statement of Mr. Gallienne's case, it has been thought advisable to insert it here.

James Gallienne's Case.

On the last day of 1842, James Gallienne, an advocate, dined with a friend, Mr. Corbet, an English gentleman, a ten days' acquaintance, with a third gentleman. They separated at nine o'clock, having drunk but little wine; and promised to meet again in the evening, at a house where four or five young girls lived, of Galliene's acquaintance; to one of whom he was attached, named Rose (to whom he has been since married). This house was not a public brothel, but visited by some young men. Gallienne did not arrive till midnight, having gone elsewhere after leaving Mr. Corbet; and he was not sober when he arrived. Mr. Corbet and the other gentlemen had come there before him.

A report of Mr. Corbet having been wounded reached the Court; and, on inquiry of the Crown lawyers, it appeared that they had considered the case as one of "Adjonction" for damages, but that Mr. Corbet had positively refused to prosecute. On which the Court ordered the case to be brought before them, on an "Accusation," which was accordingly laid against him, containing two "Chefs," as follows.

"Cour Royale, 4 Février, 1843."

1° "Monsr. James Gallienne ayant comparu ce jour, et étant accusé d'avoir, dans la matinée du premier Janvier dernier ou environ, dans une maison située proche la Conture, en la paroisse de St. Pierre Port, appartenant au Sieur Pirie, méchamment et de propos prémédité porté deux coups violens avec un ou des instrumens tranchans, un au bras gauche et l'autre à l'épaule droite d'Uvedale Corbet, Ecuyer, lesquels coups ont causé des blessures graves au dit Monsr. Corbet; au grand danger de la vie du dit Monsr. Corbet;"

2° "Et d'avoir, de plus, le dit Monsr. Gallienne, armé d'un ou des instrumens tranchans, dans la matinée du dit jour 1° Janvier dernier, après les dites blessures données par lui au dit Monsr. Corbet, et après que le dit Monsr. Corbet eut quitté la dite maison du dit Pirie, poursuivi et cherché le dit Monsr. Corbet en divers endroits et jusque dans une maison, occupée par le sieur Thomas Webber comme cabaret, et connue sous l'enseigne du "Jolly Sportsman," et située aux Camps Collette Nicolle, en la dite paroisse de St. Pierre Port; et ce, dans l'intention de tuer et occire le dit Monsr. Corbet."

Interrogation.—Gallienne pleaded Not Guilty, and, on his Interrogatoire, declared that Mr. Corbet was his friend, whom he would at any time protect rather than molest or hurt in any way, if he had been in his right senses. He acknowledged the knife shewn to be his, but that he had no recollection whatever of having then had it in his hand or any other. That there had been neither "propos délibéré or méchanceté," of which Mr. Corbet himself must be convinced. He had never quarrelled with Mr. Corbet before.

Mr. Corbet.—They had been intimate about ten days; Gallienne had dined with him at his house, that day, with a third person, and had left at nine o'clock; had drunk very little. They had agreed to meet again at the house in question; he, Gallienne, had gone accordingly; but not before midnight. He was even then much excited, and began quarrelling with the girl Rose. Corbet and the other person had been there some time before and playing cards, low stakes, at loo; and seeing Gallienne in that state, Corbet tried to appease him. On some frivolous pretence Gallienne then tried to quarrel with him. Again, Corbet appeased him. But Gallienne suddenly left the room, and in a short time returned, and incoherently began to abuse Corbet, which he bore awhile. He, Corbet, told him he was drunk, and, if he continued, he would have to repent it. Gallienne continued, however; grew more excited and incoherent; at one time would insist that he owed him 1*l.* (they had played cards), while it was he, Corbet, that owed him 15*s*. This behaviour continued a long time. He found fault with the girls and with everything that was passing. He challenged Corbet to box with him; at the next moment cried like a child, because the other gentleman had called him a "naughty boy;" then menaced him. He then left, as if to retire to bed (he lived in the house), but presently returned, with a handful of mud to throw at Corbet's face; again Corbet pacified him. Gallienne continued, however, to insult him; when he, Corbet, told him he would hold him responsible for his conduct, to which Gallienne replied he was quite ready to answer. He then became more violent still, and required being held for some time. Presently he took a candle and went to his room, and called to Rose for his razors. On which, Corbet told the other gentlemen they must be on the watch, lest he should do himself a mischief; but suddenly Gallienne appeared again and advanced on them precipitately. Rose then stood between him and Corbet, and, seeing him so furious, screamed and ran to Mr. Corbet for protection, thinking he was after her. Corbet, naturally raising his arm to protect her, received a violent blow on it; a sort of scuffle ensued; and they reeled together over the other gentleman's chair. Corbet then left the house, and, going out, told the gentleman he was stabbed and must go to a surgeon. One of the girls accompanied him, and bound his arm on the way. Corbet further declared that he had not seen any weapon in Gallienne's hand when he struck him; that he had not perceived the wound on the shoulder till he was at the surgeon's; he considered it as quite accidental, when they fell together over the chair. That during the evening they had been drinking sherry, punch, and brandy and water, and that it had appeared, when Gallienne went to his room, that he had emptied a phial of laudanum, which, if he drank it, must have increased his phrenzy. He considered both wounds accidental, especially the one on his shoulder. He was satisfied that when he went up stairs it was not to fetch a knife. There was fresh excitement from the laudanum; when he came towards him he used no threat. Rose, running to him might, in his state, have raised a momentary feeling of jealousy; but firmly believes that, when he entered the room with the knife, it was not his intention to do bodily harm to any one.

6185. Have you the crime of Mayhem now?—I do not recollect a single precedent. I suppose it would be considered to exist.

6186. In Terrien Mayhem appears to have been a wounding, so as to cause the loss of a member.—It would now be considered as coming within the term "blessé."

6187. There is an old offence called "Assault de Charue." Is that an existing offence?—It is no longer a specific offence.

6188. It appears to have been a wound upon the person while at plough?—Yes; which was an aggravation of the assault.

6189. It is no longer an existing offence?—No; nor do I consider that it would be considered as an aggravating circumstance.

6190. The Bailiff. Mayhem, I consider, would be exactly in the same position here as it was in England when Blackstone's Commentaries were written.

6191. (To the Contrôle.) Is there any distinction with respect to people who kill themselves under an accusation of crime? Under the old law their goods were forfeited?—That would depend upon the verdict of the Coroner's Inquest. Unless that specified that the person was insane at the time, it would lead to forfeiture.

6192. Therefore being accused of a crime would make no difference?—I think not. It might be evidence of sanity perhaps.

6193. With regard to what we call in England False Imprisonment; would that be indictable?—Yes.

6194. What would it be called?—Here is a modern case, not exactly of False Imprisonment, but of illegally detaining a person. It was on the 18th of July in this year. It was a case of ill treatment against James Robert. The first count was, "pour avoir, sur le chemin public depuis Havilland à l'Arcade Commerciale, en la paroisse de St. Pierre Port, 1° assailli, maltraité et jetté par terre Eliza Gehagan, fille mineure d'Edouard Gehagan, dont s'est ensuivie contusion, meurtrissure et effusion de sang; 2° pour avoir illégalement et sans droit saisi la dite mineure au bras droit, l'avoir détenue prisonnière, et l'avoir conduite par force et violence depuis le dit chemin proche Havilland jusqu'à l'Arcade Commerciale en la dite paroisse, ou le dit Robert livra la personne de la dite mineure entre les mains de Messrs. J. F. Draper et R. Webb, deux des assistants du Connétable de la dite paroisse, en l'accusant faussement de lui avoir volé une épinglette ou partie d'une épinglette en or."

6195. What was the form of the mise en accusation in that case?—"A se voir adjuger à telle peine punition ou châtiment corporel." There was a special finding in that case.

Corbet's evidence was corroborated and confirmed by other witnesses; but the gentleman alluded to had left the Island immediately, and could not be had for a witness.

The Court were satisfied that in this first charge no "propos délibéré" or "méchanceté" had been proved. As to the second "Chef," it was proved that Gallienne, on finding Corbet was gone, followed (but took a different direction), having still the knife in his hand, declaring that he would kill him; when he reached the public house, not finding him there, he desisted.

On which, and having pursued on the Queen's highway, and for his riotous and violent conduct in the house, the Court unanimously sentenced him to two months' imprisonment in the public jail and costs. The Crown lawyers had concluded to three months' imprisonment.

It should be observed that the delay which occurred in bringing Gallienne to trial was owing to the wound in Corbet's arm not having healed immediately and the surgeon refusing to declare his life out of danger. Gallienne was twenty-four years of age, and was a Lieutenant of Militia.

The Lieutenant Governor was present at the whole of the trial, and made no remark then. But, on the 9th of the same month, he issued a Militia Order, dismissing Gallienne from his commission, in as degrading a manner as could well be, for having been capable of using a knife against an unarmed person.

Subsequently, the Lieutenant Governor sent to the Court an extract of a letter from Mr. Manners Sutton, dated 12th February, to the effect that the Home Secretary was also of opinion that Gallienne, having been found guilty of stabbing and wounding, was no longer a fit person for the Bar of the Royal Court, and that he wished the Court's attention to be drawn to the subject.

The Court answered that they had intended, at the expiration of his imprisonment, to take that point into consideration, but would now go into it: and then emanated an Acte of 24th February, by which Mr. Gallienne was suspended a year and a day from the Bar of the Court, to date from the day of his enlargement from prison: and, at the expiration of this time of suspension, he should be at liberty, by means of a "Requête Civile," to petition the Court for readmission, on which the Court would then decide "ainsi que de raison." A copy of this Acte was sent to the Lieutenant Governor.

The Lieutenant Governor, however, did not yet appear to have been satisfied; for another letter from the Home Office, dated 9th March, in reply to his further representation was received, of which he sent an extract to the Court, stating that the Home Secretary still adhered to his former opinion, and desired that the importance of the case should be brought to the notice of the Court, as it might attach, and justly too, to their decision, and to the public evil which might result from it; and that he did not consider the limited suspension sufficiently marked the Court's sentiments on the nature of the crime, which might tend to lower the character of the Court in the eyes of the public. The Court, however, in reply, declared their adhesion to their acte of suspension for a year and a day, leaving the further consideration of the case, when Mr. Gallienne should or might apply to be reinstated, at the expiration of a year and a day. Mr. Gallienne, however, has not hitherto made any application to be reinstated; but, on the contrary, has since been imprisoned, for eight days, for irregular conduct in acts of "brigandage" on the Queen's highway.

It was evident, from these extracts of letters from the Home Office sent to the Court, that the Lieutenant Governor had not fairly represented the case to the Home Secretary; for, as he was present during the whole of the trial, he heard each Jurat express his sentiments openly in giving his vote, and could not but gather therefrom that they all exonerated the prisoner of "propos délibéré et méchanceté," although it was not so expressed in the sentence, which was in these words:—

"Ouies les conclusions des officiers de la Reine, est le dit Gallienne condamné à deux mois d'emprisonnement dans la prison publique et aux frais, après avoir entendu les témoins des officiers de la Reine." Guernsey, 17th Octobre, 1846.—T. F. De Havilland.

P.S. The Court's answer was dated the 15th March, 1843, and was to the following effect. That, however painful it was to the Court to appear to differ from the Secretary of State, Sir James Graham, the Court's decision had not been arrived at without the most careful and mature consideration of all the circumstances of the case; and that their opinion continued unaltered; but that, even if it were otherwise, the Court's acte had been registered on the public records of the Island and notified to Mr Gallienne, and was considered final by the Court.—T. F. De Havilland.

October 10th, 1846.

6196. With regard to a Common Battery; is not that provided for by Terrien?—Yes; the exceptions mentioned at page 497 of Terrien, lib. xii. c. xxvi., do not exist as matter of law, and would not be strictly followed now.

6197. The Bailiff. Moderate correction would be allowed in the case of relations.

6198. Is Rape punishable capitally?—I conceive it is. Within this century persons have been hung for rape here.

6199. In the case of Murder; could you give any other sentence than death?—No; I should think not.

6200. In Rape could you give any other sentence than death?—I think you might.

6201. In the Coustumier, the offence appears to be an outrage upon a virgin; is that distinction made now?—No.

6202. Nor the exception mentioned in Terrien, when the offence has been committed on a woman of bad fame?—No.

6203. Is the offence in law the carnally knowing a woman against her will?—Yes. We should follow exactly the same principle as the English law.

6204. In the case of those offences being committed with children is any distinction made?—It would be an aggravating circumstance laid in the indictment.

6205. Is there any age at which a child is held incapable of giving her consent to the crime?—That would be under the age of puberty, I suppose.

6206. Suppose the offence to be committed upon a child above ten, and under twelve: would she be held capable of consenting to it, so as not to make it a crime?—I do not think there is any strictly legal distinction.

6207. The Bailiff. We have had that before us in consideration; and it appeared to be the feeling to follow the principle of the English law that a child below a certain age could not give consent.

6208. You would probably take the age as a matter of evidence of want of consent?—Yes.

6209. The Procureur. That was tried in the case of a man of the name of William Laurens. The child consented; but they punished the man nevertheless.

6210. What was the age of the child?—From ten to eleven years old. He was condemned to two months' imprisonment. In that case the girl in question belonged to a family whose sisters were not very well behaved; and there is no doubt but that the child was consenting.

The Act was read as follows.

6211. Samedi, le vingt septième Juin, 1818, devant Messire Pierre de Havilland, Chevalier, Bailli, &c.

Sur l'action des Officiers du Roi contre William Laurens, fils Nicolas, de la paroisse de Torteval, prisonnier dans la prison publique, à soutenir leur preuve en la cause qu'ils ont contre lui à se voir adjuger aux peines et punitions imposées par les loix pour avoir, le dit Laurens, Vendredi, le 8e Mai, 1818, ou environ, dans un appartement occupé par le dit Laurens proche la Tour Beauregard, en la ville et paroisse de St. Pierre Port, avec force et violence jetté Marie Pritchard, fille de feu Jacob Pritchard, âgée de dix à onze ans ou environ, sur son lit, et là avoir félonieusement commis ou attenté de commettre le crime de rapt et de viol sur la personne de la dite Marie Pritchard, et leur payer leur dépens. Après que, par acte du 16e Mai, 1818, le dit Laurens à fait niance d'avoir commis le dit crime et a fait choix de l'Avocat De Jersey, pour son conseil: est le dit Laurens condamné à deux mois d'emprisonnement dans la prison publique, dont le premier mois sera au secret au pain et à l'eau; et aux fraix.

6212. Is Abduction a crime here?—I know no precedent for it. The law in Terrien with regard to it, Lib. xii. c. xiv. p. 484, would not be strictly followed.

6213. You would treat it as a general act of violence?—Yes; I presume the Court would do so.

6214. Is there any difference between "rapt" and "viol"?—It comes to the same; but in the former case you must have taken the person and carried her off.

6215. There might be rapt without viol?—Yes.

6216. Have you any Order in Council relating to Unnatural Offences?—No; the Jersey Order in Council does not extend to this Island.

6217. Are they punished félonieusement?—Yes; they are punished capitally: but it is right to add, that the Court are very unwilling to investigate such a case, and rather conceive that the investigation does more harm than the punishment would do good.

6218. It is understood, is not it, that you may try Treason here, but not punish it?—There is some doubt whether the Court have authority to find Guilty or not. There is some doubt upon the interpretation of the Constitutions of King John and the Précepte d'Assise upon that subject. There is also a reference to it in the Remarques of Le Marchant on the Approbation des Loix, in reference to Terrien, Lib. xii. chap. xvii.: and in the Regulations of the Commissioners of 1607 there is something bearing upon it. I conceive it pretty clear that the Court may try.

The passage from Le Marchant was read as follows.

6219. Chapitre Dix-huictiesme (17 de Ter.)

Approbation.

Nous en usons entièrement; et suivant le Précepte d'Assise la cognoissance en appartient au Baillif et Jurez, et la punition et Jugement réservé à Sa Majesté.

Remarque 1. Par le Précepte d'Assise, tant la cognoissance que le jugement du crime de fausse monnoye, et des deux autres y déclarés, appartient au Baillif et Jurez (qui en ce devroyent estre assesseurs des Juges d'Assise); et la punition seule en est réservée à Sa Majesté. Car la punition et jugement d'un crime sont choses bien differentes, et doibt le jugement précéder la punition; combien que les Approbateurs qui estoyent presque tous gens de Cour semblent les confondre, ou du moins mettre hors d'ordre. Et sont tous faux monoyeurs, rogneurs de monoye et leurs complices, receleurs, et participants, punissables de mesme peine, qui est de mort ou dernier supplice.

6220. Where should you now look for your definition of Treason?—I suppose we should take English authorities.

6221. The English authorities are statutable authorities?—We should take those.

6222. The Bailiff. We should take the statute of Edward the Third, I think; not that of Henry the Eighth nor George the Third.

6223. The Contrôle. In the last case of Coining, the Court found the persons Guilty; and the case was remitted to the Crown for the punishment.

6224. The Bailiff. I think, that arose from a case of murder, in which the Court could come to no conclusion upon the fact. It turned partly, I believe, upon the admissibility of evidence, or something of that kind. They sent up a special case to the Privy Council to know what they were to do; and the Privy Council sent back word to the Court that it was their duty to decide; and that, if they decided wrong, the party might have an appeal. In that case it was said the Privy Council has no authority to decide upon facts presented to them. And, I rather apprehend that since then, the principle has been applied to the three cases enumerated in the Précepte d'Assise, and referred to by Le Marchant in his Remarks on the Approbation of the 17th chapter of the XII Book of Terrien. In point of fact, in the recent cases the Court have come to a decision upon the facts.

6225. (To the Contrôle). What should you say as to Uttering money, knowing it to be counterfeit?—That could be taken cognizance of by the Court here without remitting it. There are precedents "pour avoir blanchi des liards." We state the particular facts in the charge, and leave the punishment of it to the ordinary jurisdiction of the Court.

6226. Are there many cases of that kind?—Very few; I do not think there has been one since I have been at the Bar.

6227. In the case of turning a coin of a smaller denomination into a larger one; should you punish it by the common law?—Yes. With regard to coining, I consider, the limitation in the Précepte d'Assise would only apply to the coin of the realm, and that counterfeiting a foreign coin would be tried and punished here, though the words "fausse monnaie," in Terrien, are pretty general.

6228. What do you mean by coin of the realm?—Coin of the English realm.

6229. Should you consider Jersey coin the coin of the realm?—No coin is issued in Guernsey or Jersey. The copper coins which are current there are merely tokens.

6230. The following proceedings were delivered in and read.

Le 7e jour de Février, 1699, devant Monsieur le Lieut. Bailli; présents Messieurs Wm. Le Marchant, sen., etc., Jurés. Après lecture de l'ordre suivant il a été ordonné qu'il sera enregistré.

At the Court of Kensington, the 21st December, 1699. Present the King's Most Excellent Majesty, in Council.

Upon reading this day, at the Board, several depositions and proceedings before the Royal Court of Guernsey, relating to the coining and uttering of several false half crowns by John Richards, William Cockley and John Campbell, soldiers of the Royal Regiment of Fusiliers, in garrison there; and the said Court, upon the whole matter, being of opinion that the said persons are duly convicted of the crime of coining and uttering false money, and of transgressing the laws as aforesaid; and having humbly represented that, by several laws and charters granted to them by Her Majesty's royal predecessors Kings and Queens of this Realm, the judgment and punishment of this crime is reserved to His Majesty, and praying His Majesty's royal determination thereon; and whereas it appears, by the depositions and proceedings aforesaid, that John Richards was the pesron who coined, and that John Campbell and William Cockley were the utterers of the said false money, His Majesty in Council is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that John Richards be punished with death for the crime aforesaid; and that John Campbell and William Cockley have His Majesty's gracious pardon, and be discharged from their imprisonment. And hereof the Bailiff and Jurats of Guernsey are to take notice, and govern themselves accordingly."

Ensuite de la lecture de la susditte ordre, le susdit Jean Richards a declaré que son véritable nom est Denis Darcy, et a confessé qu'il est coupable du crime de faux monoyeur. Apprès quoy la cour a prononcé la sentence suyvante contre luy.

"Denis Darcy, alias Jean Richards, ayant ce jourd'huy comparu devant la cour à la suite des officiers du Roy pour recevoir sentence de mort, conformément à l'ordre de sa Majesté en conseil cy-dessus écrit, pour avoir été convaincu et atteint d'avoir fabriqué et fait passer en cette Isle des pièces de demi-écu de France fausses, faites d'étain, est condamné, ensuite des conclusions des dits officiers, à estre presentement mis entre les mains de l'exécuteur de Justice, mené par luy au lieu du supplice, la harte au cou, là pendu et étranglé jusques à ce que la mort ensuive, et tous ses meubles et héritages sont acquis et confisqués à Sa Majesté."

6231. Have you any law with respect to cases of Sedition, Blasphemy and Libel?—They are punished by the common law.

6232. Do you ever lay them félonieusement?—I suppose not.

6233. In the case of Seditious Writing should you do so?—I think a case might occur in which seditious writing might be laid félonieusement.

6234. The Bailiff. I think not, short of Treason.

6235. As to Slander, what is your practice?—Slander is always dealt with by a cause en adjonction. The criminal court could not take cognizance of Slander. It would be considered in the light of a querelle personnelle.

6236. Have you any distinct law with respect to Unlawful Oaths?—No.

GUERNSEY.

John De Havilland Utermarck, Esq., Contrôle de la Reine.

October 10th, 1846.

6237. Breach of prison is mentioned as a crime, in Terrien, is it not?—Yes; lib. XII. c. xxxii. p. 514; it would clearly be an indictable offence still.

6238. The passage was read as follows.

"Brisé la prison. Si aucun brise la prison, ou en eschappe, il doit estre adjourné à trois briefs jours, et les tesmoins ouys sur ledit bris de prison, et autres cas dont il est accusé; pareillement s'il est reprins, on lui fait son procez, non seulement sur ledit bris de prison, mais sur les autres cas. Et s'il se rend de luy-mesme à la prison pour se justifier, il luy faut avoir pardon dudit bris de prison, et y en a formulaire au protocole de chancellerie. Qui monstre bien que la peine est corporelle d'avoir violé ce lieu, qui doit estre reputé sainct (ainsi que les murailles et portes d'une ville) comme dedié à l'effect de Justice. Toutes fois il faut avoir regard s'il y a eu force et violence commise, ou si le prisonnier est sorty ayent trouvé la porte ouverte, ou autrement eschappé par la négligence du Geolier; et si le prisonnier estoit justement ou injustement detenu ou vexé de trop longue prison; pour selon les circonstances moderer, ou aggraver la peine, en donnant sentence sur le cas principal, pour lequel le prisonnier estoit detenu. Et encores qu'il en soit trouvé innocent, si est il punissable du bris de prison.

6239. In your practice, would the crime be purged by the man giving himself up again?—No; I think not. And the assisting persons escaping from prison has come under the cognizance of the Court.

6240. Here is on offence in Terrien, lib. XII., c. xxvii., p. 498, called Ledenge?—Yes. It is a species of slander.

6241. He says they are divided into two sorts, Ledenges Criminelles et Simples. Is there any such distinction now known?—I do not consider that any case of ledenge would come under the cognizance of the criminal court at all. I am not aware of any precedents for it.

6242. You do not think that what is stated in the 27th chapter of Terrien is any longer law?—I should think not: there would not be any holding by the nose now.

6243. The Bailiff. In Terrien, the punishment was not felonious, but by fine. La Justice luy doit faire griefvement amender par le châtel.

6244. (To the Contrôle). With respect to Returning from banishment?—Returning from banishment is a specific offence

6245. Of what amount?—It is laid "à telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel."

6246. Never more?—Never more.

6247. Suppose the case of a return from banishment for life?—Returning from a simple banishment for a term of years, I conceive, would always be "à telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel." In cases of banishment for life, the first sentence states that they are not to return on pain of death. And then, no doubt, they would be indicted félonieusement, as in the case of returning from transportation.

6248. The sentence of transportation has not that clause, has it?—No.

6249. Would you indict félonieusement for Returning from transportation?—I presume so. There is no precedent for it.

6250. In the case of returning from banishment for twenty years, should you still confine the charge "à telle peine punition ou châtiment corporel?"—That would rest on the same ground as return from transportation. In all cases, I think, you would indict félonieusement, where the criminal had been banished for longer than "châtiment corporel" authorizes, namely, for seven years or upwards.

6251. In the case of returning from twenty years' banishment, you would inflict a higher punishment than banishment for six years?—Yes; and, therefore, must indict félonieusement.

6252. With respect to Perjury?—In perjury the old practice, in most cases, certainly was, when the perjury was committed by a witness, for the Court to dispose of it summarily, and not by indictment. The man was ordered at once to choose counsel: there was no evidence at all heard; and then he was condemned to punishment.

6253. Now it would be the subject of a formal indictment, would not it?—Certainly. In some cases it would not. I recollect one case of very gross prevarication, in which it was taken in that way during the trial.

6254. Prevarication would be a contempt of Court in any case?—Yes.

6255. Perjury would be something more serious; would not it?—Yes. I fancy the principle was on account of the great difficulty there is in proving perjury; the Court found it more convenient to punish it at once. There has been a prosecution for perjury during this year.

6256. Under what class of indictment does that come?—"A telle peine, punition ou châtiment corporel."

6257. The crime of judicial perjury appears to be provided for by the Approbation. The punishment of death imposed in Terrien, Lib. xii. chap. xviii., has been mitigated?—Yes.

The passage was read as follows.

6258. Approbation. Chapitre Dix Huictiesme.

Les forgeurs and faiseurs de faux contracts, les faux tesmoins and les suborneurs sont punis à la discretion de Justice de mesme selon l'exigence du fait.

6259. All false witnesses are to be punished at the discretion of the Court?—Yes.

6260. That would be perjury which was a false swearing in a Court of Justice?—Yes.

6261. Suppose I want to indict a man for perjury; have I any means of bringing it before the Court?—Yes: you may go to a constable and make your charge to him. If the constable refuses to interfere, you may come before the Court and make your complaint to them.

6262. The intervention of the Crown officers, in fact, is not wanted till the Court sets them in motion?—Certainly not. At the end of last year, a gentleman preferred a charge of perjury against a witness, and was told that the case would be entered into; and the case was entered into. There were two cases; and both cases were fully gone into. One was a case of a woman of the name of Bisson; and the other was the case of a soldier called Gilgas. In both those cases two persons came forward and said, "We have a charge of perjury to make." The Court said, "Will you give in a list of your witnesses to the constable?" And the cases were fully gone into.

6263. Might the Crown officers start a thing of that sort?—Yes. In the last prosecution for perjury the Crown officers did start it.

6264. The Bailiff. In the last case, the perjury arose in a trial conducted by the Crown officer.

6265. The Procureur. In the conspiracy case the matter was laid before the Court: and the Court were of opinion that, in that particular case a proceeding, should not be instituted.

6266. Mr. Carré. The Crown officers consulted the Court as to whether they thought they ought to bring it forward ex officio. And the Court were of opinion that it was not a case in which they could require the Crown officers to bring it forward ex officio.

6267. That it should be left to the individuals to bring their complaint if they thought proper?—Yes.

6268. The Procureur. In other cases individuals have done it; and there is a mode of doing it.

6269. The Contrôle. In the case of any trial, criminal or civil, any person coming forward and saying, "I wish to charge such a person for perjury," might do so. If the Court were satisfied from what they had themselves seen, they might refuse to enter into it; but, if there was the least ground for it, they would require proceedings to be instituted.

6270. (To the Contrôle). Would the time expire in a year and a day for a prosecution for perjury?—No. Twenty years would be the time. It is a crime publique.

6271. Is the Bribery of officers a specific offence?—I presume it is an offence most certainly. There is something upon that subject in Terrien; and there are Ordonnances upon it also.

6272. What would the form of the indictment be there?—It would depend, to some extent, upon who the officer was.

6273. Of course it could not be félonieusement?—I should think not, certainly.

6274. But might it be à châtiment corporel?—I conceive so, certainly.

6275. For either offering or taking a bribe?—Yes.

6276. Would that be under the general authority of the Court?—Yes.

6277. Compounding a felony is mentioned in Terrien, is not it?—Yes; at page 508, Lib. xii. c. xxx.

The passage was read as follows.

6278. De transaction et composition en causes criminelles, Chap. xxx.
La coustume au chapitre de treves fraictes.

L'en doit sçavoir puis que la clameur de la suite est faite, ou que la bataille est gagee de felonnie, l'en peut parler de paix, et la faire par le congé de la justice en tout temps jusques à tant que la bataille soit menee à fin: fors sans plus en suite de trahison, et de larcin, en quoy la coustume de Normandie ne souffre point que l'en parle de paix en nulle maniere, puis que les batailles en sont gagees. Car qui de trahison, ou de larcin prend loyer, ou le donne, il moustre bien qu'il n'est pas quitte de tels crimes. Et qui sans le cõgé de la Justice traitera de paix, ou le fera en cause criminelle, il l'amendera grievement; et tout ce qu'il a fait rien ne vaudra.

6279. Amender grievement is the punishment?—Yes.

6280. That you would construe probably to mean a heavy fine?—Yes.

6281. Might the Court also inflict other punishment for it?—I think so.

6282. Should you lay it félonieusement?—I should presume not.

6283. What do you say as to Riot?—We have no precedent. I presume it would be punishable as general misconduct.

6284. For a riot in England there must be a certain number of persons joined together. Have you any law of that sort?

The Bailiff. I apprehend we could have no felonious riot here.

6285. Suppose it were a riot for the purpose of blowing up Fort George, for example, you would probably lay it according to the intent?

6286. The Contrôle. Yes.

6287. Suppose it were pulling down a house?—That might be laid félonieusement, I think.

6288. Do you think a combination of persons would render that an offence which otherwise would not be so?—I take it, it must be so.

6289. The Bailiff. The assembling of multitudes, so as to create danger to the public peace, would be a riot, like the common law riot in England; but no conduct on their part would render it a felonious riot.

6290. (To the Contrôle.) Is there any express law as to Smuggling?—In cases of smuggling we are entirely guided by such Acts of Parliament as are extended to this Island in the body of the Act.

6291. Are those matters proceeded with summarily before the Court, as a Court of Police Correctionnelle, or are they tried by the Cour en Corps?—They are generally tried by the Cour en Corps upon a proceeding for a fine by a penal action. In some cases difficulties have arisen as to some of the matters which, it is provided, may be treated summarily. And some of those matters have been occasionally treated by the Cour du Quartier; for example, a claim for delivering up the register of a vessel. It has generally been considered that the Cour du Quartier represented the Justice of the Peace in such matters.

6292. The Bailiff. I apprehend, where the act was forbidden by an Act of Parliament, it would be an offence, and might be punished by the general jurisdiction of the Court; but, where a course of proceeding is pointed out, that proceeding must be followed.

6293. Mr. H. Dobrée (Jurat). Some of the clauses of the Merchant Seamen's Act are very difficult of application; particularly with reference to the apprenticeship of boys. Some of the officers of the Customs here have made difficulties in adapting the usual form here to the provisions of this Act. I believe, certain forms have since been brought up here, having no authority whatever except the Customs officers having consented to them.

6294. You think that the provisions, applicable to the apprenticeship of boys in that Act, are not applicable to the state of things in this Island; and you have been obliged to draw up some for yourselves?—Yes.

6295. The Contrôle. The same thing takes place also with respect to seamen having received their month's wages in advance to get them on board; the police officers have no power.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., further examined.

6296. There is a crime in England called Forcible Entry; which is the breaking forcibly into a house under the colour of right. Is that a crime here?—I know of no definite offence of that description, though I have no doubt it would be punished under the common law.

6297. That was probably the sort of taking possession against which the Clameur de Haro took place?—Yes.

6298. Is Sending a threatening letter, or a challenge to fight, an offence?—They are often dealt with as matters en adjonction. They generally, also, lead to a summary proceeding en police, in which the party sending the letter is bound over to keep the peace towards the other.

6299. That power to bind a party to keep the peace resides in the Bailiff and two Jurats, does not it?—Yes.

6300. You not only bind people over to keep the peace; but, wherever a person apprehends bodily injury from another, is not there a mode of taking security from the party threatening the injury, that he will not do mischief to the party complaining?—That is a summary proceeding en police. We have lost the proceeding jurer treves.

6301. Does the party in such a case make a complaint upon oath?—Yes; the Constable brings up the party: and, after the witnesses have been heard, both parties are sometimes bound over to keep the peace.

6302. What is the nature of the recognizance?—It is generally done by a promissory oath. The Greffier tells me that he has met with a case in 1807, in which the party was bound in the sum of 300*l.* to keep the peace.

6303. Mr. De Courcy. In 1828 I was bound in the sum of 100*l.*, and was obliged to find bail to that amount, though I offered to lodge the money in Court.

6304. The Contrôle. I have known cases in which the party complained of has been bound alone. And I know one or two cases in which the party has been bound jointly with two others, or with one.

6305. To the Contrôle. Suppose the party cannot find a surety to answer for the amount; what is done?—I have never known a case arise of that kind.

6306. The Bailiff. I apprehend, when a person refuses to be bound over, or cannot, he is necessarily sent to gaol.

6307. For how long?—For the time during which he is to be bound. If he is bound to keep the peace for three months, he must stay in gaol for that period, if he does not find the security.

Mr. J. Bowditch.

Mr. James Bowditch examined.

6308. You are a solicitor in London, are not you?—Yes; or a.ner of the Island of Jersey at present.

6309. Have you any observations or complaint o make to the Commissioners?—I must claim the indulgence of the Commissioners while I make some few remarks in my professional character as solicitor for Mr. Langa. It appears that he was arrested on the 27th of October, 1835, upon an affidavit, made before the Royal Court, exhibiting articles of the peace by the wife of Mr. Langa against her husband for cruelty. Surprising it is to say, that that man was arrested; that he was held to bail; and that, for want of giving bail to the enormous sum of 500*l.*, to await the judgment of the Court, he was confined in the gaol of this Island ten years and eight months without redress. I sent over two years ago some affidavits, on which to ground an application for a writ of Habeas Corpus; such writ of Habeas Corpus, and the prerogative writs of the Crown, having been established as running into this Island: but, to my mortification, I could not get those affidavits sworn; nor could Mr. Langa obtain a Magistrate to make the usual affidavit for him. He consequently remained in prison, till there was a hint abroad of this Commission. In the mean time, his petition to the Queen in Council was heard: and I have a letter here, stating that that petition was heard by the Queen, and referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. I was told, afterwards, by Lord Wharncliffe, that he would not inquire into the fact, as there was a Commission of criminal law about to be issued, who, he said, might very properly inquire into it.

6310[a]. The Contrôle. The proceedings to which Mr. Bowditch is referring were altogether in the nature of a civil suit.

6310[b]. The Procureur. Entirely so.

6311. (To the Contrôle.) Will you produce to the Commissioners the proceedings in that case?

The same are put in and read as follows.

"Dame Henriette Anne Potinger, femme de Frédéric Langa, Ecuyer, a déclaré par serment qu'elle se propose d'intenter cause contre le dit Mr. Langa à la voir presenter requête civile en la Cour tendante être séparée quant aux biens d'avec son dit mari pour les raisons contenus dans la dite requête; mais, d'autant qu'elle a raison de croire que le dit Mr. Langa se propose de quitter l'Ile, elle demande d'arrêter sa personne pour l'obliger à fonder un procureur instruit et caution de cinq cents livres qu'il répondra jusqu' à fin de plaid, et du jugé dans la dite cause.

"H. A. Potinger.

"Sermenté ce 17e Février, 1835.

"Jean La Serre, Lt. Baillif."

6312. " En conséquence du serment ci-dessus, je permets à la dite Henriette Anne Potinger, au dit nom, de faire arrêt de la personne du dit Mr. Langa pour l'obliger à fonder un procureur instruit et caution de cinq cents livres qu'il répondra jusqu'à fin de plaid et du jugé en la cause qu'elle se propose d'intenter contre lui à la voir présenter requête civile à la cour tendante à être séparée, quant aux biens: donné à son dit mari fournir les raisons contenues dans la dite requête. Et, au défaut, &c., ce 17e Février, 1835.

" Jean La Serre, Lt. Baillif."

" Je soussigné, vertu de mon office et de la permission ci-dessus écrite, certifie avoir fait arrêt de la personne du dit Frédéric Langa, Ecuyer, et de l'avoir constitué prisonnier dans la prison publique ce 27e Octobre, 1835.

" Pierre Martin, Dté. Prevôt du Roi."

6313 a. It appears from the proceedings that the demand was a deposit to secure the appearance of the husband to a suit of separation or divorce. Is that so?—Yes, to secure his appearance and obedience to whatever the Court may order. In all civil suits here, if the defendant has no real property in the Island, you have a right to arrest his person, on mesne process, for the purpose of obliging him to give bail that he will answer in the suit. In this case, Mr. Langa not having real property in the Island, any person entering an action against him had a right to call upon him to enter into such security. And that was exactly what was done in this case.

6313 b. Is there anything in this case which differs from an ordinary proceeding under similar circumstances?—Nothing whatever.

Mr. Bowditch was informed that this, appearing to be a proceeding entirely of a civil nature, was not one the inquiry into which fell within the province of the Commissioners.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., examined.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

6314. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Do you find any specific law of Bigamy in Terrien?—There is no chapter on the subject, though it is incidentally referred to in page 471. There are instances of prosecutions for bigamy in this Island, but no recent ones.

6315. How was the indictment framed?—A telle peine punition ou châtiment corporel, que la Cour trouvera condigne.

6316. Should you ever lay it félonieusement?—No.

6317. That is under your general common law jurisdiction?—Yes.

6318. Is Contracting marriage with persons under age punishable in this Island?—I understand not.

6319. What is said in Terrien (Lib. xii. c. xiv. p. 448.) would merely render the marriage null?—Yes; the Approbation to the 2nd chapter of Terrien, Lib. ii., says: " Si les Enfans de Famille contractent mariage clandestinement sans le consent de ses père et mère ou de ses Tuteurs et Curateurs les mariages sont nuls sans autre peine ou amende sur les dits Enfans."

6320. What is full age in this country?—Twenty years. The Approbation fixes that clearly in the same chapter.

6321. What is your test of marriage in cases of bigamy? Do you take the ecclesiastical test?—I should consider we do. Anciently we should have inquired into the ecclesiastical question, I should think; but, now that there has been an Ordonnance passed by the States, which has been confirmed by an order in Council, admitting marriages contracted in a civil form, we should admit those as valid.

6322. Suppose the wife is ignorant of the abode of her husband, and has not seen him for seven years; what is your law?—I know there is a distinction taken. The good faith of the wife is considered as an important ingredient in the inquiry.

6323. That is, supposing the wife is the party charged with the bigamy?—Yes.

6324. Should you consider a Nuisance, as carrying on an offensive or dangerous trade, punishable?—Yes.

6325. Or keeping a brothel?—Yes.

6326. The Bailiff. I think a dangerous trade is an offence punishable here, either as a matter of police, or, as I should think, by indictment. A case has been brought to my notice more than once; the case of quarries so worked, by blasting, as to throw the stone into the neighbourhood. Those have been treated as matters of police: and I conceive that, if the same person should continue the act, it might be a matter of indictment.

6327. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) Furious driving?—There is an Ordonnance; but that applies only to furious driving in the town.

6328. Do you agree with Mr. Contrôle, that an Ordonnance does not destroy the common law right of the Court to punish?—Yes.

6329. Indecent exposure; is that punishable?—That comes under the same rule.

6330. What is the right of the parochial officers to put up notices in churches? Is there any Ordonnance permitting them to do that?—Anciently it was the practice to affix all sorts of notices and advertisements, particularly those which regarded judicial proceedings, at the church doors, and also to have them read by the parish clerk, at the time the congregation was coming out of the church.

6331. Outside the church?—Yes; in the churchyard generally.

6332. Were they read by the clerk outside the church?—Yes; they were read in the town parish by the King's Serjeant; in all the other parishes by the parish clerk.

6333. Is there any right to put notices inside the church?—I conceive not; though, I believe, in some of the churches, when the porch was an open one and there was no wicket gate, the notices may occasionally have been stuck within the porch, to prevent their being destroyed by the rain. I do not speak positively; but that is my impression.

6334. Is it understood that that can be done without the consent of the rector?—A few years ago there was an Act of Parliament passed in England, to do away with notices in the Church, 7 W. 4, & 1 Vic., c. 45. This Act, I believe, extends to these Islands; however, it was sent here for registry. Its provisions were found not to be applicable to all cases of the kind which occurred here. And an Ordonnance of the Court was made, which regulated the manner in which those publications were to be made in future. The reading of any notices during divine service, which was prohibited by the Act, was also prohibited here. It was provided that a frame or cadre should be provided by the churchwardens of each parish, and hung up at or near the door of the church; in which cadre such notices as had formerly been read, during divine service or afterwards, should be pasted by the proper officer, the clerk or serjeant; and I believe, in consequence, a frame of the sort was provided by the churchwardens in all the parishes.

GUERNSEY.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

6335. Do you recollect whether the Ordonnance contained any specific punishment for defacing the notice?—There was not. It was merely a substitution of one mode of publication for another.

6336. Did it regulate the nature of publications which might be put there?—No. Here is the Ordonnance of December, 1837, on that subject.

The same was read as follows.

6337. Le seize Décembre, mil huit-cent trente-sept, devant Mons$^{r}$ le Baillif, présens Jean Le Messurier, H. O. Carré, F. Mansell, P. B. Dobrée, F. W. Gosselin, Thomas Le Retilley, et Harry Dobrée, Ecuyers, Jurés.

La Cour désirant se conformer à l'Acte de Parlément de la première année du règne de Sa Majesté, la Reine, Victoria, cap. 45, intitulé, "An Act to alter the Mode of giving Notices for the holding of Vestries, of making Proclamations in Cases of Outlawry, and of giving Notices on Sundays with respect to various Matters, 12th July, 1837," et enregîtré sur les records publics de cette Ile, vertu d'un ordre de sa dite Majesté en date du 18$^{e}$ Novembre 1837 et, après avoir ouï les conclusions des officiers de la Reine, a rappelé la partie des diverses ordonnances qui enjoint de publier, soit dans une ou dans les Eglises de cette Ile, ou à l'issue des prêches d'une ou des dites Eglises; défend les dites publications; et a ordonné qu'à l'avenir on sera tenu, par autant de Dimanches que l'on fait publier actuellement, de faire afficher, avant le service divin et proche la porte principale de l'Eglise ou des Eglises nécessaires, d'après la loi et coûtume, la pièce qui d'après la loi et la coûtume de cette Ile exige publication. Et servira la dite affiche de publication, en produisant relation du lecteur ou des lecteurs d'avoir dûment affiché la pièce le nombre de fois requise par la loi ou la coûtume. Et sera chaque lecteur tenu de placer un cadre suffisant en bois avec une porte en fil d'archal fermant à clef, chaque Dimanche, une heure avant le service divin, proche la Porte principale de l'Eglise de sa paroisse; dans lequel cadre il sera tenu de placer les annonces ou autres pièces dont publication sera nécessaire, de manière à ce qu'elles puissent être facilement lues par le public. Et ne déroge cette présente ordonnance à la coûtume existante de publier dans les Eglises, pendant le service divin, les annonces de mariage, les jours où il doit y avoir service divin, les jours de fête ou de jeûne qui doivent être observés pendant la semaine suivante, ainsi que ce qui est enjoint par la Liturgie, par Sa Majesté ou par les Autorités Ecclésiastiques du lieu. Et sera cette présente Ordonnance en force à compter du premier Janvier prochain, et sera publiée au cri du marché et affichée aux lieux ordinaires. Et sera transmise par Monsieur le Greffier de la Reine à Monsieur le Juge d'Auregny et à Monsieur le Sénéchal de l'Ile de Serk, pour être également publiée, affichée et enregîtrée dans les dites Iles.

6338. Mr. MacCulloch. The practice used to be to affix certain notices on the outside of the door of the church, against the wall. There may have been some exceptions, where the churches had open porches; and they may have been affixed inside the porch.

6339. Do you recollect the proceedings against the Rev. Mr. Dobrée, in reference to that subject?—Yes.

6340. What was he punished for?—If I recollect the circumstances right, they were these. A parish meeting was called of all the parishes of this Island, at the time that there were certain disputes between the Lieutenant Governor and the other Authorities in the Island.* The custom, I should state, in this Island, when a parish meeting is called, is, in general, that the notice should be signed by the rector and churchwardens, except in cases of meetings called for the purpose of electing a constable or douzenier; in which case the notice is usually signed by the constables, and not by the rector or churchwardens. Formerly a distinction was made, and I believe exists to this day in some of the parishes in the country, respecting the place in which those meetings were held. In cases in which the notice was signed by custom by the rector and churchwardens, the meeting took place inside the church. When it was signed by the constables, the meeting took place in the porch of the church, or in the churchyard, and not in the church, unless the rector's and the churchwardens' permission had been specifically obtained for that day. The question has occasionally arisen, whether the constables were entitled to call parish meetings without getting the signatures of the rector and churchwardens, except for the special cases of elections of constables and douzeniers. There has been a diversity of opinion and some discussion upon that point. On the occasion in question, in eight of the parishes of this Island, the notices calling those meetings were signed by the rector and churchwardens. In the two parishes of which Mr. Dobrée is rector, I am informed, for I do not speak of my own knowledge, it was stated at the time that he had been called on to sign the notices for parish meetings, and had refused to do so; in consequence of which the meetings were called in both parishes by the constables, and the notices signed by them only. He objected, of course, to the meetings being held either in the church or in the churchyard. The case which came before the Court respected the parish of Torteval principally. The notice for the calling of the meeting at Torteval was placed in the cadre or frame in which notices of the kind are usually pasted up. I cannot tell, from memory, whether this cadre was usually hung up outside the door of the church, or inside; but on the Sunday in question the cadre was hung up in the lower part of the tower of the church, which forms a sort of vestibule or porch, and is excluded from the open air by a door, which is locked. Entering in by this door, you come into a round vestibule; and there is a second door which separates this porch from the body of the church, which, I believe, is generally kept shut. I cannot speak from my own knowledge. This box was hung up within this vestibule, as I call it, of the church. I am not positive whether Mr. Dobrée turned the frame to prevent the notice from being seen, or tore down the notice. My impression is that he took away the notice out of the frame.

* The following is a copy of the Notice in question. "Les connétables et douzeniers prient les Chefs de Famille de cette paroisse de s'assembler dans l'Eglise paroissiale, Mercredi prochain, á onze heures du matin, pour délibérer s'il ne conviendrait pas de nommer un comité, pour, au nom de cette paroisse, et conjointement avec les autres paroisses de cette Ile, exprimer, par le moyen d'une très humble remontrance à Sa Majesté, ou autrement, la loyauté des dits chefs de Famille envers la personne et le Gouvernement de Sa dite Majesté, leur attachement aux Institutions de cette Ile, et, en même temps, marquer leur désapprobation de la conduite récente de son Excellence le Lieutenant Gouverneur Napier, en ce qu'elle porte atteinte à nos franchises, méconnait l'autorité de la Justice, et substitue la force au droit qui régit les habitans de ce pays. Et prendre toutes et telles autres mésures que les dits Chefs de Famille jugeront convenables suivant l'exigence du cas. Ce 7 Mars, 1844.

6341. Mr Andros. He took away the frame itself, as well as the notice.

6342. Mr. MacCulloch. I recollect Mr. Dobrée stating that his reason for taking the cadre was, that the notice was pasted, and that he could not unpaste it. A complaint was afterwards made to the Court by the constables of the parish. I believe that the notice had been taken away, and the cadre taken away.

6343. Was the complaint to the Cour du Quartier?—Yes. The Constable's principal reason for complaining was that it might have prevented the holding of the meeting: and thereupon Mr. Dobrée was fined by the Court.

6344. Thirty livres tournois was the amount of the fine, was not it?—Yes. The Forest case was disposed of immediately afterwards. I quite forget the details of that case.

6345. Mr. De Havilland. I believe in that Cadre there were other matters contained, of some importance, besides the particular notice in question.

The following entries were put in and read.

6346. A la Cour Royale de l'Ile de Guernsey.

Le quatorze Mars, mil huit-cent quarante-quatre, devant Jean Guille, Ecuyer, Bailiff; présens Messire William Collings, Hilary Olivier Carré, Thomas William Gosselin, Thomas Le Retilley, Thomas Fiott De Havilland, Thomas Andros, et Edgar MacCulloch, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Le Révérend Daniel Dobrée, Recteur de la paroisse de Torteval, ayant été ce jour fait convenir devant la Cour par le ministère des Connétables de la dite Paroisse sur une plainte portée contre lui par les dits Connétables et par les Curateurs du trésor de l'église de la dite paroisse, d'avoir le dit Mr. Dobrée, Dimanche, le 10e Mars courant, immédiatement avant le commencement du service divin dans la dite église, retiré plusieures publications, tant judiciares qu'autres, hors d'un cadre dans lequel (conformément à une Ordonnance de la Cour Royale, en date du 16e Décembre, 1837, fondée sur un Ordre de Sa Majesté en Conseil et sur un Acte de Parlément, enregîtrés sur nos records, le dit Acte intitulé "An Act to alter the Mode of giving Notices for the holding of Vestries, &c.") les dites publications avaient été affichées par le Lecteur de la dite Paroisse, et de s'être de plus, le dit Mr. Dobrée, emparé du dit cadre, lequel était au dedans de la dite église et l'avoir pris et emporté, avec une publication qui y restait attachée, laquelle publication était signée des dits Curateurs et des dits Connétables, le tout en contravention à la dite Ordonnance et à l'entrave du cours des affaires publiques: La Cour, après avoir entendu plusieurs témoins dignes de foi, et ouies les conclusions des officiers de la Reine et vu que c'est la première fois qu'elle est appelée à prononcer sur une offence de cette nature, a seulement condamné le dit M. Dobrée à une amende de trente livres tournois envers Sa Majesté.

6347. A la Cour Royale de l'Ile de Guernsey.

Le vingt-un Mars, mil huit-cent quarante-quatre, devant Jean Guille, Ecuyer, Bailiff; présens Messire William Collings, Hilary Olivier Carré, et Thomas William Gosselin, Ecuyers, Jurés.

Le Révérend Daniel Dobrée, Recteur de la Paroisse de la Forêt, ayant été ce jour fait convenir devant la Cour par le ministère des Connétables de la dite Paroisse, sur une plainte portée contre lui par les dits Connétables et les Douzeniers de la dite paroisse, d'avoir, le dit M. Dobrée, Dimanche, le 10e Mars courant, immédiatement avant le commencement du service divin, dans le porche de l'église de la dite Paroisse, retiré une publication hors d'un cadre, dans lequel (conformément à une Ordonnance de la Cour Royale, en date du 16e Décembre, 1837, fondée sur un Ordre de Sa Majesté en Conseil, et sur un Acte de Parlément enregîtrés sur nos records le ditActe intitulé "An Act to alter the Mode of giving Notices for the holding of Vestries, &c.") la dite publication avait été affichée par le Lecteur de la dite Paroisse et laquelle étoit signée des Curateurs et des Connétables de la dite Paroisse, le tout en contravention à la dite Ordonnance et à l'entrave du cours des affaires publiques: La Cour, après avoir entendu plusieurs témoins, dignes de foi, et ouies les conclusions des officiers de la Reine, a condamné le dit Mr. Dobrée à une amende de quatorze livres tournois envers Sa Majesté.

6349. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. With respect to this matter, I took those notices out, and carefully pinned them up before I took away the frame, so that public business might not be interrupted. I did take away the frame in order to get the notice unpasted; but I will tell the Commissioners why I did so. I took the frame at first, and turned its face to the wall; and the Clerk's son, young Le Ray, came behind me, and put it in the place where it was before; and he called me an impudent scoundrel for meddling with his frame, in my own church.

6348. At what time was this?—At ten o'clock on Sunday morning.

6349. At what time does service begin?—At ten o'clock in the morning.

6350. Then it was just before the commencement of the service?—Yes; it was just at ten. I would beg leave to add that this vestibule, which Mr. MacCulloch has described, is not an open porch: but it is the place where I am obliged to read the service over the dead; because no coffin can be brought up to the pulpit of Torteval church, because the aisles are too narrow. This vestibule, therefore, is virtually part of the church. I was therefore forced, in my own defence, to remove the cadre, as I had turned it with its face to the wall once before, and could not unpaste this notice, which was pasted with shoemaker's paste. The meeting so called was a parochial meeting, not a vestry meeting. It was called in the church, not out of the church. I did not sign the notice; and, in the Forest case, the cadre was placed, contrary to all custom, on that day, in the body of the church, right opposite the reading desk. That was in direct opposition to my desire, and to insult me publicly, because I had told the Constable repeatedly that I would not sign it. I would mention that, in other parishes with which I am acquainted, take the town and the parish of St. Peter-in-the-Wood, the cadre is invariably fixed outside the church doors, not inside. I would also say that I had repeatedly desired the church-wardens to take those things out of the church; and they had never done so.

6351. (To Mr. MacCulloch.) In some cases of proceedings for infringing Ordonnances the Douzaine become the parties, do not they?—Not strictly. A certain power is vested in them by some of the Ordonnances to do certain acts; with respect to rebuilding walls, for instance.

6352. (To the Contrôle.) Do you recollect the circumstances of the case of Mr. Ferguson?—Mr. Ferguson himself went to the Douzaine to apply for a "bournement," that is, a boundary to his land, which is necessary when any change is made in the situation of property bordering on the public road. He obtained the bournement; and he then built contrary to this bournement. At all events, some one did so. The building was carried on contrary to the bournement: he was then actioned for a fine for doing so.

6353. Who actioned him?—The Douzaine and the Crown officers. It was in the usual form of action. There was no objection taken by him with respect to the ownership. He was then condemned to a fine and ordered to demolish.

6354. Who proved the ownership?—The defendant himself applied for the bournement. The instrument states the name of the owner.

6355. Suppose he applies for a bournement and afterwards sells his property?—A bournement is only in force during a year and a day, without confirmation. If I go for a bournement, it is only as the proprietor I have a right to it. The infringement of it would be a primâ facie ground for a suit against the party named in the bournement as proprietor. If the person sued came forward, and said "I am not the proprietor," I consider the onus would lie on him to prove it. In this case the ownership was not disputed at the time of the fine. After having been condemned to a fine and to demolish, he began demolishing; and then his son instituted a Clameur de Haro, on the ground that it was his property. The case came before the Court.

6356. In what shape?—This stopped the demolition; and the constables then sued to enforce the demolition. Upon this, Mr. Ferguson came forward and pleaded the Clameur de Haro as a bar to the demolition. Upon this, the person who had instituted the Clameur de Haro, was called in by the Court; and, on it appearing that the son was really the proprietor, the Douzaine was put to silence. The son produced the title deeds of the property to prove it was his. That is the way in which the case ended. There is a question pending now, on the Ordonnance itself. A person named Sarchet has presented a petition to the Privy Council, which has been referred to the Court for their answer.

6357. Are there many cases in which the Douzaine is the party before the Court?—The Douzaine is not necessarily before the Court at all. It is the Constable who usually comes before the Court in such cases.

6358. Does the Douzaine instruct the Constable to take proceedings?—Yes; the authority to give the bournement is confined to them.

6359. (To Mr. MacCulloch). Have you any law respecting Gambling?—There are some ancient Ordonnances on the subject. I know of no other law.

6360. We understand the Game laws are taken out of the category of offences in Terrien, and thrown upon the Ordonnances of the Chefs Plaids?—Yes.

6361. There is an Ordonnance upon that subject, is not there?—Yes; there is an Ordonnance respecting la chasse.

6362. In one of the Ordonnances is not there a regulation that no one shall carry arms who does not pay tenpence a year?—No; that was a projet of an Ordonnance; but the old Ordonnance is still in force.

6363. The Commissioners are told there is occasionally mischief done by firing near the roads?—I should say a great deal at certain seasons of the year; particularly in winter or on any holidays. There is positive danger in walking in the country on such occasions.

6364. Such matters you consider fully within the competence of the Court to regulate?—Yes. The Court from the most ancient times has legislated upon such subjects. I have known instances in which persons for incautious firing in the streets have been dealt with at common law as being a nuisance.

6365. Can you put spring guns in your gardens?—I should say not; though I know of no enactment on the subject.

6366. Is Digging up dead bodies an offence?—I know of no case in this country.

6367. The Contrôle. There was a complaint came before the Court, some time ago, in reference to moving part of the wood of coffins; that would have been treated by the Court.

6368. (To Mr. MacCulloch). Can you compel a person to execute most of the Offices here?—Yes.

6369. What is the mothod of proceeding if he will not?—It is a criminal offence at common law. In some cases I have seen a fine imposed. A party has been ordered to take the oath within a certain time on a certain penalty. The proceeding is rather a civil action then.

6370. Mr. Metivier. If he leaves the Island before he takes the oath, he incurs a fine of 100*l.*

6371. Mr. MacCulloch. There are certain offices which have been made compulsory by order of the Court. The offices of Treasurer and Vice Treasurer of the Town Hospital, and, I think, the Country Hospital also, but I am not sure of that.

6372. Would that apply to the office of Procureur des pauvres?—The Procureur des pauvres and the Collecteur des pauvres are ecclesiastical offices. They are sworn in before the Dean. I recollect a case in which a gentleman refused to take the oath of the Collecteur des pauvres. He was proceeded against in the Ecclesiastical Court; and, on his persisting in refusing, the matter was handed over, under an old Order in Council of Charles the II., to the Royal Court. The Court adjudged him to take the oath under the penalty of three livres, doubled upon every subsequent refusal.

6373. In England there is a principle by which certain acts, which a man may do himself, he may not do in combination with others. Have you anything which creates an offence by Combination?—I recollect a case, in which a body of workmen struck for wages, and the matter was treated en police.

6374. The principle being that each man might ask what wages he pleased, but that they must not combine?—Yes.

6375. Suppose a set of masters were to unite to say that they would not give more than a certain amount of wages; would that be treated in the same way?—Yes; it ought.

6376. Would it?—It would not be so likely, perhaps.

6377. What is the meaning of Fouage in Terrien?—It is a payment to the lord of the manor.

6378. With respect to the Caution Juratoire: is it not the practice to oblige a person, who has been complained of for some illegal act, to give his caution juratoire not to repeat it?—Yes.

6379. Did not that occur in Waterman's case?—Mr. Carré. He was a tenant in a house belonging to the States. He was complained of, I think by the neighbours, for having established a place for smoking and drying bacon in an apartment in an underground story, where there was no fire-place. This complaint was brought before the Police Court as a dangerous nuisance. From the Acte I gather that this complaint came first before the States' Committee, who had the charge of the States' property. They thought it dangerous, and gave him notice to discontinue the practice; and, upon his continuing it, they brought the matter before the Court.

6380. Which Court?—The Cour du Quartier. After hearing the evidence, the Court, considering that the property of the States was in danger in consequence of Mr. Waterman's proceedings, obliged him to give his caution juratoire that he would no longer light a fire in that apartment. It is also noted in the Acte that he did give his caution juratoire. He afterwards continued the same practice: and, upon its being proved, he was condemned by the Acte of Court of the 24th of January, 1839, to one month's imprisonment.

6381. For breach of the caution juratoire?—Yes.

6382. Is that the ordinary punishment for a breach of a caution juratoire?—That punishment, I suppose, is arbitrary, like other punishments.

6383. Is that the extreme punishment which could be inflicted by the Cour du Quartier?—No; it might have gone further. He was condemned to one month's solitary confinement, and a fortnight of that was on bread and water. The whole might have been on bread and water.

6384. Was any defence made that it was in a different apartment?—No.

The Actes of Court were read as follow.

6385. "Le 13e Septembre, 1838, devant Mons$^{r}$. le Baillif; présents, &c.

Sur la représentation du Comité des Etats pour la Rue de la Fontaine que, nonobstant la signification faite au Sieur Jean Waterman, locataire d'une des maisons, appartenant aux Etats, et l'acte du 8e du courant, qui a eu lieu en conséquence, il continue néanmoins à faire feu dans le cellier de la dite maison, ce qui met la propriété des dits Etats dans le plus grand danger, la Cour, après avoir entendu des témoins dignes de foi et le dit Waterman, et ouies les conclusions des officiers de la Reine, a ordonné que le dit Waterman donnera sa caution juratoire qu'il ne fera feu à l'avenir dans le dit cellier: laquelle caution il a présentement donnée.

6386. Le vingt-quatre Janvier, 1839, devant Mons$^{r}$. le Baillif; présents, &c.

Jean Waterman, locataire d'une maison appartenant aux Etats de cette Ile et située dans le Marché, ayant éte ce jour produit devant la cour par Mr. James Frecker, Assistant Connétable du dit Marché, étant accusé d'avoir continué, malgré sa promesse faite par serment devant la Cour, le 13e Septembre, 1838, de ne pas faire aucun feu à l'avenir dans le cellier de la dite maison, à y en faire, au grand préjudice des dits Etats et au danger imminent de leur propriété: La Cour, après avoir entendu des témoins dignes de foi, et ouies les conclusions des officiers de la Reine, à condamné le dit Waterman à un mois d'emprisonnement solitaire dans la prison publique, dont les premiers quinze jours seront au pain et à l'eau".

6387. The following example of an Order for "La Caution juratoire" was put in and read.

Henri Taylor Dale, fils de Francois, de la paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, ayant été ce jour produit devant la Cour par le ministère de Josué P. F. Ahier, Ec$^{r}$., un des connétables de la ville et paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, étant accusé d'avoir, soit seul ou avec autre son complice ou autres ses complices, dans la nuit de Samedi le 8e à Dimanche le 9e Novembre courant, dans ou proche la rue des Forges, en la ville et paroisse de Saint Pierre Port, assailli et cruellement battu et maltraité le Sieur James Hayes, le dit Dale ou complice ayant porté plusieurs coups violens, dont un ou quelques uns avec un bâton ou autres instrumens obtus et dangereux, à la joue gauche et au nez du dit Hayes, et d'avoir, le dit Dale ou autre son complice ou autres ses complices, fait tomber le dit Hayes par terre, et, lorsque le dit Hayes étoit par terre, d'avoir, le dit Dale ou autre son complice ou autres ses complices, porté des coups de pied violens au dit Hayes; de tous lesquels dits maltraitemens se sont ensuivis, contusions, meurtrissures et effusion de sang: La Cour, après avoir pris par écrit l'interrogatoire du dit Dale et entendu des témoins dignes de foi, a ordonné qu'il sera constitué prisonnier dans la prison publique pour plus ample information, sauf à lui à donner caution juratoire, qu'il se présentera en Cour, Jeudi prochain: laquelle caution il a présentiment donnée.

6388. (To Mr. MacCulloch). Do you consider Adultery a criminal act here still?—No. I cannot tell you upon what authority it has discontinued to be so.

6389. The Contrôle. In 1806 a case of adultery was entered en adjonction, and admitted in that form.

6390. (To Mr. MacCulloch). Do you think the law as laid down in Terrien on that subject is obsolete?—I think so,

6391. With respect to False Weights: the Court would have the general law, where there was no Ordonnance, would it not?—The whole subject of weights and measures is in a very unsatisfactory state. There are several ancient Ordonnances on the subject, in which the Procureur

GUERNSEY.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

October 10th, 1846.

and the Prevôt are ordered to visit and inspect the weights and measures jointly with the constables.

6392. With regard to false weights and measures, the Approbation to Terrien, Lib. xii., chap. xix., Des faux poids et fausses mesures, says; "Nous en usons"?—Yes.

6393. Are there any Ordonnances in Chefs Plaids on the subject of weights and measures? —Yes.

6394. Should you recognize the use of false weights as a common law fraud? Yes. About twelve months ago the Deputy Sheriff, accompanied by the constables, went round and examined the weights in several shops, and seized such as were found to be light. The Sheriff also is authorized by certain old Ordonnances to stamp weights and measures: but the Procureur, I know, is joined with him in visiting.

6395. In case of the offence being repeated might you indict by a procès ordinaire?—Certainly.

6396. The twenty-second chapter of the Twelfth Book of Terrien treats "D'usures et d'usuriers." The Approbation adds: "Nous en usons selon le texte de la Coustume de Normandie." Do you hold to that?—Laws have been passed by the Chefs Plaids at different times, regulating the rate of interest. The last reduces the legal rate from six to five per cent.

6397 Is there any usury law at this moment in the Island?—I consider that usury carried to any very serious extent would be treated as a fraud.

6398. If a person refuses to submit to l'Interrogatoire can you put him to torture?—The written law, as laid down in Terrien, Lib xii. chap. xxxv., p. 520, which chapter has the authority of the Approbation, says we may:* but I should doubt whether it could be done legally, from non-user for so long a period. I would just point out one mode of punishment to which no reference has been made, and which ought to be done away with, which is the "Amende honorable à Justice," described in Terrien, Lib. xii. chap. xxvii. p. 499.

L'amende honorable aussi se fait à Justice en cas de crime, quand il est commis contre l'honneur de Dieu, l'auctorité du Roi et la chose publique. Et se fait en ceste manière que le delinquant, estant à genoux, nue teste et nuds pieds et quelque fois en chemise, tenant une torche ardente en ses mains, recognoit son offense, et en requiert pardon à Dieu au Roy et à Justice. Et auec ceste amende honorable, qui se fait à Justice, on a bien accoustumé de condamner aussi le délinquant en amende pecuniare enuers le Roy.

6398. Is that ever practised?—I have known it done on one or two occasions; in cases of women charged with infanticide, and found guilty, not of infanticide, but of gross neglect, concealing the birth, and so on. I recollect that in two cases.

6399. How long ago?—The last was in 1829.

6400. Is Blasphemy now punished criminally?—It is provided for in Terrien, Lib. xii. chap. ix. "Des Blasphemateurs du nom de Dieu de la Vierge Marie et des Saincts." The Approbation says: "Les blasphemeteurs sont punis à la discretion de la Justice, soit par amende pecunielle emprisonment ou punition corporelle selon le grandeur de la blaspheme." But I have known no case of it. The old law is abrogé par non usance: but I apprehend that it would be a crime and punishable if carried to any extent.

6401. Probably the way of punishing it would be as a case of nuisance?—That might be.

6402. The Contrôle. There is a very awkward subject about fines for infringing Ordonnances. When persons are sued upon Ordonnances, if they are sued by an informer, whoever he be, in case the party cannot pay the fine, it amounts to there being no redress. A constable, for instance, sues a person under a public Ordonnance for having sold without a license. He is condemned to a fine of 5*l.* If he cannot pay, the constable is obliged to put him in prison and maintain him there. The consequence of which is that the constables do not like to incur those expenses. Again, by the new Order in Council the Court has power to condemn for all fines not above thirty livres; and the Order in Council states that, in case of non-payment on the spot, there are to be as many days' imprisonment as there were livres tournois adjudged for a fine. In case of a person being sent to prison under that Ordonnance also, there is the question who is to maintain him. I conceive, where the fine is sued for by the Crown officers, the maintenance should be at the public expense.

6403. (To the Rev. Daniel Dobrée.) In your case, when were you taken up?—I was arrested in Torteval church by two constables. On the day of the meeting I had a funeral to perform at Torteval; I went and performed the funeral in company with Lieutenant Boyle. Immediately after I had performed the funeral, while I had my gown still on, I returned into the church to register the interment according to Act of Parliament. On entering the church, I found the two constables had concealed themselves there; one of them tapped me on the shoulder, and said, "I arrest you in the name of the Bailiff." I said, "Where is your authority?" He pulled out a paper and said, "There it is." I said, "Read it." He either would not or could not. I said, "Let me read it." He declined. I said, "You have no right to arrest me in my own church, upon any warrant whatever." He said, "You have no witness." Upon which Lieutenant Boyle stepped out from behind the door, and said, "I beg your pardon, here am I; I understand French perfectly." They wished to arrest me and take me with them. I declined positively to go.

6404. Did they say what they arrested you for?—No. They showed me a warrant, but refused either to read it to me or let me read it. The plain object of it was to prevent my attending the meeting.

* The passage referred to is as follows, from the chapter "De l'examen de bouche des accusez."—"Et si l'accusé est contumax et refusant de respondre, ou s'il ne veut respondre pertinemment il peut être contraint par la torture à respondre. Et ne luy sera donné temps à deliberer, car il doibt estre certain s'il veut confesser ou denier le crime à luy imposé, veu qu'il sçait bien s'il en est coulpable."—Terrien, Lib. xii., chap. xxxv., p. 520.

Robert MacCulloch, Esq., Advocate.

October 10th, 1846.

6405. Mr. Andros. I must say that the constable attended and gave a very different account from this. He stated that he merely desired Mr. Dobrée to be good enough to be present in Court on the day on which the complaint was to be presented.

6406. Mr. Carré. This occurrence took place after the complaint had been laid before the Court respecting Mr. Dobrée's act, which has been referred to. The constables were desired by a letter, either from the Bailiff or from the Crown officers, to give notice to Mr. Dobrée to be present in Court the following Thursday. It was in the performance of this duty that what Mr. Dobrée speaks of took place. The constable, on being called, declared he had never any intention of arresting Mr. Dobrée; and the writ shown was only a letter directing the constable to summon Mr. Dobrée.

6407. The Rev. Daniel Dobrée. When the Bailiff has had occasion, in other instances, to have my attendance in Court, he has written me a civil note requesting it.

---

John Ferguson, examined.

John Ferguson.

6408. What is the complaint you wish to make to the Commissioners?—I complain against the constables of the town Parish and against the Douzaine for suing me in an illegal manner. I have been taken from my store and brought to the bar as a criminal. The Procureur sentenced me to seven livres fine, though the Court did not allow it. I was sent for on Friday to appear before the Court for having infringed upon the bournement of the Douzaine. Upon that subject I was fined three livres; but, at the bar, I denied and do deny and maintain yet that I was not the owner of the property. I stated that I had not called for the bournement. I know there was a Mr. Ferguson did call for the bournement; but who is Mr. Ferguson? His name is Charles, my name is John.

6409. Did not you make an application for the bournement?—No. And the Court would never allow me to prove, at this bar, that I never had one.

6410. Did you say, at the hearing, that the land did not belong to you, but to your son?—I protested against it from the time the Procureur sued me.

6411. The Contrôle says that, upon a subsequent occasion, upon your being ordered to pay the fine and to take down the erection you had placed there, Charles Ferguson came and instituted a clameur de haro against you, for meddling with his wall; that, upon that being done, the Court ordered your son to be made a party to the dispute between you and the Douzaine; and that upon the three parties being before the Court the Douzeniers were put to silence. But that upon your first appearing before the Court you never produced the deeds at all?—I protested, when I was first at the bar, that I never asked for the bournement at all. I have two witnesses, who went and asked for the bournement; but it was not for myself, but for Charles Ferguson.

6412. Did you make that defence when you were first brought up about the bournement?—Yes.

6413. Mr. Agnew. I was on the committee which gave Mr. Ferguson the bournement the first time; and I declare that he called upon the Douzaine in his own name to give the bournement for a twelvemonth. It was not in any one else's name, but in his own.

6414. The following papers were delivered in by the Bailiff.

Documents delivered to the by the Bailiff.

The salary of the Bailiff is 300*l.* a-year.

This salary, though payable under an Order in Council, is not paid in English money, but in Guernsey currency; whereby a deduction is caused of 6 per cent.

The fees attached to the office are various. Some for causes and contracts passed in Court; some for certificates affidavits or declarations; some for writs signed.

I cannot tell the precise amount of these fees. I am told that it never reaches 100*l.* a-year. And I believe the statement to be correct. I may here observe that much of the business, in respect of which these fees are payable, though mere matter of routine, is very troublesome and occasions continual interruption, interfering with other and more important business. Supposing any remuneration to be hereafter given to any other member of the Court, I would suggest the propriety of transferring to such member of the Court the whole of this routine business, together with the fees attached to the same. As it is, a great deal of the Bailiff's time is wasted on business of a mere ministerial or even clerical nature.

It will be understood that, in this proposition, I do not contemplate any reduction in the profits of the Bailiff's office. With respect to the amount of his salary, I do not think that the present is the proper time to offer any observations I may have to make.

P. S. Carey,
Bailiff of Guernsey.

6415. The fees received by the Law officers are derived from causes to swear in constables and douzeniers.
Causes for guardianship of minors and persons unable to take care of their property.
Applications for publican's licences.
Applications for surgeons and apothecaries.
Cases en adjonction.
A few more public applications.
The whole of these require different degrees of attention and care in the drawing up of summonses, &c. The average yearly amount of such fees not exceeding 30*l.* to 35*l.* for each law officer.

Greffe Office, Guernsey,
October 9, 1846.

Sir,

In compliance with the request of the Royal Commissioners, to be furnished with the amount of fees received by me in virtue of my office of Greffier of the Royal Court, I beg to state, for their Honors' information, that those fees are derived from extracts of actes of Court and the registration of deeds, and that they have not collectively, for several years past, yielded, after the payment of the salaries of indispensable clerks, the sum of 150*l.* per annum.

On the subject of the salary paid to the Greffier by the Crown, I beg to be permitted to make the following observations: viz. that, in the year 1813, the sum of 40*l.* per annum was attached to his office as a compensation for the many duties he had then to perform in connection with the execution of the criminal law, and for which he received no fees. That, since that period, those duties have considerably increased. That the salaries formerly paid to the Procureur and Contrôle (which were likewise affixed to their offices in 1813) have since been doubled. That a salary of 50*l.* per annum has been granted to the Serjeant, an inferior officer of the Court who, until lately, received no allowance whatever from the Crown. That the salary of the Greffier has remained the same as in 1813. That the present Lieutenant Governor and his two predecessors, as well as the late Bailiffs Brock and Guille, fully convinced that the sum received by the Greffier was a very inadequate remuneration for the discharge of the duties appertaining to his office, have respectively made favourable representations to Government, in his behalf, for an augmentation of his salary, which have not as yet had the desired effect.

May I now, Sir, beg you will have the goodness, in justice to my claim for an increased salary, to represent my case favourably to the Royal Commissioners, in the hope they may be induced to recommend Her Majesty's Government to grant me such augmentation as may be deemed right and proper.

I have, &c.,

CHAS. LEFEBVRE,

Her Majesty's Greffier.

P. S. Carey, Esq.,

Bailiff of Guernsey.

---

SIR, Court House, Guernsey, May 9, 1839.

I HAVE the honour of enclosing and requesting your Excellency to transmit to Her Most Gracious Majesty in Council the humble petition of Charles Lefebvre, Esq.

The office of Greffier is one of the highest importance to the interests of the Crown, in this Island, and to those of the inhabitants generally. No office requires more attendance, assiduity and fidelity to its trust; and in none can these be more effectually exercised than they are by Mr. Lefebvre.

Without entering more fully into particulars, but confirming in every respect those stated by himself, I beg respectfully to express a hope that the reasons, which prompt me on public grounds to interest myself for Mr. Lefebvre, may equally plead with your Excellency in his favour, by adding your Excellency's recommendation to the prayer of the petition.

I have, &c.,

D. DE LISLE BROCK,

Bailiff of Guernsey.

[The Court then adjourned.]

GUERNSEY.

Paper of Col. De Havilland on the Constitution of the Royal Court.

[The Commissioners have thought it more convenient to print the following paper, received from Colonel De Havilland, which relates wholly to the constitution of the Royal Court, in this place, in connection with other documents relating to the same subject.]

The further Answers of Thomas De Havilland, Esq., Jurat of the Royal Court of Guernsey, to the first and second Questions of the first series of Questions proposed by the Commissioners.

1*st Question.*—From 1810 to 1814, when Sir Peter De Havilland was Bailiff, I assisted him in his forensic occupations. I have always taken an interest in the constitution and laws of the Island, my birth-place. In 1836, being elected constable of my parish, I served the office till 1842, when I was elected Jurat, and took my seat on the Bench accordingly.

2*nd Question.*—The Royal Court only has criminal jurisdiction in the Island. Its constitution is of Norman origin, about the time, or probably a few years before, the conquest of England by William Duke of Normandy. It takes cognizance and disposes of all criminal cases, save only three, viz., high treason, false coining, and laying hands injuriously on the Bailiff or the Jurats while in the discharge of their office. These three cases, however, are to be tried by the Royal Court; and, if the party should there be found guilty, the award of punishment is then reserved to the Crown.

The constitution of the Royal Court had existed unaltered for a long and uninterrupted period, when King John lost Normandy: and, as the Islands continued under the laws and customs of that province, notwithstanding it had been lost to England, considerable confusion ensued, chiefly in consequence of the itinerant justices sent triennially from England being strangers to that jurisdiction. Writs of quo waranto were issued, questioning the right of the Islands to that constitution, and commissions of inquiry appointed to investigate the subject, and to examine into numerous petitions of complaint which arose out of that confusion. The most remarkable, probably, were those of A. R. 32 Hen. III., of A. R. 17 Ed. II., and A. R. 5 Ed. III. But, nevertheless, the constitution, customs and privileges of the Island were confirmed, not only by these commissions, but expressly by the royal charters of the subsequent Kings and Queens of England, all these confirmations being founded on the approved fidelity of the inhabitants, their liege subjects, after the loss of Normandy.

A question, however, has arisen, whether, at the separation of Normandy from England, the Island brought with it, as it were, its own constitution, or whether that which it now enjoys was expressly conceded to it by King John, when he lost that Duchy.

There is a document, commonly called the Constitutions of King John, extant, bearing no date, however, and of doubtful origin, being neither an original nor an authenticated copy of one. Nevertheless on this paper, imperfect as it is, rests the question of our constitution. It is, I believe, more generally considered to be the actual grant of the constitution itself; but some persons, and I among them, view the document rather as merely containing a declaration of a constitution already of long standing. I should say, however, that, constitutionally speaking, the question is but of small import, the constitution of the Island being the same in either case; but historically it is of more importance, since in the one case the origin of our constitution must have been at the commencement of the 13th century, and in the other towards the middle of the 11th century, a difference probably of 143 years.

Referring, then, to this document, I shall observe that on the face of it it bears no semblance, in point of form or diction, to a royal grant or charter, and that it is not met with, quoted as such, in any of the inspeximuses, or in the inquisitions or extents, or in any of the charters, confirming the privileges of the Island, of subsequent sovereigns, Kings and Queens of England; but that, on the contrary, it appears to be nothing more than a collection of constitutional articles, given in the third person, some or all of which are to be found, from time to time, in our royal charters and the inspeximuses of subsequent sovereigns, and in the several inquisitions made or extents taken by royal commissions or mandates.

I would next remark that there is a letter from Hen. III., in the 32nd year of his reign, addressed to the Governor of the Islands, dated 11th September, 1248, which seems to throw much light on the subject. He states that he had before ordered an inquisition to be made, "de consuetudinibus et servitiis quæ Homines earumdem insularum facere consueverunt temporibus prædecessorum nostrorum, Regum Angliæ," but that the return he had received was "minùs sufficiens." I shall here observe that I consider the pretended Constitutions of King John to be nothing more than the return made to this first royal mandate, which return, containing 18 articles, begins, "Constituit duodecim coronatores juratos," &c. And then the King's letter goes on to say, "Vobis mandamus quod per tot quot expedire videritis, et tales qui melius sciant et velint dicere veritatem, inde distinctè et exquisitè faciatis inquisitionem; simul quas et cujusmodi leges Dominus Johannes Rex, pater noster, instituit in insulis prædictis," &c. Now, to this second mandate the return made was a much more extensive document, commonly known as the Extent or Inquest of Henry III., made the following year, 1249, a most valuable muniment, but making no mention of the "Constitutions of King John," or of the contents of the paper so called. Nevertheless it is believed that that paper might have accompanied this extent, as a schedule, though the extent contains no intimation to that effect; but at least the two documents are generally found together.

There is only one difficulty in the way to this conclusion, which is, that this schedule, if I may call it so, to distinguish it from the other, bears, in some copies of it, if not in all, this intitulation—"Constitutiones et provisiones, constitutæ per Dominum Johannem regem, postquam Normania alienata fuit." But I consider this intitulation to be an interpolation, which may have been induced by a wrong view of the latter part of the mandate, "leges Dominus Johannes Rex, pater noster, instituit." The "leges" here alluded to, however, seem by the Extent to have been nothing more than regulations regarding the ports, the fisheries, and the markets of the Island, possibly made by him when he held the Islands in appanage, as Count Mortain, or of Mortaigne, from his father, Hen. II., and afterwards from his brother, Rich. I. If Hen. III. had simply alluded to what his father might have done, while King of England, he would not have spoken of his predecessors, in the plural number—"prædecessorum nostrorum Regum Angliæ." He, on the contrary, it is very evident, wished to know the long established custom, the common law of the Island, under all his predecessors, Kings of England. And in this view the Precept of Assise in 1331 says, that we have enjoyed our privileges, "pleinement et paisiblement d'empuis le conquest d'Angleterre," and not, as it is pretended, only from the reign of King John. Indeed, it can scarcely be supposed that, if King John had made any such special grant to the Islands, his son, succeeding him immediately, could have been ignorant of it some thirty years after! I would likewise remark that, if King John, after the loss of Normandy, had made the supposed grant of a constitution, it would have been in the usual form of a charter, with a preamble exhibiting the motives which had led him to adopt the measure. But there is one circumstance besides, which, I should say, would not have been omitted, namely, that the jurisdiction of the Court of Exchequer at Rouen over these Islands was thenceforth transferred to the King in Council in England; for, however that might seem to be a matter of course, it must have been therein mentioned.

The view thus taken of the subject seems to be, moreover, historically confirmed, to the end that we have enjoyed our privileges since the Conquest. Robert Duke of Normandy, the Conqueror's father, intending a descent on England, was driven by stress of weather on this Island, in 1031 or 1032. He found, then, no constituted authorities, but only some monks who had been expelled from certain reformed convents in Normandy. While the Duke tarried here, he gave them lands in eleemosynary tenure, and repaired their castle of defence. These monks, about twenty nine years afterwards, applied to the Conqueror for deliverance from the pirates who were destroying them and their property; and it appears probable that even then, in 1061, there were yet no constituted authorities, in this Island at least. William accordingly sent troops to their rescue: and these, with the aid of the monks themselves, drove away the enemy. Now it was that the Island seemed to have been first noticed, to any good purpose, by the Duke. He divided half of it into two equal fiefs, one of which he gave to the officer who had commanded the troops sent there, and the other to the Abbot of the Mont St. Michel, in Normandy, both with feudal jurisdiction. But, as the other half of the Island would have remained unadministered to, it must have been necessary to have a third court erected, and which, in order to hold jurisdiction over the other two, was probably entitled a Royal Court, a common distinction given to Courts holding the superior jurisdiction in a province, district, or bailiwick having more than one Court*; and this would agree with the Précepte d'Assise, which dates our jurisdiction from the Conquest.

I may here further observe that, if King John had given us a new constitution, he would doubtless have referred to some pre-existent jurisdiction to be superseded, and would probably have assigned some reason for the change; but nothing of the kind appears in the document alluded to, nor is there, I believe, any tradition of a constitution and jurisdiction having ever existed in the Island different from the present form.

This may also be a fit place to remark, that a Royal Court, as a superior and independent Court (this one, quoàd the Bailiwick), had, by the custom of Normandy, and in France generally, ex officio, the right, power and privilege of making ordinances and regulations, which privilege our Royal Court has, in point of fact, exercised from time immemorial, as may be traced as far back as our records go, more than three centuries; it being well understood, however, that such ordinances or regulations are not to militate against any existing law or established custom of the country. These powers have also been confirmed to this Royal Court, in the most ample manner, by Queen Elizabeth, in her Council, under date 11th March, 1568. The order directs "That all grants and confirmations of privileges, from the Queen's Majesty and her progenitors, shall be always inviolably observed, maintained and kept in force, with the credit of the Bailif and Jurats, to be obeyed in all their ordinances, made and to be made, for the good government, surety and quietness of the said Isle; and that no officer or minister of justice be at any time hereafter resisted, impeached or imprisoned, for executing the sentences, ordinances and constitutions aforesaid, but maintained and assisted, according to the laws, usages and ancient customs of the Isle." I may here observe that this paragraph had probably immediate reference to the complaints then made against the Governor, for having imprisoned some of the constables for carrying into effect the ordinances of the Royal Court.

I would say a few words relatively to the Commission issued A. R. 17 Ed. II., alluded to above. This was given, in the last year of his reign (when the affairs of the Island were in utter confusion, in regard to its constitution, and the administration of justice generally), to Sir Henry Spigurnell, as president, with three associates justices; the object of which was, not only to look into the merits of some twenty or thirty petitions of complaint from the inhabitants, as well against the itinerant justices as against the Governor and his officers, but also to examine some of the processes and judgments delivered by the said justices from time to time, finally to confirm or to reverse them.

Now we find the result of that Commission to have been, as regards the laws and privileges of the Island, that these were set forth before the Commissioners, the counsel for the Crown being present, as well as the Bailif and other officers of Otto de Grandison, the Governor, who were then all called upon to declare to the Commissioners all they had to say against those laws and privileges; but, being unable to gainsay them in any way, the Commissioners finally declared: "That the aforesaid community (of the Island) shall in future be governed by the same liberties and customs, and that the said community shall use and enjoy the aforesaid customs and liberties, saving always the right of our Lord the King to order otherwise."

* Besides the several feudal Courts in the Island, the Court in Alderney and that in Sark hold of the Royal Court.

GUERNSEY.

Paper of Col. De Havilland on the Constitution of the Royal Court.

And, with respect to the inquiry into previous processes and judgments of former itinerant justices, the Commissioners declared that, "Because it appears that, as well in the aforesaid record and process as in the judgment passed, errors have evidently been committed, it is decreed that the aforesaid judgment shall be reversed as erroneous, and entirely annulled, and that the aforesaid community shall continue in the same state, as to its laws and customs, in which it was before that judgment was passed."

An exemplification of this last valuable document was prayed for by the the Royal Court, and obtained of Philip and Mary, A. R. 1 & 2. The occasion for this application was in 1554, when there were disputes between the then Governor, Leonard Chamberlain, and the Royal Court, and that, to the end of settling them, a Commission had been appointed, under the presidency of Sir Hugh Pawlet, with three others, and which last Commissioners drew the line between the authority of the Governor and that of the Royal Court. The above exemplification, in Latin, is still extant among the records of the Island.

Four years after Spigurnell's inquisition, another Commission, dated 8th February, 1331, issued to the justices itinerant then in the Island, to draw up an extent of the Crown revenues, and to make some general inquiry touching the customs of the Island, which they did, with the aid of thirteen sworn men of the Island, who declared their knowledge thereof.

But in the same year, without the authority of a royal commission, the itinerant justices (Sir Robert de Norton and Sir William De La Rue) instituted a more elaborate inquiry into the "liberties, usages and ancient customs, used, held and observed in the Island of Guernsey, in all times in which memory of man doth not go contrary," and set them down to serve as a "precept of assise," and caused them to be written in the vulgar tongue of the Island, to the end, doubtless, of their being better understood by His Majesty's liege subjects. This was effected through the declarations of twelve honest men of each parish, and the testimonies of other trustworthy persons, ancient and well informed residents in the Island, and in the presence of the Royal Court, and of six notaries and tabellions public resident in the Island; which proceedings were afterwards submitted to Sir Henry Spigurnell and his associates, and likewise to Sir Robert de Scarbourg and his companions, all justices itinerant, and by all of them approved. Moreover, I would observe that it is in this valuable and authentic document that it is found declared, as aforesaid, that these liberties, usages and ancient customs had been enjoyed fully and peaceably since the conquest of England, by the liege men, subjects and inhabitants of the Island and their predecessors, and had since been ratified and confirmed by all the Kings of England up to the date thereof, and maintained peaceably in all times, without any opposition or hindrance whatsoever.

Now the liberties, privileges and ancient customs, referred to in these two last documents, may be said to be virtually and substantially the same as those confirmed by Spigurnell's Commission, and as those contained in the document called the Constitutions of King John. Nevertheless, they are never therein declared, not even in the last of them, to have been derived from that Sovereign; neither is his name ever mentioned in any of them. And hence I have concluded that the pretended title, viz., in Latin, "Constitutiones et Provisiones constitutæ per Dominum Johannem regem postquam Normania alienata fuit," is an interpretation irreconcileable with the intent and meaning of the body of the document itself. And it cannot be doubted that, if King John had, when he lost Normandy, not given, but only confirmed those liberties and privileges, in a royal charter, much subsequent trouble and confusion would have been spared. They would thus have been better defined, and transmitted to posterity in a more perfect manner and form; the itinerant justices would have better known how to proceed; Spigurnell and his associates would not have been called to reverse and annul their processes; and the people would not have been so vexed and harshly dealt with, from time to time, as they were until the Precept of Assise brought about order and consistency in the administration of justice.

Inquisition of the 32 Hen. III., from the Records in the Tower of London.

Among the Records in the custody of the Master of the Rolls, pursuant to stat. 1 & 2 Vict. cap. 94, and preserved in the Tower of London, to wit, Inquisition of the 32nd year of the reign of King Henry the Third, No. 6, it is thus contained.

Henricus, Dei gratiâ Rex Angliæ, Dominus Hiberniæ, Dux Normanniæ Aquitaniæ, et Comes Andegaviæ, dilecto et fideli suo Drogoni de Barentyn, Custodi Insularum de Gereseye et Gernereye salutem. Quia, sicut satis didicimus, Inquisitio quam alias a vobis fieri fecimus de consuetudinibus et servitiis quæ homines earundem Insularum facere consueverunt temporibus prædecessorum nostrorum, Regum Angliæ, minus est sufficiens: vobis mandamus quod per tot quot expedire videritis et tales qui melius sciant et velint dicere veritatem [itera] tam inde distincte et exquisite faciatis Inquisitionem; simul et quas et cujusmodi leges dominus Johannes Rex, pater noster, instituit in Insulis prædictis. Et Inquisitionem illam sub sigillo vestro et sigillis eorum per quos facta fuerit nobis mittatis, et hoc breve. Teste me ipso apud Merleberge, undecimo die Septembris, anno regni nostri tricesimo secundo.

del, Radulphi Burnel, Gilberti Malcuvenant, Ricardi de Capella, Radulphi de Haverland, Petri Gross, Radulphi Corneilloc, Willielmi Rohe, Willielmi de Egrenteis, Willielmi Vivier de Curia, Oliveri de Valle Gerardi, Willielmi Gocelin, Ricardi Herichie, Willielmi de Nigro Monte, Willielmi La Lowe, Ricardi Monachi de Castro, Jordani de Hamello, Willielmi Vivier Alii, Radulphi Paisant, Ricardi Bele, Ricardi Gube, Radulphi Thurstam, et Radulphi Pesant. Qui dicunt quòd medietas Insulæ de Gernereye est domini Regis et Militum et aliorum qui de eo tenent in Capite, alia medietas partita est inter Abbatem Sancti Michaelis de Periculo Maris et Robertum de Ver. Quarterium verò, quod Robertus de Ver tenet, vocatur terra comitis. Dicunt etiam quòd omnes qui tenent bovatas terræ rusticatas debent campipartum per annum de omnibus seminibus quæ renovant, exceptis capitalibus mesuagiis unde bladum donant, scilicet, duodecimam garbam, et eundem campipartum in propriis carettis cariare ad manerium domini Regis, et super tassos levare; et baillivi domini Regis debent blada tassare per regardum consuetum, scilicet, de qualibet bovata terræ unum Turonensem, absque culturis quæ dant campipartum. Sed non dant denarium de regardo predicto ad bladum tassandum. Et, cum per eosdem homines campipartum fuerit collectum cariatum et adunatum in manerio domini Regis, quilibet collectorum dicti bladi debet habere de dono domini Regis unum prandium et novem Turonenses, et debent denarii illi solvi de pannagio. Et si forte carettæ eorum fuerint fractæ non debent inde occasionari. Ex proprio suo debent tassos cooperire, et manerium custodire quousque clausum fuerit, et postquam clausum fuerit: Debent avenam pro custodia manerii, et ulteriùs inde non debent occasionari. Item debent de quâlibet domo duas gallinas. De porcis suis debent pannagium, scilicet, de quolibet porco qui habet ferulam furcatam, unum Turonensem, ad diem quo pannagium denunciatum et in foro clamatum fuerit; et nisi pannagium solverint antequam sol occubuerit porcum suum perdent, et dabunt quinque solidos Turonenses. Et, cum placuerit domino Regi vel baillivo suo blada sua triturare, ad placitum suum capient unum hominem ad grangiam gernarium et bateriam custodiendum, et habebit quolibet die unam arieatam straminis de viginti quinque garbis, et manducabit cum domino Rege diebus dominicis et duplicibus festis. Item debent melagium, scilicet, de quâlibet bovatâ terræ unum bussellum et duas denariatas frumenti, cum uno rescusso, ad parvum bussellum, et per rescussum illum rasum est bladum. Item, si placuerit domino Regi mittere bladum suum in Normanniam, scilicet, inter Montem Sancti Michaelis et Cesarisburgum et non alibi, navem et rectorem navis inveniet tempore pacis, et prædicti homines ad custum proprium invenient marinellos alios per quindecim dies, et, si ultra quindecim dies moram fecerint, erunt ad custum domini Regis; et ipsi marinelli habebunt excessivum navis de eodem blado. Item dicti homines debent cooperire septem molendina domini Regis de propriâ cooperturâ et latâ, et reficere et relevare maiseras molendinorum, et exclusas et ductus curare et reparare, molas ducere, et meremium cariare ad molendina reparanda: et baillivus domini Regis magnum meremium et molas inveniet cum ferris molendinorum. Eodem modo debent facere de grangiâ cum opus fuerit. Debent etiam in dictis molendinis bladum suum quietè molere per sextum decimum granum. Et, si molendina remaneant in manu domini Regis, ita quòd ad firmam non ponantur, prædicti homines tenenturi exitus molendinorum custodire ad custum proprium; et possunt et debent custodes illi remover de quindenâ in quindenam. Item in eâdem Insulâ sunt sex carucatæ terræ, quarum Prior Sancti Leufridi tenet tres carucatas, Willielmus Roheis unam carucatam, et in feodo de Aunevill sunt duæ carucatæ; quæ debent et solent, ad turnum suum, et secundum tenuras, prisones custodire: et possunt et debent prisones replegiari, nihil dando baillivo, nisi capti sint per harellam, vel pro feloniâ, sive pro pace infractâ, sive pro alio forisfacto contra coronam domini Regis. Sed tempore illo castella non fuerunt in Insulis. Item debent reddere per annum de bancâ et hogâ viginti solidos et novem denarios Turonenses. Sed modò decadunt inde singulis annis duo denarii de quadam domo quæ sita fuit in cimiterio, quam Episcopus prosternere fecit pro orduris in ea factis. Item dicunt quòd tempore domini Philippi de Albiniaco finem fecerunt cum eo pro brasio faciendo per quinquaginta solidos Turonenses per annum, et vocatur redditus ille Frocage; sed de redditu illo decadunt singulis annis tres solidi de feodo de Aunevill, quod dominus Rex dedit domino Willielmo de Chesneto. Item debent de Marisco de Orguill et de Hoga Geraldi viginti solidos Turonenses, et de feodo Faieti duodecim Turonenses, in festo Sancti Michaelis. Item homines totius Insulæ communiter debent singulis annis, sicuti pro auxilio, sexaginta et decem libras Turonenses: et per illas septuaginta libras quieti esse debent, et temporibus regum quieti esse consueverunt, de omnibus exercitibus tailliagiis, greveriis, et aliis occasionibus, nisi tantummodò quòd ibunt cum corpore ducis Normanniæ, si necesse fuerit, ad Angliam recuperandam. Item dicunt quòd omnes totius Insulæ homines consueverunt tempore pacis ferre in Normanniam, vel alibi, ad placitum suum, omnes denariatas suas vivas et mortuas, tam de mari quam de terrâ, ad vendendum, exceptis congris in tempore espelcationis, nihil inde dando; et potuerunt et consueverunt de jure, absque occasione, ire et redire per quemcumque portum voluissent in prædictâ Insulâ. Sed postquam Normannia alienata fuit, ex præcepto bonæ memoriæ domini Johannis Regis aliter provisum et constitutum fuit, sicut posteà monstratum erit. Tempus espelcationis durare debet singulis annis à Paschâ usque ad Festum Sancti Michaelis. Fiderunt etiam quando Espelkiatores mercatores et piscatores in unum non fuissent ad piscem vendendum vel emendum ad justum forum, quòd tunc electi essent duo piscatores fide digni ex unâ societate, et duo alii ex aliâ societate, ad piscem aliorum super fidem et sacramentum juste appretiandum. Hæc verò appretiatio facta fuit tempore domini Johannis Regis, tali verò modo quòd quidam ex quibusdam piscatoribus appretiabunt ad invicem piscem aliorum. Dicunt quòd piscatores possunt custodire congros suos per unam monteam vel unam retractam donec appretietur. Debent insuper communiter per Insulas quolibet tertio anno quamdam consuetudinem dare, et vocatur fumagium. Item dicunt quòd tempore Regis Henrici, patris Regis Johannis, Radulphus de Walemunt tenuit assisas in Insulis, et terras tunc vastas feofavit, et ad redditum assedit, scilicet, singulis annis pro triginta solidis Turonensibus. Dicunt insuper, super fidem et sacramentum, si concessum est prædictis piscatoribus ire et redire cum piscibus et aliis denariatis suis per quemcumque portum voluerint, absque licentiâ et visu, quod dominus Rex, et omnes sui, maxima dampna singulis annis incurrent,—Insulæ quasi perditæ erunt,—Portus nihil valebunt,—Spelkeria omnino deperibit,—Libertates domini Regis minorabuntur,—Terræ inimicorum suorum meliorabuntur, et de bonis Insularum sustentabuntur,—et sic Insulæ et terræ domini Regis de omnibus bonis vastæ et vacuæ remanebunt.

Constitutiones et provisiones constitutæ per dominum Johannem Regem, postquam Normannia alienata fuit.

Imprimis instituit duodecim Coronatores Juratos ad placita et jura spectantia ad coronam custodienda. Constituit etiam et concessit, pro securitate Insularum, quòd Baillivus de cætero per visum dictorum Coronatorum poterit placitare, absque brevi, de novâ disseisinâ factâ infra annum; de morte antecessoris infra annum; de dote similiter infra annum; de feodo invadiato semper; de incumbramento maritagii. Et, pro tuitione et salvatione Insularum et castrorum, et maximè quia Insulæ propè sunt et juxta potestatem Regis Franciæ et aliorum inimicorum suorum, constituit et præcepit quòd omnes portus Insularum bene custodirentur; et custodes portuum constituisse præcepit, ne dampna sibi et suis evenissent. Insuper constitutum fuit quòd omnis navis extranea, quæ non fuisset de potestate suâ, et in Insulis applicâsset, daret de consuetudine unam marcam argenti. Sed post decessum domini Johannis Regis, ad petitionem domini Philippi de Albiniaco, dominus Rex Henricus, filius domini Johannis Regis inde relaxavit dimidiam marcam. Constitutum similiter fuit quòd omne batellum dictæ Insulæ portans piscem flotantem in Normanniam pro quolibet turno daret duodecim solidos; sed ad petitionem dicti Philippi medietas relaxata est per eundem dominum Henricum Regem. Eodem tempore salicio congrorum constituta fuit inter Festum Sancti Michaelis et Pascham; quam baillivi domini Regis posuerunt ad firmam, sicut Espelcationem; et salicio primò facta fuit et constituta pro piscatoribus qui piscem detulerunt inimicis domini Regis. Eodem tempore constitutum est quòd omnes mercatores de rebus, porcis, fileto, et aliis emptionibus suis, consuetudines dent de omnibus denariatis suis: sed gentes Insulæ de propriis nutrimentis quietæ sint. Item constitutum fuit et provisum, pro sustamento et proficuo castrorum et munitionis domini Regis et totius gentis Insulæ, quòd omnes piscatores per tres dies singulis septimanis convenissent in patriâ ad vendendum piscem suum, videlicet, omnibus diebus Martis, diebus Jovis et diebus Sabbati.*

* The above documents are the "letter and extent or inquest," mentioned by Col. De Havilland. They consist of a writ directing an inquest, and the return to it. The whole of the latter document is written on one skin of parchment; and, in the opinion of Mr. Hardy, the learned antiquary to whose immediate custody it is committed, is incomplete, another membrane long since lost having probably been at one time annexed to it. This may account for the absence of the other articles of the Constitutions contained in the copy printed in the Appendix to Falle's History of Jersey. See Appendix to the First Report, p. 72.

Gernereye—Dominus Rex assignavit Henricum Spigurnel et Willielmum de Denom Justiciarios suos ad quædam Recorda et processus recitanda, et errores in eis corrigendos, et ad inquirendum de terris et tenementis, homagiis, servitiis, advocationibus, wrecco maris, warrennis, chaciis, custumis, esparkariis et aliis libertatibus usurpatis et detentis, et de subtractionibus libertatum et jurium domini Regis, per breve suum patens, in hæc verba.

Edwardus, Dei gratia, Rex Angliæ, Dominus Hiberniæ et Dux Aquitaniæ, dilectis et fidelibus suis Henrico Spigurnel, Magistro Henrico de Clif, Johanne de Ifeld, et Willielmo de Denum, salutem. Sciatis quòd cum nuper, dato nobis intelligi quòd diversæ terræ et tenementa, cum homagiis et servitiis, advocationibus ecclesiarum et capellarum, eschaetis, wreccis maris, warrennis, chaciis, custumis makerellorum, esparkeriarum, coungrorum, et aliis libertatibus diversis, quæ ad nos pertinent, et de jure pertinere debent, in insulis nostris de Gernereye, Jereseye, Serk et Aureneye, per quosdam homines et habitatores insularum prædictarum, religiosos, et alios, tam tempore domini Regis Henrici avi Regis nostri, quam tempore domini Edwardi Regis patris nostri, et nostro, usurpata fuerunt indebitè et detenta, et aliæ diversæ subtractiones libertatum et jurium nostrorum in partibus illis, ac purpresturæ similiter factæ fuerunt ibidem, in nostrum præjudicium et exhæredationem nostram manifestam: indempnitati nostræ prospicere volentes, assignaverimus Johannem de Fresingfeld, Willielmum Russel, Johannem de Dittone, et duos eorum, ad inquirendum per sacramentum proborum et legalium hominum insularum prædictarum, per quos rei veritas melius sciri posset, de hujusmodi terris et tenementis, homagiis, servitiis, advocationibus, wreccis maris, warennis, chaciis, custumis, esparkeriis, et aliis libertatibus sic usurpatis et detentis, ac etiam de subtractionibus libertatum et jurium nostrorum prædictorum, et purpresturis prædictis, pleniùs veritatem; et per quem, vel per quos, et à quo tempore, et qualiter, et quo modo; et ad omnia sic usurpata, detenta, et subtracta, ad statum debitum revocanda. Ac postmodum ex querelâ quorumdam Insulanorum insularum prædictarum, et per petitionem suam coram nobis et consilio nostro in parliamento nostro exhibitam, accipientes quòd in recordis et processibus coram præfatis Justiciariis nostris super præmissis habitis, quæ coram nobis certis de causis venire fecimus, errores intervenerunt manifesti; ita quod, si prædicta recorda et processus executioni demandarentur, in ipsorum Insulanorum exhæredationem cederent manifestè: Et quòd quidam ballivi et ministri insularum prædictarum, per dilectum et fidelem nostrum Ottonem de Grandisono Custodem insularum earumdem, in ipsis insulis deputati, injurias, transgressiones, extortiones, oppressiones, dampnaque diversa, voluntariè et absque causâ rationabili eis multipliciter intulerunt, in ipsorum Insulanorum depressionem et depauperationem manifestam; ac volentes errores, si qui in dictis processibus intervenissent, modo debito corrigi, et eisdem Insulanis de injuriis, transgressionibus, oppressionibus, extorsionibus et dampnis prædictis, fieri justiciæ complementum, assignaverimus dilectos et fideles nostros Johannem de Stonore, Willielmum de Bourne, Nicholaum de Cheny, et Johannem de Carteret, tres et duos eorum, Justiciarios nostros ad recorda et processus prædicta, quæ eis misimus sub pede sigilli nostri, recitanda, et errores, si qui intervenissent in eisdem, corrigendos, necnon ad inquirendum, per sacramentum proborum et legalium hominum insularum prædictarum, de injuriis, transgressionibus, extorsionibus, oppressionibus et dampnis, in petitionibus Insulanorum prædictorum contentis, quas similiter eis misimus sub pede dicti sigilli, pleniùs veritatem; necnon ad querelas omnium et singulorum de ballivis et ministris prædictis, de toto tempore quo dictus Otto custodiam ipsarum insularum habuit, conqueri volentium, audiendas et terminandas, et partibus inde celerem justiciam faciendam secundum legem et consuetudinem insularum prædictarum. Postmodùm vero, dato nobis intelligi quòd prædicti Willielmus, Nicolaus, et Johannes Carteret, formam commissionis nostræ prædictæ eis factæ excedentes, diversa maneria, terras et tenementa nostra, in dictis insulis, quibusdam Insulanis earumdem insularum ea petentibus adjudicaverant, et, quòd tam in recordis et processibus coram eis habitis quam in redditione judiciorum eorumdem, diversi et intollerabiles errores intervenerant, in nostri exhæredationem et præjudicium, et ipsius Ottonis ac diversorum aliorum grave dampnum: volentes indempnitati nostræ prospicere, et errores illos, si qui essent, modo debito corrigi et emendari, eadem recorda et processus, cum omnibus ea tangentibus, unà cum recordis et processibus, petitionibus, et aliis quæ præfato Willielmo priùs transmisimus, venire fecimus coram nobis; quibus coram nobis in curiâ nostrâ recitatis et diligenter examinatis, et aliquibus de judiciis illis contra nos redditis modo debito adnullatis, et aliquibus emendatis, quibusdam verò, tam præfatum Ottonem quam quosdam ministros suos tangentibus, propter difficultates aliquas, non valentibus extra insulas prædictas commodè terminari: Nos, volentes errores prædictos, qui nondum coram nobis emendati fuerunt, modo debito corrigi et emendari, ac tam pro nobis quam pro præfato Ottone, necnon pro Insulanis prædictis, de injuriis, transgressionibus, oppressionibus, extorsionibus et dampnis hujusmodi conqueri volentibus, fieri justiciæ complementum, assignavimus vos, tres et duos vestrûm, Justitiarios nostros ad recorda et processus prædicta, quæ vobis mittimus sub pede sigilli nostri, recitanda, et errores, si qui in eisdem intervenerint, corrigendos, necnon ad inquirendum per sacramentum proborum et legalium hominum insularum prædictarum, per quos rei veritas melius sciri poterit, de hujusmodi terris et tenementis, homagiis, servitiis, advocationibus, wreccis maris, warennis, chaciis, custumis, esparkariis et aliis libertatibus sic usurpatis et detentis, ac etiam de subtractionibus libertatum et jurium nostrorum prædictorum, et purpresturis, quæ in dictis recordis et processibus non continentur, pleniùs veritatem, et per quem, vel per quos, et a quo tempore, et qualiter, et quo modo; et ad omnia sic usurpata detenta et subtracta ad statum debitum revocanda; et ad querelas omnium et singulorum de ballivis et ministris prædictis de toto tempore quo dictus Otto custodiam insularum predictarum habuit, conqueri volentium, de quibus justicia antea facta non fuit, audiendas et determinandas, et partibus inde celerem justiciam faciendam, secundum legem et consuetudinem insularum prædictarum. Et ideo vobis mandamus quòd ad certos dies et loca, quos vos, tres vel duo vestrûm infra insulas prædictas ad hoc provideritis, præmissa omnia et singula faciatis et expleatis in formâ prædictâ, facturi inde quod ad Justiciarios pertinet secundum legem et consuetudinem insularum prædictarum, salvis nobis amerciamentis et aliis ad nos inde spectantibus. Mandavimus enim Custodi nostro insularum prædictarum, qui nunc est, vel qui pro tempore fuerit, vel ejus locum tenenti, quòd ad certos dies et loca, quos vos, tres vel duo vestrûm infra, insulas prædictas ei scire faciatis, venire faciat coram vobis, tribus aut duobus vestrûm, tot et tales probos et legales homines de insulis prædictis, per quos rei veritas in præmissis melius sciri poterit et inquiri, necnon omnes illos, quos prædicta negotia contingunt et per quos præmissa meliùs poterunt expediri. In cujus rei testimonium has literas nostras fieri fecimus patentes. Teste me ipso apud Cowyk xxix die Julii anno regni nostri decimo septimo.

Prætereà dominus Rex mandavit præfatis Justitiariis hic recordum et processus coram Willielmo de Bourne et sociis suis, nuper Justitiariis domini Regis, in eisdem insulis habita, unà cum brevibus, petitionibus et aliis ea tangentibus, sub pede sigilli, in formâ quæ subsequitur.

Cum nuper Communitas insulæ de Gernereye coram domino Rege et ejus consilio diversas petitiones, tam de erroribus coram Justitiariis domini Regis ibidem missis contra leges ejusdem Communitatis et consuetudines factis, quam de transgressionibus, gravaminibus, extorsionibus et dampnis multimodis, per ministros domini Othonis de Grandissono tenentis insulas prædictas, ut dicitur, ad terminum vitæ suæ, eidem Communitati multipliciter illatis, secuta fuisset, ut sibi de prædictis erroribus aliisque gravaminibus remedium fieret oportunum: ac dominus Rex, ad eorum petitiones, Willielmum de Bourne, Nicholaum de Cheigne, et Johannem de Carteret, Justitiarios ibidem mittendos præcepisset, coram quibus prædictæ Communitatis homines venerunt, et dictum est eis per Justitiarios prædictos quòd prædicta errores et gravamina coram eis assignarent, ac etiam pro dictâ Communitate declararent. Et ipsi per quosdam servientes dicunt quòd ipsi et omnes antecessores eorum, Insulani insulæ prædictæ, de lege et eorum consuetudine à tempore quo non extat memoria usitatis, habere consueverunt duodecim Juratos de se ipsis, qui eligi debent per ministros domini Regis et optimates patriæ, cum opus fuerit, scilicet, post mortem unius eorum, alter fidedignus loco ejus eligi debet. Similiter si quis eorum convictus fuerit à casu falsitatis loco sui debet alter substitui. Et debent ipsi duodecim jurare sine conditione, sed tantummodo ad manutenendum et salvandum jura domini Regis et patriotarum. Et ipsi duodecim debent judicare de omibus causis, placitis, contentionibus, transgressionibus, feloniis et aliis quibuscunque factis vicinis et extraneis, exceptis tamen casibus nimis arduis, videlicet, de injectione manuum in servientes et ministros domini Regis, more debito officium suum exercentes, et de hiis qui à fidelitate domini Regis tanquam proditores recedunt. Et ipsi duodecim Jurati debent emendas omnium præmissorum, prædictis arduis exceptis, taxare. Et, cum Justitiarii per præceptum domini Regis ad assisas capiendas vel quæcunque placita Itineris vel quæcunque alia placita audienda et terminanda ibidem venerint, debent ipsi duodecim Jurati eis associari, quamvis dictorum Justitiariorum commissio inde non faciat mentionem, ut de eorum consuetudinibus Justitiarii prædicti certiorentur; cum quibus iidem duodecim Jurati debent de omnibus prædictis judicare. Et, si dominus Rex velit certiorari de recordo placiti coram Justitiariis et ipsis Juratis agitati, Justitiarii unà cum illis duodecim debent recordum illud facere. Et de agitatis coram Ballivo et ipsis Juratis, habent ipsi recordum conjunctim, sicuti solent ab antiquo. Et quòd nullus de libero tenemento suo, quod per annum et diem pacifice tenuit, sine brevi domini Regis de Cancellariâ, tenetur respondere, et de tenemento et tenente expressam faciente mentionem. Et quòd nullum placitum infrà insulam prædictam coram quibuscunque Justitiariis agitatum vel inceptum debet extrà insulas prædictas terminari seu ajornari, sed ibidem, secundum legem eorum et consuetudinem, terminari. Et quòd residentes in insulâ prædictâ plegios de prosequendo querelas suas non tenentur invenire, nisi sint extranei in insulâ prædictâ non habentes unde possent, si necesse foret, pro emendis domini Regis distringi. Et quòd amerciamenta coram præfatis Justitiariis emergentia debent ipsi Justitiarii, per consilium et assensum dictorum Juratorum, et unà cum ipsis Juratis, qui qualitatem personarum et quantitatem delicti noverunt, taxare. Et quòd Præpositus domini Regis per prædictam Communitatem ad officium præposituræ dictæ insulæ eligi debet. Et quòd tenentes domini Regis debent invenire dicto domino Regi unum Grangiarium quolibet anno, qui eligi debet per semetipsos et per Ballivum patriæ et Juratos. Et quòd nullus debet arrestari pro altero extraneo, nisi sit vadius et plegius ejus, vel quòd ipse tres querimonias modo debito gesserit loco ejusdem alicui: et nisi idem dictas querimonias rite portaverit quartâ vice: si contingat eum ad patriam accedere, debet ipse pro prædicto extraneo arrestari ad respondendum querenti. Et quòd nulli felones aliquid forisfaciant præter sua bona propria de quibus possessionem habent tempore et die quibus pro delictis suis puniuntur. Et quòd nullus dampnatus extra insulas pro feloniâ vel aliâ causâ nihil in insulis hæredibus suis forisfacere potest. Et si aliquis forisfacit et adjuret insulas, et postea dominus Rex ex suâ gratiâ ei pacem suam concedat infra annum et diem abjurationis suæ, et idem revertatur ad insulas, de hæreditate suâ plenariè restituetur, de quâ plenariè seisitus fuit tempore suæ adjurationis. Et quòd nullus, ratione debiti domini Regis vel aliorum, tam graviter distringatur, quin medietas terræ suæ de quâ ipse cum familia sua vivere possit, ei tamen remaneat. Et quòd namia debent poni in locis ydoneis, ita quod illi quorum namia sunt possint eis dare ad manducandum et bibendum, et debent observari penes bordarios pro debito domini Regis. Et quòd animalia quæ dant lac pro alimento puerorum, et bestiæ ad colendam terram, capi non debent in districtione, tamdiu quam alia namia inveniantur. Et quòd nulla inquisitio, quæ in dictis insulis vulgariter Harela nuncupatur, debet fieri nisi in assisis, quæ debent esse de triennio in triennium, nisi solummodò ad sectam partium. Et quòd nullus debet retardari de suo debito ob domini Regis debitum, ubi offert solvere certum debitum redditûs dicti domini Regis pro habendo bona debitoris, neque similiter aliquis aliorum dominorum debet retardare debitum alterius nisi sit propter debitum proprii sui redditûs. Et quòd nullus debet poni in gehenam, sed debet deduci secundum consuetudinem et delicti qualitatem. Et quòd Ballivus qui tenet Curiam domini Regis, vel Præpositus qui debet colligere emendas seu amerciamenta Curiæ, non debet emolumenta hujusmodi amerciamentorum emere, ne aliquis hâc occasione prægravetur. Et quòd bussellus melagii domini Regis non debet continere pretio quinque denerellos absque excussiâ, et debet idem bussellus excuti pro perficiendo defectum quem grangiarius debet adimplere, et debet idem habere residuum. Et quòd nullus custumarius quærat custumas de navibus per mare circa insulas transeuntibus, nisi sint ad ancoras suas positæ. Et quòd naves, quæ custumas suas solverunt, cujuscunque regni extiterint, et sint de pace domini Regis Angliæ, applicatæ in ancoradio domini Regis ejusdem insulæ super ancoras suas, et ibidem casu fortuito se impejoraverint, possint ad terram domini Regis in dictis insulis pro se ipsis reparandis libere et absque calumpniâ applicare. Et, si aliquis implacitatus fuerit in Curiâ domini Regis, vel aliorum dominorum, ab aliquo actore, et idem implacitatus tractatus sit ad emendam propter hoc, eâ die non debet ire sine responsione nec suæ malitiæ commodum reportare. Et quòd illi qui clamant Harou, vel clamari faciunt, debent illud Judicibus domini Regis nunciare, et etiam apportare, et ipsi Judices secundum conquestum vel clamorem debent procedere, et non ultra, nisi sit in casu criminali. Et si illi, qui audiunt dictum clamorem de Harou, ad dictos Judices non apportaverint, propter hoc in aliquo gravamine non debent permanere, quomodocunque aliquo tempore usum fuerit. Et quòd namia capta pro debito, cujuscunque conditionis existat, morari debent per novem dies super feodum gentilium hominum, si capti sint ibidem, et postea debent per tres dies Sabbati continuos duci ad mercatum pro vendendo; debent illi quibus namia sunt ad hoc ad quemlibet dierum Sabbati sufficienter summoniri, et ad quartum diem Sabbati curret per summonitionem venditio namiorum, computato tamen uno die Sabbati infra novem dies supradictos. Et quòd emendæ Curiæ domini Regis non debent duplicari, nisi in itinere Justitiariorum vel assisarum. Et quòd nullus debet imprisonari in Castro, nisi per respectum Juratorum, et pro casu criminali vitam vel membrum tangenti, set in aliis liberis prisonibus ad hoc antiquitùs deputatis, videlicet, feodis de la Refraerie, des Roeys, et de Gaseans. Et quòd debitores patriotæ se debent acquietare versus dominum Regem, et alios dominos suos, ad talem monetam qualis currit in Ducatu Normaniæ: et propter hoc debent solvere quemdam redditum domino Regi de triennio in triennium, qui in partibus illis fumagium seu monetagium nuncupatur. Et quòd dominus Rex non debet habere neque levare majus pretium de frumentis suis redditûs, quam secundum taxationem quæ facta fuerit per Juratos in Curiâ domini Regis insulæ memoratæ. Et quòd quilibet patriota debet quietus esse versus dominum Regem de omnimodo guerræ exercitu, et equitatu, et eydagio, et de omnimodo talliagio, nisi solummodò si corpus domini Regis, quod absit, in prisonâ detinetur, nec debet exire extra patriam pro nullimodis placitis; et propter hoc debent ipsi patriotæ dicto domino Regi quemdam annuum redditum qui vocatur auxilium domini Regis. Et quòd campipartes domini Regis ad grangiam duci et apportari debent, pro tenendo locum communi populo, qui ad victum suum et bestiarum suarum de bladis et foragiis hujusmodi pro denariis suis emunt; nec debet aliquis compelli ad emendum campipartem suam, nec de campipartando blada sua, dum tempus affuerit, ullo modo per maliciam debet retardari. Et quòd quædam obligationes, quæ in partibus illis regales literæ appellantur, nullius valoris debent esse alicui, nisi solummodò gentibus alienis, et hoc in lege mercatoriâ absque hæreditagio: et si virtute earumdem literarum alicui tenementa seu hæreditagia soluta fuerint vel liberata, clamat Communitas quod ea sint in statum pristinum revocata ad prosecutionem eorum qui super hiis conqueri voluerint, secundum legem et consuetudinem insulæ supradictæ. Et quòd nullus in castro imprisonari debet virtute literarum prædictarum. Et quòd Clericus Curiæ domini Regis non debet amerciamenta sive emendas colligere, sed Præpositus qui electus est per patriæ communitatem. Et quòd nullus Custos insularum prædictarum, Ballivus, Receptor, vel curiæ regis Clericus, debet esse communis tabernarius seu mercator. Et quòd atabernatores debent poni ad afforandum seu attabernandum vina et cervisiam per respectum Juratorum. Et mensuræ et pondera liberari debent alicui seu aliquibus fidedignis per respectum Juratorum et Ballivi. Et quòd firmarii molendinorum de multurâ suâ aliquem calumpniari non debent, nisi de anno et die quibus dicta molendina tenuerunt. Et quòd terræ communs Communitatis, quæ dicitur communia domini Regis, quæ ad redditum jam nuper traditæ fuerunt in præjudicium domini Regis, ad dampnum populi manifestum, et contra consuetudinem, sint ad statum pristinum revocatæ; quia prædictus dominus Rex non debet aliquod habere in eisdem, nisi solummodò emendas suas inde assisas, sed semper debent esse communes, prout dominus Rex eas antiquitùs condonavit. Et quòd vendentes pisces in Quadragesimâ, et aliis temporibus, in tribus certis locis ab antiquo consuetis eos vendant, et non alibi, et ibi morentur usque ad certam horam ab antiquo consuetam, donec qui voluerint emere super eo habeant ad usus suos sufficientiam, et maximè tempore Quadragesimæ quod si aliter fecerint graviter per amendas puniantur. Et quòd quilibet tempore siccariæ, quæ durat a festo Paschæ usque ad festum Sancti Michaelis, pisces potest sumere ad usum suum pro dietâ virides vel siccos in dictis esperkeriis vel de piscatoribus ad forum mercatorum. Et quòd, si aliqui capti fuerint pro cuniculis domini Regis, vel accusati, sunt audiendi ad eorum purgationem, si hoc petant, et in crastino (? castro) domini Regis ob hoc non debent imprisonari. Et quòd non licet alicui verecum adunare ante ortum solis, nec post ejus occasum, propter provenientia ad verecum domini Regis fidelius observanda. Et quòd non licet alicui Receptori extractas amerciamentorum erga se recipere de amerciamentis curiæ domini Regis, nisi in eisdem extractis causa sufficiens se (? sit) contenta. Et Johannes de Fresingfield et socii sui, Justiciarii itinerantes domini Regis, sine brevi domini Regis de cancellariâ, per breve suum proprium plures de Communitate ad breve quo waranto de liberis tenementis suis, quæ à tempore quo non extat memoria pacificè tenuerunt, coegerunt ad respondendum, et de consuetudinibus suis prædictam Communitatem extra eandem insulam in Angliam contra consuetudinem suam ajornaverunt, et quamplurimos insulanos in castro, sine assensu Juratorum, contra consuetudinem suam absque rationabili causâ imprisonari fecerunt, et fere omnes habitatores insulæ ad graves emendas, sive potiùs redemptiones, sine rationabili causâ, seu assensu Juratorum, contra eorum consuetudinem et (? in) oppressionem totius populi amerciaverunt, et quemdam Robertum le Gay, eorum Servientem, rationes eorum et prædictæ Communitatis consuetudines allegantem, in prisonam mitti præceperunt, et ibidem diù detineri fecerunt, et eidem Communitati multa alia injustè et contra eorum legem et consuetudinem intulerunt. Quare petit prædicta Communitas super hiis sibi remedium fieri secundum legem et consuetudinem insulæ supradictæ. Item queritur prædicta Communitas quia, cum novæ ordinationes vel statuta in terrâ domini Regis sine ipso domino Rege vel ejus consilio fieri non debeant, quidam Petrus Le Petitfe, Philippus Leveske, Robertus de Haddy, Willielmus Lengignour, Willielmus Le Petit, et alii ministri domini Othonis de Grandisono, postquam idem Otho insulas istas ad terminum vitæ ex concessione domini Regis habuit, ut dicitur, quoddam sigillum, simile privato sigillo domini Regis, fieri fecerunt, ipsum nominando Sigillum Ballivæ, per cujus testimonium multi homines Regis ibidem pluribus creditoribus in diversis debitis se obligârunt, et cùm, termino statuto, de prædictis debitis, non satisfecissen, prædicti ministri semper hucusque eos per eorum corpora attachiari et in castro domini Regis imprisonari fecerunt, per quod multas hæreditates suas vendiderunt, et hæredes suos inde exhæreditaverunt, in magnum præjudicium totius Communitatis prædictæ, et contra eorum legem et consuetudinem. Quare petit prædicta Communitas inde remedium &c. Et, eâdem die Jovis prædictâ, quidam Thomas de Estfeld duodecim rotulos prædicti Johannis de Fresingfeld sociorumque ejus, simul cum decem et octo petitionibus sive cedulis, eisdem Willielmo et Nicholao sub pede sigilli domini Regis liberavit, in præsentiâ duodecim Juratorum Regis, videlicet, Johannis de Vivario, Johannis Le Moigne, Henrici de Wik, Henrici de Waugerard, Radulphi Tulley, Petri la Cornaille, Ricardi Bernard, Petri Bernard, Michaelis Lescuruel, Nicholai Burnel, Nicholai Blundel, et Willielmi Gros et aliorum quamplurimorum. Quarum quidem petitionum sive cedularum octo de prædictis erroribus et gravaminibus faciebant mentionem; et petiit idem Thomas prædictæ Communitati in hâc parte fieri remedium, secundum legem &c. Et tunc prædicti Justiciarii quæsierunt a prædictâ Communitate qualiter prædictas consuetudines verificare velint, quas habere debeant; quæ Communitas dicit—per recordum Juratorum domini Regis prædictorum, qui recordum habent in hâc parte. Quæsitum est a Juratis, in eorum pericula, ita quòd Rex per eos non exhæredetur, si in prædictis recordari debeant quòd prædicta Communitas prædictas consuetudines et libertates, ut de jure suo, habere debeant, et si antecessores sui seisiti de eisdem, à tempore quo non extat memoria, extiterint. Qui dicunt super sacramentum suum quòd in prædictis, per consuetudinem partium illarum, in prædictis recordari debent; et similiter dicunt quòd prædicta Communitas habere debet prædictas consuetudines, et quòd antecessores et prædecessores sui semper hactenûs habere consueverunt, quousque prædicti Johannes et socii sui illas coram eis disallocaverunt. Requisitum est à Lucâ Espiard, Serviente domini Regis ibidem per literas domini Regis patentes, et a Petro Le Marchant, Ballivo, et aliis ministris domini Othonis ibidem, si quid habeant vel dicere sciant pro domino Rege, vel ipso Otone, quare prædicta Communitas prædictas consuetudines et libertates, secundum quod petit, habere non debeat: qui petunt pro domino Rege quòd de jure ipsius domini Regis et ipsius Communitatis in hâc parte inquiratur. Per quod in favorem statûs domini Regis præceptum est Ballivo quòd venire faciat hic duodecim liberos et legitimos homines de nobilioribus partium istarum, per quos rei veritas meliùs sciri poterit et inquiri. Qui quidem summoniti et jurati, de consensu prædictorum Lucæ et Petri, videlicet, Johannes Hervy, Johannes Charles, Nicholaus Leveske, Johannes le Provost, Johannes la Corneille, Radulphus Le Moigne, Johannes le Gay, Radulphus Cokerel, Petrus de Rokere, Gilbertus Lorfevere, Ricardus de Mara, Ricardus Peysant, dicunt super sacramentum suum quòd prædicta Communitas omnes consuetudines et libertates prædictas, ut de jure suo, habere debet, et ipsi et eorum antecessores ac prædecessores, a tempore quo non extat memoria, habere consueverunt, quousque Johannes de Fresingfeld &c, et ministri Otonis de Grandisono &c, absque hoc quòd ipsi in aliquo illa forisfecissent. Quæsitum est à Petro Le Marchant et Lucâ Espiard, et aliis ministris dictorum Domini Regis et Otonis si quid pro ipso domino Rege vel ipso Otone habeant vel dicere sciant quare prædicta Communitas prædictas libertates et consuetudines habere non debeant: qui nichil dicunt. Ideò consideratum est per Justiciarios et Juratos, secundum legem et consuetudinem patriæ, quòd prædicta Communitas per prædictas libertates et consuetudines de cætero deducatur, et quòd dicta Communitas uti et gaudere debeat prædictis consuetudinibus et libertatibus, salvo jure domini Regis si aliàs inde loqui voluerit &c. Pretextu cujus mandati præceptum fuit Ballivo de Guernereye quod scire faciat prædictæ Communitati, per duos liberos et legales homines de ballivâ suâ, quod esset hic ad hunc diem, videlicet, diem Jovis in crastino Sancti Mathei Apostoli, ostensura si quid pro se habeat vel dicere sciat quare prædicti Justiciarii hic ad recordum et processus prædicta recitanda et examinanda, et errores, si qui ineisdem intervenerunt, corrigendos, procedere non debeant &c. Quæ quidem Communitas modo venit, et in plenâ Curiâ, in præsentiâ ejusdem Communitatis, prædictis recordis et processu lectis auditis et intellectis, eadem nichil dicit &c. Et Johannes de Ditton, qui sequitur pro domino Rege, dicit quòd in recordis et processu prædictis erratum est in hoc, videlicet, quòd, cum Dominus Rex nunc per litteras suas patentes assignavit prædictum Willielmum de Burne et socios suos ad recorda et processus coram Johanne de Fresingfield et sociis suis &c, nuper Justiciariis hic, habitâ, et præfato Willielmo et sociis suis sub pede sigilli missa, recitanda, et errores, si qui in eisdem intervenissent, corrigendos, recordum et processus habita coram præfato Johanne de Fresingfield et sociis suis &c, de legibus et consuetudinibus hominum istius Insulæ, coram eis petentium et clamantium libertates et consuetudines suas, super recordo et processu prædictis non reddebatur judicium, nec per præfatum Willielmum de Burne et socios suos fuit revocatum; et licet in eâdem commissione contineatur quòd prædictus Willielmus de Burne et socii sui per sacramentum proborum et legalium hominum insularum prædictarum inquirerent de injuriis, oppressionibus, transgressionibus, gravaminibus et dampnis, in petitionibus Insulanorum de Gernereye contentis, et eis sub pede dicti sigilli missis, et predicta audirent et terminarent, virtute commissionis prædictæ habuerunt potestatem tantum de contentis in prædictis petitionibus justitiam conquerentibus facere, si per aliquem eis in prædictis esset injuriatum contra leges et consuetudines partium illarum, et non de legibus, consuetudinibus et libertatibus prædictis, ac si essent in placito Quo Warranto, cognoscere et terminare; et sic excesserunt formam commissionis suæ quando processerunt, ad demonstrationem et petitionem Communitatis prædictæ, ad inquirendum per sacramentum hominum Communitatis prædictæ, et ad judicium inde reddendum, ubi dominus Rex fuit pars, sicut patet in recordo prædicto, de libertatibus legibus et consuetudinibus, quas eadem Communitas petiit à domino Rege, ut illas quas ipsi et antecessores sui hucusque habuerunt. Unde petit pro domino Rege quòd prædicta processus et recordum examinentur et corrigantur, et judicium inde redditum, tanquam erroneum, revocetur et adnulletur. Dicit etiam quod erratum est similiter in hoc quòd prædicti Willielmus et socii &c., Justiciarii, processerunt ad inquirendum et judicium inde reddendum de prædictis legibus, consuetudinibus et libertatibus, domino Rege inconsulto, cum forsitan prædictus dominus Rex, tam per recordum rotulorum Justiciariorum suorum, quam per recordum rotulorum Justiciariorum domini Regis, quondam Regis Angliæ, patris sui, ac aliorum progenitorum suorum, verificare poterit contrarium quamplurimorum articulorum, legum, libertatum et consuetudinum in prædicto recordo contentorum; et quòd ipse paratus est hoc verificare pro domino Rege per recordum rotulorum Justiciariorum domini Regis et progenitorum suorum; dicit enim quòd in redditione prædicti judicii salvatur jus domini Regis, cum indè loqui voluerit. Petit quòd Justiciarii super hoc habeant avisamentum in præmissis, pro jure domini Regis, cum ipse sit in præmissis paratus jus suum ostendere et verificare maximè, si prædictum Judicium staret in suo robore, cederet in præjudicium domini Regis, sicut plenius patet in recordo prædicto. Et quia tam in recordo et processu prædictis, quam in redditione judicii, errores intervenerunt manifesti, Consideratum est quòd prædictum judicium tanquam erroneum revocetur et penitûs adnulleter, et quòd prædicta Communitas sit in eodem statu, quoad leges et consuetudines suas, in quo fuit ante redditionem judicii prædicti.

(adhuc in alio rotulo de eadem materia)

Placita de Juratis et Assisis ac de Quo Waranto coram Justiciariis itinerantibus in Insula Jerseye. A°. 17, Ed. 2.

(M. 22.)

Ordinationes et Præcepta prædictorum Henrici Spigurnel et Willielmi de Denoum, Justitiariorum Itinerantium in Insulâ de Jerseye, pro utilitate hominum Insulæ prædictæ, quæ decetero in singulis articulis firmiter observari et teneri præcipiuntur.

Ordinationes et præcepta Henrici Spigurnel et Willielmi Denoum, Justiciariorum, &c.

Ordinatum est per Justitiarios et præceptum quod placita catallorum debitorum et transgressionum teneantur de octavâ in octavam. Placita vero de hæreditate, de quindenâ in quindenam. Et judicia reddantur ad placita cujuslibet quindenæ, si Jurati septem fuerint præsentes et concordes: et si forte singulis quindenis non fuerint præsentes in Curiâ septem Jurati concordes, reddantur judicia quolibet mense ad minus; nisi fuerit aliquod negotium ita arduum quòd alii Jurati meritò fuerint evocandi ad judicium super eo proferendum. Quòd vero arduum negotium debeat reputari, ad Ballivi arbitrium, qui pro tempore fuerit, erit recurrendum. Et si Jurati judicia differre præsumpserint, quo minûs temporibus reddantur suprascriptis, per Ballivum Regis, qui pro tempore fuerit, ad hoc compellantur, captis pignoribus et pœnâ indictâ.

Item ordinatum est et præceptum quòd, si placitum fuerit inter partes, ubi probatio spectat seu intervenit secundum consuetudinem Insulæ, et probatio illa facta fuerit per testes ad hoc inductos in præsentiâ partium, quòd pars adversa contra hujusmodi testes non audiatur seu admittatur aliquid dicere seu proponere, per quod judicium differatur.

Item quòd nullus præsumat occupare vicos publicos, nec aliquid in eis ponere, vel facere, quo minùs vici publici sint ad usum singulorum, prout ad usum omnium et singulorum fuerunt et sunt deputati. Et si quis contrafecerit, tociens quociens contravenerit, puniatur.

Item quòd vici publici mundentur et mundi teneantur. Et, si quis contrafecerit, tociens quociens contravenerit, puniatur.

Item quòd jurent advocati quod nullam causam fovebunt, nisi quam justam et bonam crediderint, et quòd fidele patrocinium clientibus suis præstabunt. Et quòd per frivolas exceptiones seu cavillationes lites non prorogabunt. Et, si quis contrafecerit, ad arbitrium Ballivi et Juratorum puniatur. Prædictum vero juramentum singulis annis in primâ Curiâ post festum sancti Michaelis renovetur.

Item ordinatum est et præceptum quòd omnes molendinarii capiant mulcturam debitam et consuetam, et hoc per mensuram consignatam, in præsentiâ et visu illorum quorum blada sunt, seu nomine eorum deferentium, et hoc in areâ molendini. Et quòd decetero non capiatur farinagium. Et qui contra præmissa deliquerint, graviter puniantur si ad hoc sufficiant, sin autem respondeant domini illorum aut superiores. Et fiant hujusmodi emendæ coram Ballivo et Juratis in Curiâ domini Regis tociens quociens necesse fuerit.

Præcepta et ordinationes Henrici Spigurnel, &c.

Item ordinatum est et præceptum quòd nullus ponat wreccum maris in rivulis aquæ dulcis ad inficiendum prædictas aquas, quæ ad usus hominum deserviunt, nisi tantum in rivulis mari contiguis.

Item quòd tabernarii, qui exponunt venditioni unum dolium boni vini vel pipam ad certum pretium, et postmodùm, cum vendiderint medietatem tertiam quartam vel aliam quamvis partem, immiscent aliud vinum malum, vel alium liquorem, et ad idem pretium vendunt, sub colore bonitatis quam vinum primo habuit quando fuit expositum venditioni, graviter puniantur. Et tociens quociens idem commiserint similiter puniantur. Similiter de Bolongariis.

Est etiam ordinatum et præceptum quòd visores et tastatores vini, cervisiæ, ciseræ, et aliorum liquorum venalium videant et gustent de quolibet dolio quod venditur in tabernâ semel antequam venditioni exponatur, et aliâ vice cum fuerit venditum pro mediâ parte vel circiter, et tertiâ vice in fine vel circa finem venditionis cujuslibet dolii. Et, si quid immixtum fuerit inventum, per quod vinum vel liquor venalis fuerit deterioratum, venditor graviter puniatur.

Item quòd nullus quærat garbagium tempore quo dominus Rex campertitat seu campertat, nec etiam post, nisi custodes ecclesiarum vel leprosi. Et, si qui contrafecerint, per Ballivum et Juratos puniantur.

Item quòd officium portitorum seu bermannorum committatur alicui bono viro qui Regi et populo possit respondere, si dampnum aliquod per eorum culpam acciderit. Et quod juxta arbitrium sex bonorum virorum de villâ Sancti Petri in portu per Ballivum et Juratos ad hoc eligendorum, satisfactio fiat pro labore ipsorum, consideratis laboris quantitate et loci distantiâ et aliis quæ equitate suadente fuerint consideranda.

Item quòd nullus exerceat officium corretarii, nisi per Ballivum cum consilio Juratorum ad hoc fuerit admissus, et quòd juret quòd nichil faciet seu fieri procurabit, quod vertatur in præjudicium seu dampnum Regis, populi Insulæ, vel aliorum negotiantium. Et quòd nullus recipiatur tanquam socius in mercimoniis, in hanuris consuetis adductis, tempore makerellorum, vel aliàs, nisi tantum habeat in bonis unde possit solvere mercimonium. Et, si qui contravenerint, ad arbitrium Ballivi et Juratorum puniantur.

Item ordinatum est et præceptum quòd omnes, qui terras et tenementa tenent per bordagium, habeant super singulis bordagiis, quæ per prædictum servicium tenentur, capitalem quandam mansionem in loco ad hoc consueto, infra tres menses à tempore præsentis ordinationis pupplicatæ computandos, in quâ quidem mansione moretur et semper possit inveniri aliquis masculus qui mandata Ballivorum recipiat et exequatur: alioquin ipsa tenementa capiantur extunc in manum Regis, qui ea possit assignare aliquibus qui prædictas faciant mansiones, et mandata exequantur ballivorum.

Item sit in Insulâ Sigillum quoddam Regis ad contractus et conventiones, prout est hactenùs usitatum, et non apponatur alicui instrumento nisi per testimonium ad minus duorum Juratorum Regis.

Item ordinatum est et præceptum quòd citati vel adjornati qui non comparuerint in judicio infra primam, possint tunc poni in defectu et tanquam contumaces puniri.

Item ordinatum est et præceptum quòd carnifices vel alii non fundant coprum suum seu pinguedinem infra villas, et si quis contrafecerit puniatur.

Item, quia multa mala et incomoda temporibus retroactis hominibus istius Insulæ multipliciter evenerunt, et indies evenire poterunt, de mensuris, tam signatis quam non signatis, ad emendum et vendendum falsis et insufficientibus, prout in Itineribus hic pleniùs convictum est, ordinatum est et præceptum quòd decetero sigillum, pro mensuris deputatum, committatur per Ballivum domini Regis et Juratos alicui viro discreto et fideli custodiendum: ita quòd nulla mensura decetero prædicto sigillo signetur, nisi per prædictum Ballivum et duos Juratos ad minus priùs examinetur, et deinde in eorum præsentiâ sigilletur.

Omnes autem prædictæ ordinationes singulis annis ad placita capitalia domini Regis tenta ante festum sancti Michaelis in pupplico recitentur, et in præsentiâ Juratorum et Ballivi, ut in singulis suis articulis pleniùs observentur.

Placita coram Roberto de Scardeburgh, &c., Justiciariis, &c., anno quinto Edw. III.

Placita apud Sanctum Petrum de Portu in Insulâ de Gernereye, coram Roberto de Scardeburgh, Roberto de Norton, et Ricardo de Westcote, Justiciariis domini Regis Itinerantibus in Insulâ de Gernereye, Jeresey, Serk, et Aureneye, die Sabbati proximo post festum translationis Sancti Thomæ Martiris, anno regni Regis Edwardi tercii à conquestu quinto.

Gernereye.—Communitas ejusdem Insulæ summonita fuit ad respondendum domino Regi de placito quo waranto clama habere duodecim Juratos de se ipsis, qui eligi debent per ministros domini Regis et per se ipsos, cum opus fuerit, scilicet, post mortem unius eorum alter fidedignus loco ejus eligi debeat. Et similiter quòd, si quis eorum de aliquâ falsitate convictus fuerit, quòd per eorum electionem loco sui debeat alter substitui et jurare sine conditione tamen ad manutenendum et salvandum jura domini Regis, patriotarum, &c. Et etiam quòd ipsi duodecim jurati debeant judicare de omnibus causis, placitis, et feloniis factis vicinis, extraneis, et aliis quibuscunque, et quòd emendæ omnium præmissorum per ipsos duodecim taxari debeant. Et quòd ipsi Jurati, Justiciariis per commissionem domini Regis ad assisas capiendas vel quæcunque alia placita hîc audienda et terminanda assignatis, clamant eis associari ad judicia reddenda. Et quòd, si dominus Rex de aliquo recordo vel processu coram hujusmodi Justiciariis hic placitatis voluerit certiorari, quòd ipsi duodecim, unà cum Justiciariis, recordum illud facere debeant. Et quòd nullus de libero tenemento suo, quod per annum et diem pacificè tenuerit, sine brevi domini Regis de cancellariâ respondere debeat. Et quòd nullum placitum infra insulam prædictam, coram aliquibus Justiciariis, incœptum, debeat extra insulam prædictam adjornari, sed ibidem omnino terminari. Et quòd amerciamenta qualiacunque, ob aliquorum defectus emergentia, seu fines propter aliquorum transgressiones, debeant per ipsos duodecim taxari. Et quòd nullus pro feloniâ dampnatus, extra insulam factâ, hæreditates infra insulam forisfacere possit, quin hæredes sui eas habeant, &c. Et quòd, si aliquis forisfecerit, et abjuraverit Insulam, et postea dominus Rex pacem suam ei concesserit infra unum annum et unum diem abjurationis suæ, et revertatur ad insulam, de hæreditate suâ plenariè debet restitui. Et quòd quieti esse debeant de omnimodis tallagiis, auxiliis et contributionibus quibuscunque. Et quòd nullus ibidem debeat imprisonari in castro, nisi in casu criminali vitam vel membrum tangenti, et hoc per assensum et judicium prædictorum Juratorum. Et quòd dominus Rex nullum Præpositum ibidem habere debeat, nisi per eorum electionem. Et quòd dominus Rex nullum Grangiarium ibidem habere debeat, nisi per eorum electionem. Et quòd nullus debeat de suo debito levando retardari propter debitum domini Regis &c. Et quòd dominus Rex amerciamenta et servitia sua levare non debeat, nisi per Præpositum per eos ad hoc electum. Et quòd non debeant coram Justiciariis domini Regis ad assisas capiendas assignatis respondere, antequam transcripta commissionum earumdem sub sigillis suis eis liberentur &c. Et quòd Justiciarii, per commissionem domini Regis ad assisas capiendas hic assignati, non debent placita hic tenere ultra spatium trium septimanarum, et quòd ipsi coram eis nisi per tempus supradictum venire (? non) tenentur, &c. Et quòd ipsi non tenentur domino Regi homagium facere, quousque ipse dominus Rex ad partes istas venerit, &c.

Et Communitas venit, et, quoad prædictas libertates de habendo duodecim Juratos de se ipsis, et quòd omnia placita, quæcunque fuerint, debeant hic terminari et non alibi adjornari &c, dicit quòd ipsi et omnes antecessores sui, à tempore quo non extat memoria, inde seisiti fuerunt sine temporis interruptione, &c. Et, quoad omnes alias libertates, petunt quòd ipsi adinvicem possunt habere colloquium et avisamentum. Et super hoc dies datus est prædictæ Communitati apud Lungeville, in Insulâ de Jereseye, die Mercurii proximo post festum Sancti Petri quod dicitur ad Vincula, ad audiendum inde judicium suum, &c. Ad quem diem venit Robertus de Hoo qui sequitur pro domino Rege. Et prædicta Communitas non venit. Ideo consideratum est quòd omnes prædictæ libertates in manu domini Regis capiantur, &c.

" Item quot et quæ maneria terras redditus vel alias tenuras quascunque dominus Rex habeat per eschaetam, et a quo, et quid et quantum valeant per annum in omnibus exitibus.

" Item de feodis domini Regis, servitiis et custumis quibuscunque domino Regi debitis de terris quorumcumque, distinctè et apertè.

" Item de advocationibus ecclesiarum ad regem spectantibus et eorum valore.

" Item de custumis et prisis quibuscunque domino Regi debitis in portu vel in mari, distinctè et apertè, et quid valeant per annum in omnibus exitibus.

" Item de warecco maris post ultimas assisas, et quid et quantum inde acciderit, et ad quorum manus devenerit, et cujus pretii ad verum valorem catallorum illorum.

" Item si quis illorum inde celaverit vel asportaverit sine bono varanto et cujus pretii.

" Item de illis qui ante ultimas assisas aliquid asportaverunt de hujusmodi warecco quod domino Regi nondum fuerit emendatum.

" Item de bestiis de veif, et valore earumdem, et ad cujus manus devenerunt.

" Item de fugantibus in terrâ domini Regis, vel cuniculos suos capientibus, sine speciali licentiâ Ministrorum potestatem habentium hujusmodi licentiam concedendi.

" Item de piscantibus contra statuta domini Regis et contra debitas consuetudines hactenùs usitatas, et quo modo, et quantum ceperint, et quotiens, et cujus pretii.

" Item de furantibus retia, piscem, vel alia bona aliorum in portu vel in mari.

Placita coronæ coram Roberto de Scardeburgh, &c.

(M. 2 d.)

—"Scardeburgh."

Parochia Sancti Sampsonis venit per undecim juratores.

Iidem juratores præsentant quoad articulum de veteribus placitis Coronæ, &c., nihil sciunt. De novis autem, quæ emerserunt post ultimas assisas, &c., præsentant quòd malefactores ignoti accesserunt ad domum ecclesiæ Sancti Sampsonis contra pacem, et ibidem fregerunt ostia, et furtivè ceperunt vina ibidem inventa, quæ fuerunt Guillielmi Wautier, et deinde usque in portu Sancti Sampsonis recesserunt, et ibidem furtivè ceperunt quandam navem cum batello quæ erant Johannis Brian de Britanniâ et abduxerunt. Nescitur qui fuerunt, nec quò devenerunt, nec de eorum catallis, terris seu tenementis, si quæ habeant. Et quia hoc evenit de die et parochia prædicta non cepit malefactores. Ideo ad judicium, &c.

* * * * *

Item, quoad articulum de custumis domini Regis, præsentant quod dominus Rex percipit de custumâ de quolibet milleario makerellorum piscatorum viginti denarios Turonenses, et de quolibet centeno congrorum viginti solidos Turonenses, et de quolibet batello, exeunte extra regnum cum piscibus vendendis, duos solidos Turonenses, et de quolibet bacone quatuor denarios Turonenses, et de porco vivo duos denarios Turonenses, et de porcâ vivâ pregnante vel non duos denarios Turonenses, et de quolibet bove, vel vaccâ eunte extra regnum, duodecim denarios Turonenses, et de quolibet multone, bidente vel agno, unum denarium Turonensem et de centeno cepi vel auxung quatuor denarios Turonenses, et de centeno pellium bidentum vel multonum quatuor denarios Turonenses, quotiens scilicet dictæ marcandisæ extra Insulas portentur, exceptis animalibus in separali pasturâ per annum et diem nutritis, et tunc per sacramentum deliberentur ei cui &c. Et juratores testantur quòd nihil inde aretro est domino Regi, &c.

(M. 3.)

—"Scardeburgh."

Parochia Sancti Petri in bosco venit per undecim juratores.

Iidem juratores præsentant quòd de veteribus placitis Coronæ &c., nichil sciunt. De novis autem quæ emerserunt post ultimas assisas &c., dicunt quòd Johannes Broard, filius Michaelis Broard, mense Marcii, anno regni domini Regis nunc quarto, felonicè furatus fuit in eâdem parochiâ quamdam peciam ferri quæ fuit mercatoribus de Britanniâ, pretii iiij$^{s}$ Turonensium. Et quòd idem Johannes Broard, die Mercuriiproximo post Octabas Sancti Hillarii, anno regni dicti Regis nunc tercio, in parochiâ prædictâ felonicè furatus fuit unum multonem Roberti de Poyson, pretii v$^{s}$ Turonensium. Et quòd idem Johannes, die et anno prædictis, felonicè furatus fuit quinque solidos Turonenses de denariis Petri Blundel in parochiâ Sancti Salvatoris. Et quòd idem Johannes, anno regni ejusdem domini Regis nunc tercio, felonicè furatus fuit unum multonem Roberti Aleyn in parochiâ Sancti Petri de Bosco. Et quòd Johannes Baraban de parochiâ Sancti Salvatoris, die Mercurii proximo post festum Pentecostes, anno regni domini Regis nunc tercio, felonicè furatus fuit in parochiâ Sancti Petri de Bosco unum multonem dictum Wayf, pretii quinque solidorum Turonensium, et pro eo quòd [furatus est?] xx garbas ordei de garbis Willielmi Roger, in parochiâ Salvatoris, mense Augusti, anno regni dicti Regis nunc quarto, pretii iij$^{s}$ Turonensium. Et quòd idem Johannes Baraban felonicè furatus fuit xiij garbas ordei de garbis Willielmi True, pretii iij$^{s}$ Turonensium. Et quòd Orenga Dangok, mense Augusti, anno regni ejusdem Domini Regis nunc quarto, felonicè furata fuit in eâdem parochiâ xij garbas fabarum, de garbis Roberti Dangaroys, pretii iij$^{s}$ Turonensium. Et quòd eadem Orenga felonicè furata fuit duas gallinas Roberti de la Hoget, in eâdem parochiâ, pretii viij$^{d}$ Turonensium. Et quòd Johannes Ryvel de eâdem parochiâ Sancti Petri, felonicè furatus fuit quinque panes Petri Martel, pretii ij$^{s}$ Turonensium, die Mercurii proximo post festum Nativitatis Domini, anno regni domini Regis nunc quarto. Et manentes sunt in Insulâ. Ideo capiantur. Postea venerunt prædicti Johannes Broard, Johannes Baraban, Orenga Dangok et Johannes Ryvel, et per Justiciarios singillatim allocuti, qualiter se velint de feloniis sibi impositis acquietare, dicunt singillatim quòd in nullo sunt inde culpabiles, et de bono et malo ponunt se super patriam. Et Juratores dicunt, super sacramentum suum, quòd prædicti Johannes Broard, Johannes Baraban, Orenga Dangok et Johannes Ryvel in nullo sunt culpabiles de feloniis prædictis sibi impositis. Ideo ipsi inde quieti. Non subtraxerunt se.

Radulphus le Carpenter, de parochiâ prædictâ, captus fuit pro suspectione latrocinii de multonibus et aliis malefactis, et liberatus in custodiam Johannis de la Marche tunc Vicecomitis. Ideo respondeat idem Johannes quò devenit. Et non est aliquis qui respondet pro prædicto Johanne quò prædictus Radulphus devenit nec compertum est per rotulos Coronatoris quòd prædictus Radulphus obiit in prisonâ. Ideo ad judicium de evasione ipsius Radulphi, super ipsum Johannem. Et postquam sic evasit, fugit. Et malecreditur. Ideo exigatur et utlagetur.

(M. 3. d.)

Adhuc de parochiâ Sancti Petri in bosco.

Johannes Fellot captus fuit pro suspectione cujusdam vaccæ Guyonis Nichol de parochiâ Sancti Salvatoris felonicè furatæ, et liberatus fuit in custodiam Johannis de la Marche, tunc Vicecomitis. Ideo respondeat idem Johannes quò devenit. Et non est aliquis qui respondet pro prædicto Johanne quò prædictus Johannes Felot devenit nec compertum est per rotulos coronatoris quòd prædictus Johannes Felot obiit in prisonâ. Ideo ad judicium, de evasione ipsius Johannis Felot, super ipsum Johannem de la Marche. Et, postquam sic evasit, fugit. Et malecreditur. Ideo exigatur et utlagetur.

GUERNSEY.

Placita coronæ coram Roberto de Scardeburgh, &c.

De defalcatione etiam dicunt quod Abbas de Monte Sancti Michaelis, Avicia de Vy de parochiâ de Tortevale, non venerunt coram justiciariis primo die Itineris. Ideo ipsi in misericordiâ.

* * * * *

(M. 4.)

—" Scardeburgh."

Parochia Sancti Martini de Bellosâ venit per undecim juratores.

* * * * *

Præsentant etiam de retonsoribus lanarum, &c., quòd Coletta Morell felonicè tonsavit lanas de bidentibus Ricardi Larcher et aliorum de parochiâ, ad valenciam vj$^{d}$, et manens est in Insulâ. Ideo capiatur, &c. Postea testatur quod prædicta Coletta non est inventa, sed subtraxit se. Et malecreditur. Ideo exigatur et wavietur. Catalla ejus nulla.

Item, quoad articulum de Harow, præsentant quòd Matheus Gros et Thomas Gros, clerici, verberaverunt Matheum de la Bonneye contra pacem, &c. Et, postea summoneri fecerunt prædictum Matheum de la Bonneye ad Curiam Christianitatis de placitis unde cognitio spectabat ad curiam regiam, &c., contra coronam, &c. Ideo ipsi in misericordiâ, &c.

De infortuniis, &c. præsentant etiam quòd, anno regni domini Edwardi, patris domini Regis nunc, decimo nono, quidam Guillielmus Godfrey et Guillimota filia ejus ascenderunt supra quandam collem in parochiâ istâ, et turbine venti aquilonaris, pedibus suis cespitantibus, ceciderunt, ita quòd dirrupti fuerunt, et obierunt. Nullus inde malecreditur. Judicium infortunii.

* * * * *

(M. 5. d.)

—" Scardeburgh."

Parochia Sanctæ Trinitatis de Forestâ venit per decem juratores.

* * * * *

De purpresturis, &c., præsentant quòd Jordanus Discart obturavit quendam fontem in parochiâ istâ, qui solebat esse communis omnibus ibidem haurire volentibus, ad nocumentum patriæ. Ideo præceptum est Vicecomiti quòd deobstruere faciat fontem prædictum, ad custagia ipsius Jordani, et redigere in statu quo priùs. Ideo Jordanus in misericordiâ quia non prius, &c.

Iidem juratores præsentant, quoad articulum de Harow, quòd Robertus Levesque et Nicholaus Roger levavit clameum de Harow contra consuetudinem Insulæ. Ideo ipsi in misericordia, &c.

* * * * *

Parochia Beatæ Mariæ de Castro venit per undecim juratores.

* * * * *

De vagantibus ad tabernas nocturno tempore, &c., dicunt quòd Johannes de Sancto Georgio solitus est ducere homines ad tabernas causis fictis, et, ipsos ibidem cum habuerit fecit eos dispendere contra eorum voluntatem, vigore, &c. Ideo in misericordiâ, &c.

* * * * *

(M. 6.)

—" Scardeburgh."

Parochia Sancti Salvatoris venit per decem juratores.

Juratores presentant quòd de veteribus placitis coronæ nichil sciunt. De novis autem præsentant quòd quidam Radulphus de Herriche et Johannes de la Roche in parochiâ istâ contenderunt ad invicem, ita quòd prædictus Radulphus percussit prædictum Johannem cum quodam cultello in corpore, ita quòd inde obiit; et manens est in Insulâ. Ideo capiatur. Postea testatum est per Vicecomitem quòd prædictus Radulphus non est inventus. Ideò exigatur et utlagetur.

Thomas le Manyan, de parochiâ Sancti Petri de bosco, qui aliàs pro diversis feloniis quas fecerat suspensus fuit, jam sex annis elapsis, tempore Guillielmi de Sub Monte tunc Ballivi, habuit terram quæ valet per annum x$^{s}$ iij$^{d}$ Turonenses unius anni, et vastum j marcam Turonensem. Ideo respondeat idem Henricus de pretio terræ prædictæ per medium tempus lx$^{s}$ xviij$^{d}$. Et, quia terra prædicta non tenetur de alio medio nisi domino Rege in capite, prout &c, ideo remaneat domino Regi tanquam escaeta &c, et Custos insulæ prædictæ, qui pro tempore fuerit, oneretur de valore terræ prædictæ singulis annis &c. Postea testatum est quòd idem Thomas habuit catalla ad valenciam lv$^{s}$ Turonensium, quæ domino Regi debent esse forisfacta, quæ Guillielmus de Submonte nuper Receptor &c occupavit. Ideo idem Guillielmus inde oneretur &c.

* * * * *

De vendentibus vinum &c, dicunt quòd Nicholaus le Taverner, Nicholaus Bloundel, Perinus Bloundel, Guyonus Nichol, Ricardus le Torver, Willielmus Chousyn, Perinus Nichol, Perinus le Marchant, et Philippus Counketerre vendiderunt vina contra assisam &c. Ideo ipsi in misericordiâ &c.

GUERNSEY.

Placita coronæ coram Roberto de Scardeburgh, &c.

De Bolongariis &c, dicunt quòd Johannes de Pastys, Philippus le Pestoure, Guillotus Bele, Coletta la Valaise, Johannes le Deen, Johannes Henr', Radulphus Lucette sunt Bolongarii in parochiâ istâ. Ideo ipsi in misericordiâ.

* * * *

De indictatis etiam dicunt quòd Coletta de la Valeise, anno regni domini Regis quarto, felonicè furata fuit in parochiâ istâ quandam patellam et quinque vellera lanæ et unam supertunicam de burello, quæ fuerunt Peroto Payn in parochiâ istâ. Et quòd Guillotus, filius Guilloti Bele, circiter festum Nativitatis Domini, anno regni domini Regis nunc quarto, felonicè furatus fuit in domo Ricardi Teffayn unam camisiam et unam zonam et asportavit. Et quòd idem Guillotus Bele felonicè furatus fuit sex bidentes in parochiâ istâ, quæ fuerunt Petri David. Et quòd Johannes Pyk et Andreas Prous, anno regni domini Regis nunc primo, felonicè furati fuerunt, duas pipas vini, unum ciphum argenteum, et unam fururam pro capitio, quæ fuerunt Guionis Nichol in parochiâ istâ, et asportaverunt. Et quòd Thomas Bele felonicè deprædatus fuit sex garbas bladi de Guillielmo le Feroun, in parochiâ istâ, pretii xij$^{d}$ Turonensium. Et quòd Johannes le Mere furatus fuit quadraginta ceras de lino, pretii iiij$^{s}$ Turonensium, quæ fuerunt Guillemotæ la Chyvalere in parochiâ istâ. Et quod Guillemotus La Mieresse furatus fuit unam supertunicam pretii viij$^{s}$ Turonensium in parochiâ istâ, quæ fuit Jouettæ, filiæ Johannis Dudoyt. Et quòd Johannes de Kenys de parochiâ Sancti Petri de bosco furatus fuit in parochiâ istâ unam arcam, pretii x librarum Turonensium, et asportavit. Et manentes sunt in Insulâ. Ideo capiantur. Postea venerunt prædicti Coletta de la Valeise, Guillotus, filius Guilloti Bele, Thomas Bele, Johannes le Mere et Guillemot la Meresse, et, per Justiciarios singillatim allocuti, qualiter se velint de feloniis prædictis sibi impositis acquietare, dicunt singillatim quòd in nullo sunt culpabiles de feloniis prædictis, et de bono et malo ponunt se super patriam. Et Juratores dicunt, super sacramentum suum, quòd prædicti Coletta, Guillotus, Thomas, Johannes, et Guillmotus, in nullo sunt culpabiles de feloniis prædictis sibi impositis. Ideo ipsi inde quieti. Non sub-traxerunt se &c. Postea Juratores testantur quòd prædicti Guillotus Bele, Johannes Pyk, et Andreas et Johannes de Kenys non sunt inventi in Insulis prædictis, sed subtraxerunt se pro maleficiis prædictis. Et malecreduntur. Ideo exigantur et utlagentur. Nulla habuerunt catalla terras seu tenementa.

* * * *

(M. 7.)

— "Scardeburgh."

Parochia de la Vale venit per tresdecem juratores.

* * * *

Johannes Poindestre et Johannes Fylot, clerici, Johannes Horibel, Petrus Columbel, et Robertus le Jolyvet, fregerunt domum Johannis Bequerel noctanter in parochiâ istâ, et ipsum ibidem verberaverunt et vulneraverunt, et uxorem ipsius Johannis Bequerel, cum bonis et catallis suis, videlicet, pannis lineis et laneis, ceperunt et abduxerunt.

Postea testatum est quòd prædicti clerici capti fuerunt et liberati Ordinario loci. Ideo nichil de eis. Et quòd alii manentes sunt in patriâ. Ideo capiantur. Postea venerunt prædicti Johannes Horibel et Robertus le Jolyvet, et, per Justiciarios singillatim allocuti, qualiter se velint de feloniis prædictis sibi impositis acquietare, dicunt singillatim quòd in nullo sunt culpabiles de feloniis prædictis, et de bono et malo ponunt se super patriam. Et juratores dicunt, super sacramentum suum, quòd prædicti Johannes Horibel et Robertus le Jolyvet in nullo sunt culpabiles de feloniis prædictis. Ideo ipsi inde quieti. Postea testatum est per Vicecomitem quod prædictus Petrus Columbel non est inventus, sed subtraxit se &c. Et malecreditur. Ideo exigatur et utlagetur. Catalla nulla.

* * * *

De insufficienti mensurâ præsentant quod Gullielmus Soulere, Petrus Rengmere, Willielmus Wauter, Johannes Robyn, Petrus de Hometto, Johannes Quesenel, Galfridus Beauvis, Guillielmus, filius Roberti Roland, Johannes Hays, Ricardus, filius Colini Peryn, utuntur mensuris non signatis. Ideo ipsi in misericordiâ.

* * * *

De salsantibus congros contra statutum Insularum &c, dicunt quòd Ricardus Bennart consuetus est congros salsare contra statutum &c. Ideo in misericordiâ &c.

(M. 8). —"Scardeburgh."

Parochia Sancti Petri de Portu venit per tresdecem juratores.

De veteribus placitis Coronæ iidem juratores præsentant quòd nichil sciunt. De novis autem præsentant quòd Ranulphus le Cardonel felonicè interfecit Radulphum le Tunturier in domo Roberti Ricardi de Bello Campo, et statim post factum fugit, et posuit se in ecclesiâ Sancti Petri in Portu, et ibidem coram Henrico de Sancto Martino cognovit feloniam prædictam, et abjuravit insulam coram Coronatore—catalla ejus nulla &c. Et quia non fit mentio in rotulis prædicti Henrici de die et anno, prout moris est. Ideo ad judicium de eo.

* * * * *

Malefactores ignoti de Baionâ interfecerunt quendam hominem ignotum in quâdam navi de Ispaniâ in portu Sancti Petri, et statim post factum fugerunt. Nescitur qui fuerunt, nec quò devenerunt. Et quia non fit mentio in rotulis Henrici de Sancto Martino, tunc Ballivi de die et anno, prout moris est, ideo ad judicium de eo &c.

* * * * *

Laurencius Amena volens scandere cordas in quâdam navi ad vexillum superponendum, et flatu venti turbinis, cecidit in mari et submersus fuit. Nullus inde malecreditur. Judicium infortunii. Postea testatum est per prædictos Juratores quòd magister navis prædictæ et socii sui

GUERNSEY.

Placita coronæ coram Roberto de Scardeburgh, &c.

imprisonati fuerunt pro morte prædictâ, quousque deliberati fuerint per inquisitionem duodecim, et judicium Juratorum coram Galfrido de Hogâ tunc Ballivo, secundum consuetudinem Insulæ. Et, quia non fit mentio in rotulis dicti Galfridi de nominibus eorum qui imprisonati fuerunt &c., ideo ad judicium de eo &c.

* * * *

Johannes le Barbier et Martina uxor ejus, capti et imprisonati pro latrocinio, facto Johanni de Maous, de multonibus, dimissi fuerunt per plegium coram Petro de Garyz tunc Ballivo usque ad assisas istas. Et modò non venerunt. Et, quia prædictus Petrus modò non respondet de plegio, coram quo &c., ideo ad judicium de eo. Et prædicti Johannes le Barbier et Martina nichilominùs capiantur. Postea testatum est quòd subtraxerunt se. Et malecreduntur. Ideo exigantur et utlagentur.

Johanna de Marâ, capta et imprisonata pro furto, facto Ricardo Hays, de burello et frumento, dimissa fuit per plegium usque ad assisas istas coram Ranulpho le Gay, tunc Ballivo &c. Et modò non venit. Ideo capiatur. Et, quia prædictus Ranulphus coram quo &c, modò non respondet de plegio. Ideo ad judicium de eo. Postea testatum est quòd prædicta Johanna non est inventa, sed gratis subtraxit se. Et malecreditur. Ideo exigatur et wavietur &c. Catalla ejus nulla.

De fugantibus in Terris Regis &c., dicunt quòd Thomas Gros fugavit in Terris Regis in parochiâ istâ, et cuniculos cepit et asportavit. Ideo præceptum est Vicecomiti quòd venire faciat eum. Postea Vicecomes retornavit quòd non est inventus, sed gratis subtraxit. Ideo ipse in misericordiâ. Et afferunt ad decem libras Turonenses.

De redditibus subtractis &c., præsentant quòd quidam Matheus Vigir, jam sexdecim annis elapsis, subtraxit se de quodam buscello frumenti annui redditûs, qui domino Regi competit per forisfacturam Bynet, pretium frumenti per annum xij.[d] Turonenses. Ideo Johannes de Roches, Custos Insulæ prædictæ, de medio tempore, videlicet, de sexdecim solidis. Et prædictus Matheus in misericordiâ &c. Et afferunt ad duos solidos.

Adhuc de placitis Coronæ in Gernereye.

Compertum est per rotulos Ranulphi le Gay, nuper Ballivi istius Insulæ, quòd Johannetus Heribel, dictus Liquet, pro eo quòd noctantér fregit ostium domûs Johannis Beqerel et eum verberavit &c., clamore de Harou levato, et applegiatus fuit usque ad assisas &c. per Robertum Hanloris et Jordanum Herybel, qui modo non habent ipsum, nec idem Johannetus reddidit se primo die Itineris. Ideo ipsi in misericordiâ, et prædictus Johannetus capiatur. Et, quia idem Ranulphus non fecit mentionem in rotulo suo de die et anno, ideo ad judicium de eo. Postea venit prædictus Jonettus, et per Justiciarios allocutus qualiter se velit de prædictis sibi impositis acquietare, dicit quòd in nullo est culpabilis de præmissis sibi impositis, et de bono et malo ponit se super patriam. Et Juratores dicunt, super sacramentum suum, quòd prædictus Johannetus Heribel in nullo est culpabilis de præmissis sibi impositis. Ideo ipse inde quietus.

Compertum est per rotulos Petri de Garris, nuper Ballivi istius Insulæ, quòd Johannes Naon felonicè furatus fuit garbas Colini Wates, et replegiatus fuit usque ad assisas &c. per Matheum de la Couture et Ricardum Naon, qui modo non habent ipsum, nec idem Johannes reddidit se primo die Itineris. Ideo ipsi in misericordiâ, et prædictus Johannes inde capiatur. Postea testatum est quòd prædictus Johannes non est inventus, sed subtraxit se. Et malecreditur. Ideo exigatur et utlagetur. Catalla ejus nulla. Et, quia idem Petrus non fecit mentionem in rotulo suo de die et anno, nec de pretio, ideo ad judicium de eo. Postea venit prædictus Johannes et per Justiciarios allocatus qualiter se velit de feloniâ prædictâ sibi impositâ acquietare, dicit quòd in nullo est culpabilis de feloniâ prædictâ &c. Et de bono et malo ponit se super patriam. Et Juratores dicunt, super sacramentum suum, quòd prædictus Johannes in nullo est culpabilis de feloniâ prædictâ. Ideo ipse inde quietus. Et cesset exigendum de eo &c.

Deliberacio Gaolæ earumdem Insularum coram præfatis Justiciariis in Itinere prædicto.

Rogerus de Costilio, de Insulâ de Jereseye, clericus, qui aliàs coram Justiciariis ad ultimas assisas in Insulis indictatus fuit de morte Willielmi Durnaunt, et per Decanum ejusdem Insulæ tanquam clericus et membrum sanctæ ecclesiæ calumpniatus, et secundum consuetudinem Insularum prisonæ Episcopi Constanciensis mancipandus, modò manet in patriâ &c. Ideo præceptum est Vicecomiti quod capiat eum &c. Postea venit prædictus Rogerus, et, super præmissis allocutus qualiter se velit inde acquietare, dicit quòd ipse alias coram Guillielmo Constanciensi Episcopo, loci Ordinario, debitam inde fecit purgationem, et à carcere suo deliberatus fuit, et de hoc vocat recordum literarum ipsius Episcopi, quas profert hic, et quæ hoc testantur, in hæc verba. Universis hæc visuris et audituris Guillielmus, permissione divina Constanciensis Episcopus, salutem in Domino. Notum facimus quòd, cum pridem Rogero de Costilio, clerico, de Insulâ de Gerseio, nostrâ diœcesi, fuisset impositum eum personâ Guillielmi Dirnant homicidium perpetrâsse, ac propter impositionem hujusmodi fuisset ipse in eâdem insulâ carceri mancipatus per potenciam secularem, et postmodum Decano nostro de ipsâ Insulâ liberatus, qui eundem clericum nostro Constanciensi carceri mancipavit, inibi detinendum, quousque de sibi impositis, ut præfertur, notitia plenior haberetur; dictus clericus, sic in eodem carcere nostro detentus, asserens se fuisse et esse de homicidio prædicto liberum penitus et immunem, humiliter et cum instanciâ pluries supplicavit ut de eodem homicidio inquireretur, et appropinquaretur sibi super hoc viâ juris, et quòd, si reperiretur innocens de præmissis impositis ei, absolveretur de eisdem, et ad ipsius liberationem procedere curaremus, quâ supplicatione factâ, inquisitoque diligenter et cognito de homicidio supradicto, videlicet, tam de facto principali, quam etiam super famâ, quia clarè nobis non liquet nec constat de facto ipso principali, licet nobis constaret de infamiâ super hoc contra eum: Ideo nos eidem clerico purgationem indiximus, videlicet, quòd se purgaret de ipsâ infamiâ cum undecimâ manu presbiterorum et clericorum. Qui quidem clericus, secundum quod sibi â nobis fuerat injunctum, in formâ juris et modo qui sequitur se purgavit. Ipse vero clericus juravit super sacrosancta Dei evangelia, tacta corporaliter ab eodem, quòd ipse nunquam perpetraverat dictum homicidium, nec ad illud perpetrandum præstiterat consilium, auxilium vel favorem, sed fuerat et erat ab eodem homicidio innocens, inculpabilis, liber penitus, et immunis. Magister autem Gaufridus de Kartereto, Decanus Insulæ prædictæ, Robertus de Kartereto, Simon de Sancto Martino, Johannes de Kalen, Gaufridus de Sancto Martino, Philippus Horman presbiter, Philippus de Sancto Martino senior, Thomas Le Feure, Guillielmus Le Rey, Radulphus Briart, et Philippus de Sancto Martino junior, clerici de prædictâ Insulâ fidedigni, vicini præfati Rogeri et habentes de ipso notitiam pleniorem, producti etiam ab eodem ad purgationem hujusmodi faciendum in ejusdem juris instanciâ, coram nobis personaliter comparentes juraverunt singulariter et successivè supra sacrosancta Dei evangelia tacta corporaliter ab eisdem, quod ipsi credebant dictum Rogerum verum jurâsse fecisseque super præmissis verum et legitimum juramentum. Et ideo nos postmodum, Deum habentes præ oculis, et dictam purgationem legitimam et canonicam reputantes, consideratisque considerandis, et communicato super hæc jurisperitorum consilio, prædictum Rogerum clericum ab ipso homicidio absolvimus in hiis scriptis, ipsum clericum tanquam innocentem super hæc et immunem a dicto carcere liberantes, abireque liberè permittentes. In cujus rei testimonium sigillum nostrum præsentibus literis est appensum. Et inspectis literis prædictis compertum est quòd prædictus Rogerus fecit inde purgationem prout vocat. Ideo ipse inde quietus.

Ranulphus Baudeyn ad ultimas assisas coram Henrico Spigurnel &c. indictatus fuit pro deprædatione factâ Mariæ Ravenel et garcion Magistri Willielmi Lengynnour in parochiâ Sancti Laurencii &c. Et prædictus Ranulphus tunc fugit &c. Ideo præceptum fuit tunc Ballivo quòd exigi faceret eundem Ranulphum &c., de Curiâ scilicet in Curiam &c., secundum consuetudinem istius Insulæ, quousque utlageretur &c., si non comparuerit &c., et si comparuerit, tunc eum caperet et in prisonâ &c., salvo custodiri faceret &c., ita quòd eum haberet coram Justiciaris &c., proximò Itineraturis &c., ad standum rectò &c., secundum legem et consuetudinem &c. Qui quidem Ballivus modò venit, et respondet quòd prædictus Ranulphus infra primam appellationem &c., venit et se reddidit prisonæ &c. Et quòd postea manucaptus fuit usque istas assisas per Johannem Baudeyn et Colinum Palot. Qui quidem manucaptores modò veniunt et reddunt prædictum Ranulphum coram Justiciariis &c. Et dictus Ranulphus, quæsitus qualiter de prædictâ feloniâ se velit acquietare, defendit deprædationem, furtum, omnem feloniam, et quicquid est contra pacem &c., et dicit quòd ipse in nullo est inde culpabilis, et de bono et malo ponit se super patriam &c. Juratores parochiæ Sancti Laurencii dicunt, super sacramentum suum, quòd prædictus Ranulphus in nullo est inde culpabilis, nec se subtraxit pro feloniâ prædictâ &c. Quia dicit quòd ipse est quidam cementarius, et quòd tempore quo fuisset indictatus &c., operabatur in extraneis partibus Normanniæ &c. Ideo ipse inde quietus.

Radulphus Hamound, captus pro eo quòd ipse fregit archam Orengæ de Bovere in parochiâ istâ, et abinde asportavit filum lanæ, ad valenciam quinque solidorum Turonensium, unde per harellam parochiæ prædictæ indictatus est, venit, et, per Justiciarios allocutus qualiter se velit de feloniâ prædictâ sibi impositâ acquietare, dicit quod clericus est, et non potest inde nec debet coram aliquo laico Judice respondere, et super hoc venit. Et super hoc venit Galfridus de Carteret, Decanus Insulæ prædictæ, gerens Vices Episcopi Constanciensis ad clericos petendos &c., et petit ipsum sibi liberari tanquam clericum, &c. Et ei liberatur.

Et quòd Radulphus de Hamet fecit quandam purpresturam super viam regiam, ad dampnum domini Regis et nocumentum &c. Et quòd Ricardus de Mara fecit quandam purpresturam super viam regiam, ad dampnum domini Regis et nocumentum totius patriæ &c. Et quòd Johannes le Riche fecit quandam purpresturam super viam regiam ad dampnum domini Regis et nocumentum &c. Et quòd Radulphus Mase fecit quandam purpresturam super viam regiam, ad dampnum domini Regis et nocumentum totius patriæ &c. Et quòd Johannes Lyel fecit quandam purpresturam super viam regiam, ad dampnum domini Regis et nocumentum &c. Et quòd Petrus de Geneo fecit quandam purpresturam super viam regiam, ad dampnum domini Regis et nocumentum totius patriæ &c. Ideo præceptum est Vicecomiti quòd prædicta nocumenta prosternantur et deleantur et in pristinum statum redigantur, per visum juratorum, ad custagium prædicti Johannis et aliorum &c. Et iidem Johannes Endelot, hæredes Petri Follet, Johannes filius Hagesel, Rector de Vale, Ricardus Lammstenē, Guillielmus, Johannes, Johannes, Radulphus, Ricardus, Johannes, Radulphus, Johannes, et Petrus in misericordiâ, et quia priùs &c.

Per Triatores—iidem præsentant quod Petrus Bernard, Petrus Salkyn, Cecilia Larker, Radulphus Folloit, Petrus Cabowe, Willielmus Wauter, Petrus de Blundel, Petrus Hervy, Willielmus Blaunchebarbe, Johannes Burnel, Johanna quæ fuit uxor Ricardi de Beaucampe, Johannes Le Hers, Robertus Haddif, Johannes Estur, Petrus de Humet, Vincencius Garyn, Willielmus Wauter, Laurencius Gaillard, Philippus de Dute, Matilda Mercator, Petrus Goy, Willielmus Cheyny, Prior du Vale, Willielmus Robyn, Simon de Sancto Martino, et Petrus de Gariz utuntur falsis mensuris non signatis. Ideo ipsi in misericordia.

Iidem triatores præsentant quod Prior du Vale, Prior de Sancto Clemente, Simon de Sancto Martino, Philippus de Sancto Martino, Johannes de Viver, Radulphus Le Moyne, Robertus de Viver, Radulphus de Beauchamp, Laurencius le Gaylard, Johannes le Viner, Willielmus de Cheyny, Petrus de Gariz, Ranulphus le Gay, Johannes le Moyne, Ricardus Tolley, Petrus Pilet, Johannes Cornaille, Guido Nicole, Ranulphus de Wyc, Henricus de la Mule, Jordanus Discard, Matheus de la Saumarays, et Johannes Destur, die Lunæ proximo post festum Sanctorum Petri et Pauli, anno regni regis nunc quinto, in Prioratu de Insuleto in Parochiâ Sancti Elerii, in adventum Justitiariorum Itinerantium fuerunt ibidem sacramento astricti et confœderati quòd quilibet eorum in quibuscunque causis sive querelis, pro ipsis vel contra ipsos motis vel movendis, alterum foveret et manuteneret, et quòd ipsi unanimi assensu, et unâ voce, omnimodas custumas suas, quibus usi fuerunt, et similiter omnimodas custumas per ipsos pro eorum proficuo ordinatas seu ordinandas, et per eos seu eorum aliquem promulgatas, seu coram præfatis Justitiariis calumpniatas, manutenerent et sustinerent; quas quidem conspirationes et confœderationes illicitas in facto postmodum redigentes et prosequentes, die Mercurii proximo ante festum Sanctæ Margaretæ Virginis, anno supradicto, in præsentiâ prædictorum Justitiariorum surrexerunt, inobedienter astiterunt custumasque per ipsos ordinatas, non debitas et coronæ domini Regis et legi contrariantes, clamaverunt, et tanquam ipsis pertinentes vindicaverunt. Et quia iidem Justitiarii custumas prædictas eis allocare contradixerunt, domino Rege inde inconsulto, præfati Petrus et alii, simulcum aliis circiter numerum quingentorum hominum, verbis acerbis in præsentia Justiciariorum insurgentes, temerariè asserebant se nullo modo, licet perculo vitæ vel membrorum incumberent, custumas prædictas in hâc parte amittere seu dimittere. Qui quidem ignoti, simul cum aliis, conspirationem et confæderationem hujusmodi affirmabant, dicendo alta voce—etiam! etiam! etiam! in contemptum domini Regis et terrorem populi et periculum vitæ prædictorum Justiciariorum. Ideo præceptum est Vicecomiti quòd venire faciat eos &c. Postea venerunt prædicti Laurencius, Johannes le Viner, et omnes alii, et per Justiciarios allocuti de confœderatione et conspiratione prædictis, qualiter se velint inde acquietare, dicunt singillatim quòd ipsi in nullo sunt culpabiles de prædictis confœderatione et conspiratione sibi impositis, et de hoc ponunt se super patriam. Et Juratores dicunt super sacramentum suum quod prædicti Laurentius, et omnes alii, quoad prædictas confæderationes et conspirationes in nullo sunt culpabiles. Ideo ipsi inde quieti &c. Sed quia residuum præsentationis manifestè est in recordo Justiciariorum, de quo non est necesse quod inde arrenentur. Ideo dictum est eis quòd per manucaptionem cujuslibet alterius alteri exspectent inde judicium suum coram præfatis Justiciariis apud Longam Villam in insulâ de Jereseye &c, die Mercurii proximo post festum Sancti Petri quòd dicitur ad vincula, de audiendo judicio suo &c. Postea venit prædictus Henricus (? Philippus) de Sancto Martino, et petiit quòd possit admitti ad finem faciendum cum domino Rege, et admittitur per finem xx$^{s}$. sterlingorum, per plegium Radulphi Cartret. Ad quem diem prædicti Prior du Vale, et omnes alii, præter prædictum Philippum, licet solempniter vocati non venerunt. Ideo dictum est Vicecomiti quòd capiat eos, si &c.

At Westm. the xi^th^ of Marche, 1568.

Orders in Council of the 11th of March, 1568.

The Lorde Keaper, The Duke of Norff., The Marques of Northampton, The Lorde Steward, The Earle of Bedford, Thearle of Leycester, The Lord Admyrall, The Lorde Chamb^r^layne, Master Vice chamb^r^layne, Master Secretary, Master Chauncellor of the Duchie, Master Chauncelour of Thexchier.

Where complaynte hathe bene lately made unto the Lordes and others of the Quenes Majesties Pryvey Counsell by l^r^̃es̃, as well from Frauncis Chamb^r^layne Esquier, Capitayne and Governour of the Isle of Garnesey, as from the Baylyef and Jurats of the same Isle, of div^r^se Quarrells and Troubles lately growen betwene them concerninge certen Graunts, Confirmacions and other matters of Controv^r^sy, wherein eche partye desyred that Redresse mighte be had to the pacificacion and good quiett of that Isle and the Inhabitaunts of the same, like as their Lordshippes thoughte it not meete for good respects to suffer anie such stryef or devision to be anie longer nurrished, specially amongest suche as aughte cheefly together in good concorde for the well gov^r^ninge of the chardge co̅mitted unto them: So, for the better endinge and quietinge of the said Differences, and establyshinge of pfecte unitie betwene the said Capitayne Baylyef and Juratts, and other thinhabitaunts of the said Isle, their Lordshippes did not onely heare the substaunce of the matter breefely declared before them by suche as were sente hither for that purpose, but co̅mitted also the further pticularities of the same to be harde at good leingthe and reportid unto them by the Rev^r^end Father in God, the Buisshoppe of London, and Richarde Onslowe Esquier, the Quenes Majesties Sollicitour Generall, who by their Lordshippes appoyntemente harde what eche partie coulde alleadge for them selves; and, havinge thereupon informed the said Lordes of the Counsell of the whole state of the cause their Lordshippes, upon the full hearinge and deliberate consider̅acion thereof by conference with the parties that were sente from the said Isles, have for a finall resolucion taken suche order as followeth. Firste, it is by their Lordshippes thoughte necessarye that, before all other thinges, the said Capitayne Baylief and Juratts forgettinge all pryvate or publick Querrells shall reconcile them selves and joyne together in all good fryndshipp and concorde whereby they maye with the more co̅moditie eche of them attende their sev^r^all chardgs. In which case also speciall respecte is to be had that the said Capitayne, as the Quenes Majesties Principall Officer there, be cheefely regarded, obeyed and estemed in suche degree as to the place he holdeth doth belonge, and enjoye suche rights, priviledges and other duties as other Capitaynes holdinge his place have heretofore lawfully had and enjoyed, and by the P^r^rogative of his office do apperteyne unto him, and therein to be assisted and maynteyned by the said Baylief and Juratts to the best of their powrs, who also, in their order and place, are likewise to have that reputacion and obedience geven them that belongeth unto their office and callinge. It is also further ordered that the Baylief and Juratts of the said Isle maye lawfully at all tymes when neede shall require visitte the state of the Castels and Fortificacions there, in suche forme and for suche purposes and intents as be comprised and declared in their li̅bres and priviledges, having in the doinge thereof good regarde by all gentill meanes to exhorte, advise and pswade the Quenes Majesties lovinge and obedyent Subjects there to contynue their endevour and good wills for the transportinge and careadge of stone, sande and other necessaries, at convenyent dayes and tymes as heretofore of late they have done, to the furtheraunce of the Fortificacion of the said Castell and good suretie of those Isles. Item, that the Co̅mission lately pcured by John Chamb^r^layne, concerninge matter of accompts to be taken there of sundry psons, be forthwith put in due execusion accordinge to the tenour and effecte of the same to thende c^r^tificat maye be duly made thereof unto their Lordshippes within such tyme as is lymited by the said Co̅mission. Item, that all Graunts and Confirmacions of Priviledges from the Quenes Majestie and her pgenitors shalbe alwayes inviolably observed, maynteyned and kepte in force, with the credit of the Baylyef and Juratts to be obeyed in all their ordinancs made and to be made for the good Governmente, Suretie and Quietnes of the said Isle. And that noe officer or Mynister of Justice be at anie tyme hereafter resistid, ympeched or ymprysoned for executinge the Sentences, Ordinaunces and Constitucions aforesaid, but maynteyned and assistid accordinge to the Lawes, Usages and Auncyente Customes of the Isle. Item, it is ordered that the Salthowse, the Weights, and Co̅mon Pastures, shall hensforthe be used and applyed by the Captayne or his Farmour accordinge to the priviledges and auncyente customes used tyme oute of mynde there. And yf anie Question and Difficultie shall happen to aryse touchinge those matters, the same to be tryed before the Baylyef and Juratts, aswell by auncyente Recordes as by the Deposicions of honeste psons indiffently chosen accordinge to the Lawes, Usages and auncyente customs of the said Isle. Item, that Edmond Hector shall voluntarely resigne thoffice of procurour accordinge to his submission in that parte, and the Captayne shall, within one moneth nexte after the arryvall of the said Hector in that Isle, name and appoynte an other procurour in his steede havinge, alwayes speciall regarde, as farre forthe as in hym shall lye, that no officers or Mynisters of Justice be nominated or admitted in the said Isle for and in the name of the Quenes Majestie other then suche as will fayethfully and willingly further the ordinaunces of Justice and maynteyne the same as the necessitie of the tyme shall require. Item, it is ordered that the Quenes Majesties L̃res to the Baylyef and Juratts touchinge the sepacion forev^r^ of those Isles from the Diocesse of Constancs and to be ppetually united to the Diocesse of Winchester shall not from hensforthe be broughte into anie Question, but shalbe followed and executid accordinge to the tenour and effecte of the same. And the Rev^r^end Father in God the Bushoppe of Winchester, beinge p^r^sently constitutid ordinary in the said Isles, and his Successours, shall from tyme to tyme, execute that chardge, and, upon, p^r^sentemente from the

GUERNSEY.

Orders in Council of the 11th of March, 1568.

Quenes Majestie or the Captayne, shall institute, inducte and authorise the Deanes, Mynisters, Curatts and Scholemasters, suche as by his good discrecion maye be thoughte mete to execute those chardges according to the Langage, Countrie, Qualitie, and Disposicion of the People there, and as beste maye be for the advauncemente and mayntenaunce of Godde's Holy Worde and Glorie in the said Isles. Foreseinge alwayes that neither the Deane for the tyme being, nor anie other Eccliasticall officer within the said Isles, shall innovate anie thinge nor take nor exacte anie more, directly or indirectly, for Pbacions of Testaments, Amrcements or suche like, then onely such duties and somes of money as hath bene heretofore aunciently accustomed to be payd in the said Isles in that behalfe, neither shall the said Deane compell anie of thinhabitants of the said Isle to repaire into England for anie Eccliasticall cause, but that the same maye be determyned there by Comission, unles it be by assente of bothe parties accordinge to the auncyent Usages of the said Isle. Item, the Scholehowse at the Fryers in Garnesey, foundid and rentid by the Quene's Majestie, shalbe forthwth put in order for the purpose appoyntid by the consente of the Captayne in the prsence of the Baylyef and Jurats and of his Brother George Chamberlayne, as in effecte appeareth by the scedule hereunto annexed. Item, it is orderid that the Baylyef, assistid with the Juratts, shall not omitt upon any cause the administracion of Justice accordinge to the auncyente Laws and Customes there. Item, it is further ordeyned that all controvrsies or mislikinges that shall at anie tyme hereafter chaunce betwene the Captayne Baylyef and Juratts shalbe forthwith advisedly considered at some tyme and place to be appoyntid by the Captayne, where, by mutuall conference they shall quietly appease and reforme all controvrsies and mislikinges, so as, eche of them beinge aydinge and assistinge to the others, they may not onely avoyde the inconveniences and daungers that were like to followe of the contrary, but be also the better able to attende their chardge and see to the due observacion of suche good constitucions as shalbe by them establyshed, as well for the good Govrnemente and Defence of the Isle as for the contynuynge of thinhabitaunts of the same in good order and obedyence. And, in case anie such disorder shoulde fortune to fall oute as maye not well be compoundid and redressid amongest them selves there within the space of fortie dayes, that it shall then be lawfull for anie that will doe the same to repayre ovrhither to seeke for reformacion thereof by meanes of the Lordes and others of the Pryvey Counsell here without anie lett or restrainte. As touchinge the ymprisonamente of the Deane and Juratts, the same is orderid at this tyme to be passid ovr, and eche partie to beare their own Chardges; and nevrtheles it is also therewithall orderid that the Captayne shall not hereafter ymprison anie pson of the said Isle withoute the order of Justice, unles it be for martiall matters and formes, in wch cases the Captayne hathe bene accustomed to ympryson offendours as the custom in that parte pmitteth. Item, where it is enformed that crten somes of money have bene exactid and taken for the chardges of Lewis Devicke and Peter Hamelyn, Rycharde Fever and Noel Lehowe, popular pcurours agaynste the Baylyef, Juratts and Deane, forasmuche as the same money appeareth to have bene levied of Churche Goodes and amongeste, the comon People, it is ordered that, because the said parties have pvid no juste cause of greefe in anie of these matters before mencioned, the Captayne, Baylyef and Juratts, unitinge them selfes together, shall call before them suche as have levied the said money, and cause the same to be by them restorid unto the Churches and People from whome it was had, in suche sorte as shalbe thoughte convenient. All which articles before mencioned their Lordshippes not onely comaunded to be entred into the Counsell Booke to remayne of Recorde, but also gave order that the same should be enrolled in the Chauncery, and the copies thereof subscribed with their Lorshippes handes to be sevrally sente, as well to the Captayne as to the Baylyef and Juratts of the said Isle, with comaundemente in the Quenes Majesties name to kepe and observe the same.

---

At Richmonde the 9^th^ of October 1580.

An Order set downe by the Lords in certaine causes dependinge before them uppon complaint of the Inhabitantes of Her Maiesties Isle of Garnezey.

Orders in Council of the 9th of October, 1580.

First, Whereas complainte is made unto us that greater sommes are exacted for custome of wares and marchandizes uppon Straungers then are conteined in the Booke of the Extent in the Article intituled "La petite coustume," and Sir Thomas Leyghton, Her Ma^ties^ Governour, verifieth in his answere that there is no more custome taken by him of Straungers goods then was in Sir Richard Weston's time and longe before him and of all Governours since; where w^th^ it appeareth not by any recorde that the inhabitants have at anie time before ben grieved: It is ordered that the lyke rate of custome and none other, shall be from hence forth taken of the said Straungers goods, as was ordinarilie payd in Sir Richard Weston's and Sir Leonard Chamberlaine's times, Governors of that Isle.

And, for the more certaine execucõn hereof, y^t^ suche bookes of the customes payd and receaved in the times of the sayd Sir Richard Weston and Sir Leonard Chamberlaine as remaine within the Isle in the hands of the newe Receaver, or suche as have ben in that office heretofore or anie other person, shall forthwith, or as convenientlie as maye be, be exhibited to the Baillife and Juratts who shall examine the same, and, making an abstract of the most usuall payements in the times afore sayd, shall deliver one copie thereof to Sir Thomas Leyghton and send an other copie thereof to we the Lords of Her Ma^tie's^ Privie Counsell, to receave suche further order there in as shall be advised uppon. The lyke ys ordered for payements for ankerage, that no other rate be taken then was ordinarilie taken in the times of the fore sayd Governours.

Item, whereas they complaine y. they are restrained from appeales: It is ordered that it shal be lawfull for anie of the Inhabitants of y^t^ Isle, and all other finding themselves greived with anie judiciall decree, sentence or Judgment made & given by the Baillyffe & Juratts of that Isle, to appeale from the same to Her Majesty and the Lords of Her Privy Counsell, so as the same be made at the time of suche decree, sentence or Judgement, or wythin fifteene dayes after notice of the same. Provided that it shall not be lawfull to appeale in anie cause criminall, or of correction, nor from the execucõn of any order taken in their Court of Chief Pleas, nor in cries of Haro, nor for anie matter moveable not exceeding the somme of ten pounds Sterling of England. Provided furthermore y^t^ no appeale be made from anie decree y^t^ is not finall, but onely from decrees, sentences and Judgements definitive.

Provided also y^t^ the partie appellant shall effectuallie prosecute and end his appeale within one yeare & a daye if he be not lett by anie lawfull impediment, and shall put in sureties so to prosecute his said appeale, and to paye the costs and chardges of his adversarie, in case it shall be founde y^t^ he had not good cause to appeale, as the ancient custome of that Isle seemeth to have ben.

Item, that the partie appealant shall have under the Seale of the Isle an instrument conteining all the acts & proceedings of y^t^ cause wherein he shall appeale, readie to be shewed here when neede shall require.

And, for the better execucõn hereof, y^t^ the Bailliffe and Juratts shall cause to be recorded in the acts of theire courts the plaintifs declaracõn, and all other matters pleaded by anye of the parties, together with the deposicõns of witnesses examined in such causes, and Instruments or other profe exhibited, and generallie the pticuler proceedings of everie Courte daye; and uppon everie appeale made from them shall deliver unto the appellants, under the Seale of the Isle, the copies of theire sayd acts concerning their perticuler causes, the saiyd appellants paiying to the Greffier such feeas as heretofore for lyke acts have been usuall.

Item, whereas they complaine of want of due administracõn of Justice through the libertie, the Bailliffe and Jurats do take unto them selves to directe their Judgements by presidents, wherein there is neyther certainety nor rule of Justice (as by the late Commissioners sent thither by authoritie from Her Majesty to informe themselves of the true state of y^t^ Isle It hath ben reported to us), forsaking the Customarye of Normandie whereunto they should holde them selves in all points not restrained or supplied by the Booke of Precepts & Booke of Extente: It is ordered that the sayd Bailliff and Jurats, in the administracõn of Justice, shall keepe & observe the booke of precept & the booke of extent, so far forth as they be not repugnant to anie order now or heretofore taken by Her Majesty, or any Her progenitors, or by the Lords of Her or theire Privy Counsell. And that, in all matters not restrained by the Booke of Precept & extent or other order afore sayd, they shall follow the Customarie of Normandie, and according to the customes thereof minister justice within the said Isle.

Provided that, forasmuche as the manner of processe & differences of Courts & forms of proceedings therein of long time used in y^t Isle can hardly be reduced to the formes prescribed by the Customary of Normandie: It shall be lawfull for the Bailliffe and Jurats to retaine the sayd difference of court with the days & forme of proceeding therein, as heretofore hath ben usuall, Unlesse in any theire Courts of Chief Pleas they shall, by assent of the States of the Isle, agree uppon anie orders tending to the abridgement of length of sutes.

And, forasmuche as it is reported that there be divers customes differing from the Customary of Normandie, which concerne right of succession, partage, dower, retraicts, & other lyke matters, which cannot well be altered and yet are thought to be few in number: The Baillif & Jurats shall joyne unto them twelve other persons of the most ancient & best experienced in the Isle, to be named by the Governor, & shall alltogether conferre the sayd customes (not perteining to the maner of proceeding but to the causes before expressed and other of like nature) w^th the Customary of Normandie corrected & amended in the reigne of King Henry the 2 of Fraunce, in matters touching the abridgment of length of sutes; & suche as they shall finde differente from the sayd Customary shall put in writing, and send the same to the Lords of Her Ma^tie's Privie Counsell, before Easter next, to receive their order therein. Provided that in the mean time, until further order be taken touching such customes, it shall be lawfull for the Bailliff and Juratts to follow and put in execucōn such of the said customes as they can shew have ben used there time out of minde, & after order geven by the Lords that they do nothing by conlo^r of any custome other than suche as shall be allowed by the said Lords.

Item, whereas it appeareth, as well by their Complaints as by the reports of the Commissioners of late sent unto the Isle, y^t in the time of ffrancis Chamberlaine divers of the inhabitants had purchased certaine rents and lands belonging to her Ma^ty by warrant of Her Majesty's Commission, & that, havinge receaved theire conveiance in writing under the hands of divers of the Commissioners appointed for that cause, & paid their money, the sayd conveyances were left unperfect for y^t they were not sealed with the seale of the Isle according to the tenor of the said Commission: It is ordered y^t Commission shall be directed to the Governor and Bailiff for the sealing of the said Conveyances. So as the chardge thereof shall be borne by them that are to receave the benefit thereof.

Item, whereas sondry of the Inhabitants find themselves greived with a sentence geven against them touching the matters of camparts, & have exhibited an humble petition requiring libertie to make and prosecute their appeale from the sayd judgement geven for camparts or to take other remedie by order of Justice, & it is found reasonable by Her Ma^tie's learned Counsell in the Law that in this case they should be releived: It is ordered that it shall be lawfull for so many of the inhabitants as are charged by the said sentence with payment of campart, y^t is to say as many of the tenants of the fee of S^t Michaele as holde any part thereof charged with two quints La Verge, to make a letter of attorney to such as they shall lyke to name, giving him or them thereby authoritie to appeale and to prosecute the same before such Delegates as shall be named here by the Lords of Her Ma^tie's Privy Counsell, where it is meante theire sayd cause shall be heard and determined, as the place most fitte for the choysse of meete judges & retaining of such counsellors as to both parties shall be thought meete and necessary.

Lastly, where the late Commissioners made report that the rolles for gathering Her Majesty's rentes were defaced uppon purpose to have made a newe booke under the seale of the Isle of all the sayd rents for the direction of the Receever: It is ordered that the purpose of the Baillif and Juratts aforesayd shall be forthwith put in execucōn, & that one booke shall be made out of the said rolles with the dirrecōn & assistance of the new receaver and the oversight of the Governor, for the gathering of the sayd rents, whereof one copie shall remaine with the sayd Bailiffe & Jurats & an other be delivered to Her Majesty's Receaver under some authentike forme, sealed with the Seale of the Isle.

Orders sett downe by the Lords of Her Majesty's most honorable Privie Counsell touchinge the Isle of Gernezey, xxx. July 1581.

Whereas heretofore, uppon complainte exhibited unto their Lordships by Sir Thomas Leyghton, Knight, Capten of Her Ma^tie's Isle of Gernezey, concerning sondrie disorders comitted and maintained by the Baillife & certaine of the Jurates of the sayd Isle to the greate prejudice of Her Ma^ties' right and service, It pleased their Lordships to sende for W^m. Beauvoyr, Baillife; Nicholas Martin, & Henrie Beauvoyr, Jurates; Their sayd Lordships, havinge att severall times heard what both parties could alledge, uppon good deliberacōn for the endinge of all matters in variance & establishing of good peace and unitie in the said Isle, have thought meet to take suche order in certaine points which were in controversie between them, as followeth.

Ffirst, whereas, about a year sithe, uppon the repaire hither of certaine Inhabitants of the said Isle, as populer procurers, to complaine against the sayd Sir Thomas Leyghton (allbeit the same were without cause, as it then appeared, in that they were punished for the same), it pleased their Lordships to sett downe certaine orders meete to be observed in that Isle, the cariage whereof was comitted to the sayd persons at their retorne, with Letters unto the Capten, Baillife and Jurats for a contribucōn to be made in respect of their poverties & of the charge w^ch^ the sayd persones had ben at in attendinge here, to be levied of suche as wolde voluntarilie geve anie thinge towardes the same; ffor as much as some doubt hathe sithe arisen, whether the same should have been generallie levied uppon all the Inhabitants of the sayd Isle, as in comon services for the behoofe of them all hath ben heretofore accustomed, or onelie of suche as, of their owne free will and accorde for their owne particular Interests, wold be contented to contribute any thinge towards that charge: Their Lordships have declared their oppinion therein, that, seinge the said populer procurers were not authorized in the name of the whole Isle, but from certaine particular Inhabitants, the sayd contribucōn & collecc̄on should be onelie levied of suche as did move them to complaine or as wold voluntarilie contribute therto, and not be imposed uppon the generallitie. Neverthelesse the sayd Capten, his Lieutenant, or anie other Officers, shall not by any meanes directlie or indirectlie empeach, hinder or countermaund anie person to contribute therto that w^ch^ of his owne free will he shall be contented to geve towardes the sayd charge.

Orders in Council of the 30th of July, 1581

Secondlie, whereas there hath ben some controversie touchinge the keepinge of the Weights of the said Isle, and about a certaine house in the church-yarde, wherein it is sayd that of ancient time the same Weightes were wont to be kept: It is ordered by their Lordships that the sayd Weightes shall be brought unto the sayde house, & kept by suche a convenient person as the Governor shall appointe for that purpose, in suche sorte everie man may freelie resorte unto the sayde Weightes; and the peaceable possession of the sayd house and Weightes shall remaine to the sayd Governor as in Her Majesty's right, according to the Order taken by their Lordships in the yeare 1568, w^ch^ their Lordships meaninge is should still stand in force untill suche time as the Baillife and Jurates (w^ch^ pretende title to the same) shall shewe better right thereto then hathe ben hitherto declared: And touchinge the comon pasture Salte howsse, their Lordships thinke meete that the order made in the said yeare of 1568 touching these things should allso stand in force and be observed accordinglie.

And, whereas sundrie doubts and questions have ben made touchinge the certeintie of Her Majesty's Revenues, rates of Custome & other dueties appertaining unto Her Highness within the sayd Isle: It is ordered that the Baillif and Jurats shall make a trewe and particular booke of the collecting of the sayd revenues and rentes and rates of Customes, &c., with the assistance of the Capten, or, in his absence, of his Lieutenant, and of the Receyvors & other Her Majesty's Officers or farmers, according to suche bookes, roles and rentalls as are remaining in the custodie of the said Officers; and, for defaulte of such proofes, to make a dewe inquisicōn thereof by the Othes of indifferent and not suspected persones w^ch^ can declare the contents & lykelyhood of the same. And a copie of the booke, so made & agreed on by the Governor, or his Lieutenant, in his absence, the Baillife, Jurates, Receyvor and other Her Majesty's Officers, to be sent hither under the Seales of the sayd Gouvernor and Isle, to be bothe here and there registered, to remaine of recorde hereafter; & this booke to be perfected and sent over by the first daye of Maye next ensuing. And, in case it shall so fall out that they shall not agree about the making of the sayde booke, then eche partie to advertise their Lordships before the sayd daye what they have dontherein, to the intent their Lordships maie take further order accordinglie.

Item, the sayd Bailliffe & Jurates shall cause the Dozen of St. Peter's Port forthwith, uppon the receipt herof, with as much expedicōn as convenientlie maie be, to make a trewe booke for the collectinge of such Her Majesty's rentes in that Isle as are called Fferme, Brasillage and Cotillage, accordinge to the booke of the Extente, and to deliver the same to Her Majesty's Receyvor there.

And, touching the Campard of the fee of St. Michael, it is ordered that Her Majesty, accordinge to a sentence there given in that behalf, shall remain in the possession of the same, and that the parties which have appealed from that sentence shall prosecute their appeale before the first daye of Januarie next ensuinge, according to a former order made by their Lordships A° 1580 in that behalfe, putting in suffitient sureties to paye the arrerages and all costs and charges if it be founde that they had no just cause to appeal.

And, whereas there dependeth a certaine matter in controversie between Her Majesty's Procurer & James Guille & Jaques Allez for a certaine fief termed of Alliens demanded by the said Procurer, viz. of the said Guille for John Discarte fyve cabots of wheat, and of the said Allez for Collas Vauriouf for three cabots of wheat, according to the ancient bookes of former Receyvors & ffermers, even as other Tenn̄ts mencioned in the sayd bookes are said to do; fforasmuch as, by reason of an appeale made by the said Procureur from a sentence geven in that Isle by the Bailliffe & Jurates, the sayd matter remaineth as yet undecided: The Bailiffe and Jurates shall, upon the receipt hereof, call the said Guille & Allez before them, & will them to pay the sayd fieffe as other have don & doe: or else, within xx^tie^ daies warninge to be geven by Her Majesty's Procurer unto them, to repaire hither to answer the said appeale, & to declare such right as they or anie of them may pretende to the contrarie.

And, whereas the sayd Bailliffe & Jurates were comanded by a former order from their Lordships to sett downein writing the Lawes and Customes used & observed in that Isle, & thereof to make a certificate unto their Lordships (which hath not yet ben don): It is ordered by their Lordships that the Bailiffe & Jurates, with the assistance of the Capten, or, in his absence of his Lieutenant, & Her Majesty's Procurer, shall jointlie make such a booke of the sayd Lawes and Customs so farre forthe as they all can agree amonge themselves touching the same. And, if they shall disagree in anie pointe, then it is ordered that the Bailliffe & Jurates for their parts shall set downe in writing and send unto their Lordships their oppinions touching that pointe or matter which is doubted of, and the said Capten, or his Lieutenant, and Her Majesty's Procurer, to doe the lyke, to be there uppon decided and determined by their sayd Lordships with the advise of the Judges & others of Her Majesty's Learned Counsell what is to be holden and observed therein; and in the meane time the rest of the orders made by their Lordships heretofore, A° 1568 et 1580, to stand and be in force still.

And finallie, forasmuch as Will^m. Beauvoyr, now late Bailliffe, Nicholas Martin & Henrie Beauvoyr, Jurats, have, bothe in their owne name and in the name of the rest of the sayd Isle, against whom Sir Thomas Leyghton exhibited his complainte, declared before their Lordships that they are sorie to have geven anie cause of displeasure unto their sayd Capten against them, and that they all meane to doe better hereafter, and so to behave themselves as they trust to geve him no just cause of offence: Heruppon their Lordships have earnestlie required the said Capten to remitte that which is past, and to staye his further proceeding in the proofe and triall of any faultes wherewith he hath chardged them or may chardge them, and to receave them to his former favour; whereto, att their L.Ls requeste, he hath yelded; thereuppon, with some good admonitions so to demeane them selves hereafter as that there may be no just cause by them offred of anie further complainte, the above named Bailliffe and Jurates were dismissed and licenced to depart & retorne home.

And, last of all, whereas the sayd William Beauvoyr, late Bailliffe, Nicholas Martin and Henry Beauvoyr, Jurats, have of their owne free will & accorde made suite unto their L.Ls that they might be discharged of their sayd offices of Bailliffe & Jurates, and that by their L.Ls' appointment some others might be chosen to supplie their places; Their L.Ls' pleasure hereuppon was that, by Letters from hence, so much sholde be signified unto the Inhabitants of the sayd Isle, requiring them to proceade to the election of others in their roomes according to the custome and manner of the sayd Isle.

At the Court at Grenewich, the nynth of June, 1605.

Aunswers of the Lords of his Ma^ts Privie Counsaile to the proposicõns or requests exhibited to their L.Ls: by the Deputies of the Isle of Guarnzey in y^e behalf of the Inhabitants of y^e said Isle.

Orders in Council of the 9th of June, 1605.

Whereas the Inhabitants of the Isle of Guernzey have exhibited certaine Articles to His Ma^tie concerning the Goverment of that Isle, the consideracõn whereof being by his Highnes referred to their L.Ls. of His Ma^ts Privie Counsell; Although it is to be presumed that His Ma^tie, in his Princely care of his loving Subjects of that Isle, as well as of other his dominions, will alwaies (in his wisdome) make choise of such Captaines or Governors as shal be of discreete and temperate cariage: Nevertheless, for the farther satisfaction and contentment of the Inhabitants, of whose loyaltie and affection to His Majestie and the State He remayneth so assured, and for the establishing of a certaine course in the goverment hereafter, their Lo^ps have made these answeres to their demandes.

Ffirst, for answere to their proposicõn touchinge the authoritie of the Governor for cõmitting of men to Prison in that Isle: It is thought meete the Governor shall not be restrayned to cõmitt any Islander to Prison upon such cause as he shall thincke to have justlie deserved imprisonment: But, forasmuch as everie particular or private offence w^ch deserveth restraint doth not admitt the laying on of irons, putting into the dungeon, or longe imprisonment, It is therefore thought fitt that no person shall be restrayned or kept in prison by the cõmittment of the Governor longer tyme than the space of ffower and twentie howres, nor be laied in irons, nor put into the dungeon, unlesse the partie stand charged with some such matter as is of higher nature then a private offence, and may concerne him in his loyaltie to the Kings Majestie's person, or to the State; In w^ch case the Bailiffe and Jurates (if the matter be such as may without daunger be imparted to so many) are to be made acquainted with the cause of his cõmittment; But, if the Governor shale finde it daungerous or inconvenient so farr foorth to reveale it as to acquaint them or any of them w^th it, It ought to be left to his discrecõn how to proceede both for the tyme & manner of imprisonment and for reteyning the cause private to himself: Alwaies to be regarded that the Governor cõmitt not to prison the Bailiffe, or any of the Juratts, unlesse it be for some such great cause concerning the King's Ma^tie or the State as is before mentioned.

Moreover, to the motion they make for some order to be prescribed towching the charge for provision of Armo^r and other munitions: It is answered, That, whereas there may be occasion for the better guard, defence and preservacõn of the Isle, to make from tyme to tyme provision of Armo^r, Weapon and such like furniture, in this case, as the Captaine is by His Majesty trusted with the charge & Goverment of the whole Island, so in all those matters that concerne the preservacõn and defence of the Isle the cheefe order & direction dependeth upon the care & comaundement of the Governor or Captaine: and therefore, as in that behalf it is left to him to take that order for those provisions that shalbe most convenient, So their L.Ls do not think it fitt that he shall impose any Assesment or Taxe, thereby to charge the Inhabitants for the said provisions, without conference had with the Bailiffe & Juratts, and by their consent and agreement.

To their request for the setling of some course in the nominacõn of Gunners and for allowance to be given them: Their Lo^ps do thincke it agreable to reason, and the authoritie given to all other Captaines that have like charge and comaundement in Martiall affaires, that the

GUERNSEY.

Orders in Council of the 9th of June, 1605.

Captaine of the Isle shall from tyme to tyme have the nominacōn of such persons as shalbe thought fitt in the circuite of the Isle to be appointed for Gunners upon such occasion as in his discrecōn shall be thought requisite; wherein nevertheless their Lo^ps^ do not meane that there shall further allowance be given to those Gunners by the Islanders than auncientlie hath bin accustomed or shall be thought fitt by themselves upon any extraordinarie occasion.

And, whereas they desire some order to be taken that they may not be burthened as heretofere w^th^ the troble & charge of carriages for the fortification of the Castle: In this case their L.L.s do not doubt but they (as all other His Ma^ties^ subjects) wilbe willing to furnish such carriages as hath ben accustomed or shall be fit to be undertaken for the service of his M^tie^ & strengthening and defence of the Isle; and, if further burthen then is necessary and convenient should be exacted of them therein, Upon complaint thereof made, their L.L.s will take that order therein that shalbe convenient.

And, to their exception mooved against the attendance of the retynue heretofore used: Their Lo^ps^ do thincke meete that it be left to the discrecōn of the Governor to make choise of such able persons of the Islanders as shalbe thought fitt from tyme to tyme to be in a readynes for the better defence of the same; nevertheles it is not meant hereby that any particular person of the Island shall be burthened more one then other, but that the attendance for such services shall be equallie apportioned in the generalitie of the Island.

Ffurthermore, where they make request that they may be authorized and allowed to visitt the Castle as they have donne in tymes past: although their L.L.s do conceave there shall be no cause to doubt of the care of the Captaine whome his Ma^tie^ doth trust with the charge and goverment of the Isle, nevertheles, for the better satisfaction of the Islanders, if they shall make request to the Governor to see the state of the Castle, it is not to be doubted but in friendlie manner the Governor will admitt them to vew the same in such sorte as hetherto alwaies hath ben accustomed.

Concerning their demand for encrease of wages to the Bailiffes: When His Majestie shall be certified the true state of his Revenewes and profitte of that Isle by such Commissioners as shalbe sent thether, and by what convenient meanes the same may be donne without encrease of charge to His Majestie, or taking the same out of the Governor's entertainment and allowance, there may such consideracōn be had thereof as shalbe thought convenient.

And to their demand that the Bailiffe may be nominated by the King himself and not by the Governor: It is answered that, in regard alwaies heeretofore the Bailiffe hath ben nominated by the Captaine, Their L.Ls do see no cause therein to mistrust the upright and indifferent choise of the Governor, considering the Bailiffe is a person appointed to do justice betweene partie and partie, and that, both in this and all other causes, there is leave given them, both to inform His Majesty and the Lordes, if the Governor should take any indirect courses, as there is also appeale for the partie greeved.

To the request, that the Booke of their Lawes of that Isle made Anno 1583, but remayning imperfect and supposed to be in many poyntes erronious, may be re-examined, reformed and made perfect: It is answered, that the Bailiffe and Juratts of Guernzey, calling to them such assistance as the general Estates of the whole Isle shall holde to be most sufficient, both for their understanding and integritie, shall sett downe a faire booke agreeablie to the local Customes which that Isle hath ever observed in the course of justice amonge themselves, w^ch^ being orderly made up, they shall present the same to the Lordes of the Privy Counsell and from them receave either correction or confirmation as in their wisedomes, after conference with the compilors thereof, shall be thought best for the goverment.

Touching the Book of Extent of His Ma^ties^ Revenewes in that Isle, which they desire, for the like causes either of imperfection or of error, to be renewed and reformed: It is answered that, although it may seeme somewhat inconvenient to call things of that nature in question that have bin in use and acknowledged for longe tyme, nevertheles that, with as much speede as convenientlie may be, there shall a Commission be directed to some chosen persons of understanding and good qualitie for the dilligent examination of the particularities of the saide Booke of Extent, and for the fynding out of the true state of the saide Revenewes in everie point, according to such good & sufficient proofes as shalbe made by deedes & evidences to be produced, who shall thereupon yeald a due accompt of this charge, & trust comitted unto them unto the Lordes of the Counsell, that such further resolucōn may be taken thereon as shalbe meete.

To the request, that the Governor may not take from the Inhabitants muttons or any victuale of that Island (other then such as is due & appointed to be yealded as rent towards his entertainment by the late Record & Extent of His Ma^ties^ Revenewes) at a lower rate then shall be agreed to betwixt them: It is answered, that the Governor shall content himself with one hundred muttons by the yeare to be furnished and served by the Countrey at such price as shalbe rated and sett downe by men indifferent and such as can judge of their value; or as shall be agreable to the rate of the markete at that tyme; and that the like order shall be observed for the proportion of such a quantie of butter to be served by the Countrey to the Governor as heretofore hath usuallie bin yealded.

In like sort, concerning the provisions or comodities brought into the Isle by the Inhabitants, or others either out of England or from other places; To the request that the Governor may not, for provision of the Castle, take any of the said comodities at lower rates then shall be agreed on with the partes that sell the same: It is answered that the Governor is not to require any of the said comodities at other rates or prizes then shalbe agreed on with those that are to sell them: but, because it is meete that the Castle be alwaies sufficientlie furnished of all such comodities as the Governor shall finde needefull, therefore the preemption of any of the said comodities ought to be yealded unto him, but not any advantage of taking at a lower rate against the will of the seller.

GUERNSEY.

Orders in Council of the 9th of June, 1605.

To the request, that they may not be constrained to deliver their rent wheat into the Castle, but that it may suffice to deliver it according to auncient custome at the King's Grange in the Towne of S^t^ Peter's Port: It is answered that this is to be graunted, so as two hundred quarters be delivered yearelie into the Castle for a certaine provision, and fower hundred in time of necessity. This being observed, the rest may be delivered into the Grange as it is desired.

Moreover, where it is desired that the comon pastures, landes and rents belonging to the poore, & certaine closes pretended to belonge to the Church of S^t^ Peter's Port, may be restored: It is answered, that the Commissioners to be sent into that Isle, as is before said in the article touching the Extent of the Kings Revenewes, shall have likewise in charge to examine the state of the said pasture landes and rentes, and upon their certificate order shall be taken accordingly.

Ffurthermore, where it is desired that the auncient use and authoritie of assembling the three States of the Island for ordering the principale affaires thereof may be reestablished: This request seemeth reasonable, and accordinge to the auncient Custome of the said Isle thought meete to be graunted.

To their demand, that the sallerie of congers may be duly practized according to the first institution thereof: It is answered, that the resolucon hereof is to be referred to the Book of Extent made Anno quinto. Edward 3, whereupon the L.L.s of the Counsell did determine this question in the year 1583.

Whereas also it is desired that they may not be barred of their Jurisdiction against offenders though they be within the Castle, according to their Custome: It is answered that, whensoever any person or persons belonging to the Governor shall happen to offend against the course of justice of the Isle, either civile or criminall, in case the partie dwell without the precinct of the Castle, the Bailiffe & Juratts shall look to the due execution of justice upon him according to the qualitie of the fault; but, if any such person or persons so offending shall reside or dwell within the Castle and under the charge of the Governor, then are the Bailiffe and Juratts to demand the offender at his handes upon the laying open & unfolding of the cause, &c.; if the Governor denye to deliver up the partie to his ordinarie tryall according to the custome of the Isle, the Islanders have their recourse to the Counsell Boord for remedie. Wherein nevertheles this consideracon is meet to be had, that, upon every such controversie happening between the Governor and the foresaid officers, ffortie daies respite be interposed for conference betwixt them, in hope of agreement at home before the complaint be made unto the L.L.s of the Counsell.

Lastlie, whereas it is desired that some convenient course may be sett downe for prevention & remedie of the intollerable charge & trouble in the prosecution of Appeales: ffor answere heereunto the best remedy that can be yealded for the present is that it be ordered, & so it is ordered by the Lordes, That from hencefoorth no Inhabitant of the said Island shall bring any Appeale hither concerning unmoveables, that is concerning the question of landes, under the value of ffortie shillings sterlinge of yearlie rent nor concerning moveables, that is in goods & chattells, under the value of ffortie pounds sterling.

Letter from J. W. Gosselin, Esq., Jurat.

Springfield,
Guernsey, 5th October, 1846.

SIRS,

MAY I request you will have the goodness to take the following proposal into your kind consideration?

I was elected to the situation of Jurat, in 1832, against my will. Finding the office irksome, in 1838, I petitioned Her Majesty in Council for leave to resign; my petition was transmitted to the States of this Island for their consideration; and they rejected my application. I have now acted, nearly fifteen years, as Jurat of the Royal Court; and, having been elected for life, I have no prospect of being allowed to retire: but, as the Douzeniers and the officers of the Militia are permitted to resign their respective situations at the age of sixty, I would ask, as an act of justice to the Jurats, that they likewise, at the age of sixty, may be permitted to vacate their office, or not, according as they may feel disposed.

I have, &c.,

---

Letter from Henry Tupper, Esq., Advocate.

Guernsey, September 30, 1846.

GENTLEMEN,

I BEG leave to direct your attention to the defects existing in the mode of proceeding in mixed civil and criminal cases, termed "causes en adjonction," and particularly as illustrated by the case of "Sir William Collings v. Major General W. P. Napier:" and, in order to facilitate your inquiry, I inclose the Star newspaper of the 3rd and 10th of March, 1845, containing reports of these proceedings before the Royal Court.

I beg leave also to draw your attention;

1st. To the Order in Council of the 6th of July, 1809, and to the Act of Court (jugement) of the 13th of November, 1821, copies of which are enclosed.

2nd. To the Precept of Assise or Charter of 1331, which distinctly declares that the Royal Court has cognizance of all cases occurring in the Island.

3rd. To the said Charter of 1331, which states that no man shall be compelled to plead out of the Island.

Consequently, the conduct of the Crown lawyers, in this case, was a dereliction of duty: and the Act of Court, referring the case to Council and compelling the plaintiff to plead out of the Island, not on appeal, but in order to obtain machinery to prosecute his case, was a violation of the constitution, which even the unconstitutional and highly improper interference of the Secretary of State cannot excuse.

I shall further add that Sir William Collings, not desiring damages, originally presented a petition to Her Most Excellent Majesty in Council, praying for redress, and in the hope that General Napier would have been instructed to withdraw his offensive letter; and then the matter would there have rested; but that the Lord President of Council, the late Lord Wharncliffe, returned the petition to me, as acting for Sir William Collings, intimating that Council was not in a position to hear evidence or even entertain the case judicially, and consequently that proceedings must be entered in the Court below, where alone witnesses could be compelled to attend.

GUERNSEY.

These proceedings were entered in the Court below; and the result is before you. Had they been prosecuted, several years must have elapsed, and General Napier might have been at the Antipodes before their termination, if they even could have been terminated at all, considering the turn they had been made to take: therefore, in the face of a prospective and positive denial of justice, the proceedings were abandoned.

I, therefore, earnestly request that you will be pleased,

1st. To consider the defects in the proceedings "En adjonction."

2nd. To define the mode of proceeding and the authority of the Royal Court, when the person holding the office of Lieutenant Governor does an injury or commits a misdemeanor or a crime, under the cloak of his official station or otherwise, as a private individual.

I conceive that there can be no wrong without a remedy, and that no man is above the law. The Crown lawyers appear to make an exception in favour of the Lieutenant Governor. I know and feel that they are wrong; and, although it is to be hoped that Lieutenant Governors will hereafter conduct themselves with discretion, still it may be otherwise, and, therefore, the solution of these questions would be highly desirable.

Should you desire any further elucidation of these points, I shall be most happy to afford them.

I have the honour, &c.,

HENRY TUPPER, Advocate.

Letter from the Constables and Douzeniers of certain parishes against the introduction of trial by Jury.

SIR,

THE question of introducing trial by jury in this Island having been raised by the Royal Commissioners, Messrs. Ellis and Bros, during the course of their late inquiry in the Criminal Law, we have the honour to inform you that the inhabitants whom we represent, feeling deeply the importance of the subject, have met in their respective parishes, and have unanimously adopted resolutions against such a change in our constitution.

Their sentiments concurring entirely with the opinions already expressed both by the Bench and by the Bar.

The inhabitants consider the small extent of the Island and its consequent state of society; they consider that the Royal Court insures to all Judges of their own choice selected from among the most upright, well informed and independent members of the community, who of themselves constitute a real jury, the members of which have, by long experience, acquired such legal knowledge as an ordinary jury cannot be expected to possess.

They further consider that the introduction of trial by jury would not insure to the inhabitants more guarantees of liberty or justice than they now have, but, on the contrary, that a new social duty would be imposed on them without apparent public advantage, and is, therefore, not only unnecessary, but would be productive of evil.

These, Sir, are the sentiments which we have been authorized, and now have the honour of communicating on behalf of the inhabitants: and, feeling convinced that Her Majesty's Government, in contemplating changes in the laws and institutions of the Island, has only in view the welfare and happiness of the community, we may be permitted to express the readiness of the inhabitants to cooperate cordially in furtherance of so desirable an object. At the same time considering that our position, habits, laws and institutions differ materially from those of England, we hope that, previous to any final decision, the authorities and the inhabitants will be allowed an opportunity of offering such remarks or suggestions as their local knowledge, their wants and their feelings may prompt.

We have taken the liberty of transmitting a copy of this letter to the Royal Commissioners.

On behalf of the several parishes we respectively represent,

MESSIEURS, Cour Royale, 3 Décembre, 1846.

J'ai l'honneur d'accuser réception de votre lettre, en date du 24 Novembre dernier, qui m'est parvenue aujourd'hui seulement, par laquelle vous me priez, au nom de vos Douzaines respectives, de convoquer les Etats de cette Ile dans le plus court délai, afin de leur soumettre la proposition et nommer un Comité pour prendre en considération les changemens qui leur paraîtront nécessaires dans les lois civiles de l'Ile et dans leur administration, et dresser un projet de réforme pour être soumis aux Etats, et ensuite à Sa Majesté en Conseil.

Comme j'attends, d'un jour à l'autre, le retour de M. le Baillif, je crois ne pas devoir prendre sur moi de convoquer les Etats pour délibérer sur un sujet d'une importance si majeure. Je ne manquerai pas, dès son arrivée, de lui communiquer le contenu de votre lettre, afin qu'il prenne, en conséquence, les mesures convenables.

J'ai l'honneur, &c.,

H.-O. CARRÉ, Lieutenant Baillif.

A la séance de la Douzaine Cantonale du Nord-Ouest, No. 2, tenu le 7 Décembre, 1846.

Il a été résolu que cette Douzaine se joindra à la Douzaine Centrale, en priant Monsieur le Président des Etats de convoquer ce corps au plutôt, afin de nommer un Comité autorisé à dresser un projet de réforme dans notre Constitution et dans nos Lois Civiles, lequel Comité sera aussi autorisé à appeller à son aide, soit Membres du Barreau ou autres individus capables de donner l'information requise, afin qu'il en fasse son rapport aux Etats dans le plus court délai.

---

MONSIEUR, Cour Royale, 11 Décembre, 1846.

J'ai l'honneur d'accuser réception de la résolution de votre Douzaine, que vous m'avez addressée, dans votre lettre en date du 7 Décembre, et de vous informer que j'ai l'intention de soumettre aux Etats la proposition contenue dans la requête qui a été dernièrement présentée à M. le Lieutenant-Baillif.

J'ai l'honneur, &c.

PIERRE STAFFORD CAREY,

A. BISHOP, Ecuyer. Baillif de Guernesey.

Cette réquisition ayant été faite en conséquence des expressions dont M. le Secrétaire d'Etat s'est servi dans sa lettre en date du 10 Septembre, 1846, il me paraît qu'afin de bien saisir la position dans laquelle les Etats se trouvent aujourd'hui, il sera à propos de reproduire la lettre dont il s'agit.

SIR, Whitehall, September 10, 1846.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the representation which you were authorized by the States of the island of Guernsey to communicate to me with reference to the proposed inquiry into the Civil Laws of the island.

Her Majesty's Government will not fail to give the fullest consideration to the opinions expressed by the States in their resolutions, which you have placed in my hands, and to the assurance of their attachment to their native language and to the laws and institutions of the island.

It is far from the intention of Her Majesty's Government to adopt any measures tending to affect important changes, without proof of their necessity, in these laws and institutions.

At the same time, there is reason to believe that the laws of the Channel Islands, like the laws of other parts of Her Majesty's dominions, may, from lapse of time and other circumstances, require revision and amendment, and, with this view and in conformity with the course of proceeding adopted in other cases, a Commission has been appointed for inquiring into the criminal laws of those islands.

With the same view and in accordance with various representations to that effect from many of the inhabitants, Her Majesty's Government have announced their intention humbly to advise Her Majesty to direct that an inquiry should be instituted into the civil law of these islands; but they have thought it expedient that such inquiry should not proceed simultaneously with the inquiry now in progress into the criminal law.

In the mean time, Her Majesty's Government will receive with satisfaction any suggestions which may be offered by the States, as the result of their deliberation with regard to amendments, which may appear to them to be required, in the laws of the island or in the administration of them.

I have the honour, &c.,

THE BAILIFF of GUERNSEY (Signed) G. GREY.

---

SIR, Taunton, 16th September, 1846.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 10th instant, on the subject of the representation which I was authorized to make to you, on the part of the States of the Island of Guernsey, with reference to the proposed inquiry into the civil law of the Island.

On my return to Guernsey, I shall take the earliest opportunity of communicating your letter to the States. In the meanwhile, I beg most respectfully to thank you, in their behalf, for the exposition you have given of the views and intentions of Her Majesty's Government.

In Guernsey, as elsewhere, there is no doubt room for revision and amendment. And, however attached the inhabitants of the Island may be to their ancient laws and institutions yet, I am persuaded that, where a change is proved to be necessary, the States will be nowise disposed to object to it. At the same time, I am quite sure that the States will rejoice to find that any inquiry, which it may ultimately be thought advisable to make into the civil laws of the island, is not intended to be proceeded with simultaneously with the inquiry now going on into the criminal law. And I may add that, in this feeling, I entirely concur.

For, when the mode of proceeding in criminal matters has once been revised and amended, it is to be hoped that this branch of the law will stand on such a footing as to serve as a model for any amendment that may be required in other branches of the law.

In this manner, I look forward to the introduction of very considerable improvement in the civil laws, independently of any commission of inquiry.

I am confident that the Royal Court will be prepared to frame important measures of amendment, which, on being ratified and approved by the States, will ultimately be presented for the sanction of Her Majesty in Council.

In the meanwhile, with respect to any further amendments in the laws of the Island or in the administration thereof, the States cannot fail to be highly gratified at the assurance, conveyed to them in your letter, of the readiness of Her Majesty's Government to receive any suggestions which they may offer as the result of their deliberation.

I have the honour, &c.,

(Signed) PETER STAFFORD CAREY.

SIR GEORGE GREY, Bart., Whitehall, Bailiff of Guernsey.

GUERNSEY.

Le Gouvernement de Sa Majesté ayant l'intention de recommander à Sa Majesté d'envoyer des Commissaires Royaux pour faire une enquête au sujet des lois civiles de cette Ile, M. le Secrétaire d'Etat nous assure que le Gouvernement sera prêt à accueiller les suggestions qui lui seront soumises par les Etats. En suivant le cours désigné par Messire George Grey, les Etats démontreront, de la manière la plus formelle, combien ils sont empressés à seconder les vues du Gouvernement.

Letter from J. Gaudion, Esq., Judge of Alderney.

SIR, Alderney, 18th January, 1847.

I HAVE the honour to state to you, for the information of the Commissioners on the Criminal Law of the Channel Islands, that, of late, a serious change in the increase of the population of this island is felt from the influx of workmen coming daily here to carry on Government works; principally a breakwater for a harbour of refuge. This work alone, the contractor tells me, will employ at least five hundred men; these, with the usual proportion of married men and their children, will more than double our population.

With our stationary and correct natives, it was a matter of no consequence what powers this Court possessed in a criminal point of view; but I fear that we may expect a different state of things with the new comers. I have therefore thought it my duty to state thus far, previous to the Commissioners coming to a decision on the powers they may please to recommend the Court of this Island should have.

I have, &c.,
JOHN GAUDION,
Judge of Alderney.

Charles Clark, Esq.,
Secretary to the Commission,
